The thirtieth international convention of the Y.M.C.A. was held the week before last in Indianapolis. Addresses were given by a number of prominent persons, including Mr. Wanamaker, General Howard, and others. The committee on the report of the International Committee urged an enlargement of their work. Seventy-one associations reported pledges, and it was found that in all 28,000dols. had been pledged for furthering the extension of the work of the International Committee. General Harrison made a short speech, in which he said, "It is a great pleasure to look into the faces of the earnest young men who are here conferring on the interests of Christianity and the work of improving their fellows. The first Association of which I was ever president was the Y.M.C.A. of this city."

THE Y.W.C.A.

The Edinburgh Y.W.C.A. and Y.W.C.I. are happily amalgamating, being really one in purpose and work.

At the annual meeting of the Peterborough Y.W.C.A., a breakfast was given to a number of policemen, who were off duty.

Somerset Home, Reigate, is to be opened (D.V.) early in July in connection with the Y.W.C.A. Members who are thinking of a holiday would find the bracing air and beautiful walks about Reigate affording them the needed refreshment of mind and body. For information apply to Miss H. Dalton, Tramore, Holmesdale-road, Reigate.

The Y.W.C.A. of Chicago is making a special effort to care for young girls coming alone to that city, and secure for them such homes as may be fitting and direct them to suitable lodging houses. This work will be under the general care of the Travellers' Aid Department, which the Association has carried on for about four years. Agents wearing a blue badge marked "Young Women's Christian Association" meet the trains to assist any who may need help.

The Windsor and Eton branch has increased so much of late that larger premises have had to be secured. In taking possession of these, the committee gave a tea to the workmen who had been engaged on the alterations. Canon Gee and Lady Hope gave addresses. On Wednesday last 150 of the members and friends met together for a social evening. Addresses were given by Hon. Emily Kinnaird and others. We may add that arrangements can be made at the Homestead, Windsor, to provide accommodation and refreshment to parties of female excursionists.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

The Shoreham Y.P.S.C.E. spent a very happy afternoon last week on the water at Southwick. Mr. Chenery gave a very brief address.

Christian Endeavour is spreading in Ireland, and a number of new branches have been opened lately in Belfast. Dr. Clark is to visit that city on the 13th inst.

Rev. J. C. Lloyd, of Aberavon, spoke in glowing terms on behalf of the Christian Endeavour Movement at the recent meetings of South Glamorganshire Congregational Union.

There are now 630 branches in this country. Societies have lately been formed in connection with Congregational churches at Coatbridge, Dedham, Workington, Battle, Bristol (Redland Park), Carlisle, Creaton, and Swinton.

Dr. F. E. Clark is, we hear, preparing a book concerning his journey around the world, which will be very fully and beautifully illustrated. The volume, of some five or six hundred pages, will be wholly new, and the title will be "In Five Continents."

Dr. Clark has sent to the office of the Society in Boston the names of nearly forty Societies of Christian Endeavour in India, not a quarter of which had been before reported. This undoubtedly shows what is true in other parts of the world, that there are far more Endeavour societies in the great brotherhood than have ever been recorded.

A most successful social gathering was held in connection with the Victoria-street (Derby) Congregational Y.P.S.C.E. on Saturday week. Rev. G. Hunsworth, M.A., pastor, presided, and gave a short address, explaining the objects and methods of the Christian Endeavour Movement, and congratulating the committees on the very satisfactory progress which had been made since last December.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

A party of 140 girls recently sailed from Glasgow for Canada in connection with Mr. Quarrier's Orphan Homes.

Rev. Martin Lewis, late of Gravesend, has been warmly welcomed on his induction to the charge at Queen's Cross, Aberdeen.

Rev. Alexander Dewar and Rev. A. G. M'Alpine have been ordained as missionaries to Livingstonia in connection with the Free Church.

Rev. John Robertson, of Gorbals Tabernacle, Glasgow, has addressed a pastoral letter to his church, stating that in the autumn he will resign his charge, and commence services in the City Hall, Glasgow.

Much gratification is expressed in many circles at the honour conferred on Mr. J. Campbell White, of Overtoun, by his elevation to the peerage. Ex-Provost Henderson, of Aberdeen, has received the honour of knighthood.

The Inverness Courier states that at least in two Highland F.C. congregations the threatened separation from the general body of the church has been precipitated by the action of the recent General Assembly approving the Declaratory Act.

The two hundred and fourteenth anniversary of the battle of Drumclog was celebrated last Sabbath, when a service was held on the battlefield. Rev. A. W. Donaldson, Strathaven, preached, and over 1500 people had congregated to take part in the celebration.

A remarkable demonstration took place last Sunday at the lonely moorland farm of Lochgoin, in the north-east of Fenwick parish, where, in celebration of the centenary of John Howie, author of the "Scots Worthies," a "conventicle" was held, and was attended by about five thousand persons. Rev. Dr. Kerr, of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, conducted a most impressive service, and a collection was made in aid of a proposed memorial of John Howie, to be erected at or near Lochgoin.

IRISH NOTES.

A house has been rented by the Dublin Methodist Central Mission, to be used as a "Lifeboat Shelter for Men," and £200 has been promised towards its cost.

The sixty-fourth annual meeting of the Congregational Union of Ireland was held last week in Belfast. Rev. W. G. Davis, of Coleraine, presided, and encouraging reports of the various congregations and departments of the denomination were presented.

The report presented last week by Rev. Thomas Lyle to the annual meeting at Belfast of the Bible Colportage Society for Ireland showed that the organisation has now twenty-five agents at work in various parts of Ireland, and has had an encouraging year.

Gospel tent work has been resumed in various places. Rev. Henry Ball, Methodist evangelist, began on Sunday week in Ballinamallard, and Rev Jas. Kirkwood on last Sunday in Banbridge. The latter has also had series of evangelistic services in the Methodist Church, Wexford.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is doing most valuable service, both of a preventive and remedial character, in Belfast. It has two agents, and last year interfered in the interests of almost 1,000 children, most of whom were the victims, not of poverty, but of drink.

A remarkable work of grace has been going on at Carnlough, co. Antrim. Some months ago two young men of the "Faith Mission" of Scotland commenced meetings in the Town Hall, and these, which have been kept up ever since, have resulted in the professed conversion of scores and scores in the neighbourhood. In some families every member has been blessed.

Personalia.

Miss A. E. Coombs, well known in Birmingham, left on Friday for missionary work at Fihaonana, Vonizongo, Madagascar.

Rev. Thomas Lewis, the honoured missionary at San Salvador, has been compelled, in consequence of illness, to visit the Grand Canary for a few weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Roger, of the Baptist Congo Mission, accompanied by Mr. Kirkland, of Edinburgh (a fresh recruit), are returning this week to the Congo.

Mr. and Mrs. Osborn-Howe have arrived in England from South Africa, and may be addressed to the care of Mr. A. S. Day, Lancaster-road, Wimbledon.

Rev. George Cameron, Baptist missionary, has just arrived in England from Wathen Station, on the Congo, bringing with him his motherless infant daughter.

Mr. Robert F. Horton, M.A., of Hampstead, has accepted the chairmanship of the board of directors of the London Missionary Society for the ensuing year, in succession to Rev. William Roberts.

Miss Wells, daughter of Rev. James Wells, of Glasgow, is on the eve of sailing for India for medical mission service. It is intended she should go to Nagpur as colleague to Miss Agnes Henderson.

Mr. Rabinowich, of Kischeneff, is about to visit London on his way to Chicago. On Thursday evening, June 15, at a meeting in Talbot Tabernacle, Talbot-road, W., he will be commended to God in prayer.

Mr. Robert Smith, L.C.M. missionary at Earl's Court, has been appointed to succeed the late Mr. C. M. Sawell as district secretary of the London City Mission, and the work of the district secretaries has been rearranged.

Mr. Shuldham Henry's friends will be sorry to hear that he has had another very severe attack of influenza, accompanied by congestion and bronchitis. He is now better, but very weak. He asks the prayers of the Lord's people for his speedy recovery to health and strength.

Rev. George Kerry, the Indian secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, is expected in England early next month. He has been in the service of the Mission thirty-seven years. He reports: "A wonderful work now going on in the Jessore district, where forty converts have been baptized."

Rev. James L. Muirhead, father of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of England, completed the sixtieth year of his ministry in Cheviot-street Church, Wooler, on May 22, being ordained to the pastoral charge there on that date in 1833. Special services in commemoration of the event were held in the church.

Madame Rodriguez writes:—"In March I was taken seriously ill, but through God's goodness have during the last month been gradually recovering. Early in June we hope to visit England for change and rest during the hot months. As the doctors forbid my holding public meetings this summer, we purpose paying visits, and in a quiet way doing what we can to extend interest in the mission. Communications may be addressed to Dr. Macwhirter Dunbar, Hedingham House, Clapham Common, S.W."

M. F. Coillard, of the Zambezi Mission, in his inimitable letters to the Journal des Missions Evangéliques, lets us share many of his joys and sorrows. After toiling for six years at Séfula he has moved on to Léaluyi, and founded a new station. In the June issue of the Journal, he mourns the indifference and instability of the people, and refers in pathetic terms to the hardness and solitude of his life now that he is not only a widower, but deprived of the kind attentions of fellow-missionaries. He has with him some Basuto evangelists whose fidelity and usefulness he cordially acknowledges Having just read the Life of Mackay of Uganda, he says:—"Describing Uganda and Mtesa, Mackay paints, without knowing it, the Barotsi people and King Léwanika. There is the same duplicity, profligacy, and inexpressible corruption, the same tyranny and pusillanimity, the same mixture of good and evil and contempt of human life."

Orphan Homes of Scotland.

In the Christian Institute, Glasgow, a party of girls from the Orphan Homes of Scotland, Bridge of Weir, recently attended a farewell meeting, at which a large number of friends interested in the work were present.

Mr. Quarrier gave an account of the way in which he had been helped during the past year, which had been a good one, notwithstanding the failure of banks and the depression of trade. 600 children had been received, but by sending out those who were ready, they could still go on receiving others. No child is sent to Canada who does not wish to go: nor is one sent whose health unfits him or her to do so. He had needed £500 for 140 girls going, but the Lord had sent him £700 for emigration, showing that he should hive off twenty more. P. B. L.

Evangelistic Notes.

Mrs. Baeyertz has finished a fortnight's mission at Broughty Ferry. The afternoon Bible readings proved helpful to many. The evening evangelistic addresses were very earnest and powerful. Many professed to decide for Christ, but we believe that the results of the mission cannot be fully estimated. Unexpected testimonies are always meeting one from those who have been established in the faith.

M. D. M.

An Interesting Open-Air Service was held at Boveridge House, near Salisbury, on Sunday week, when Mr. H. J. Knight, of the Evangelisation Society, was invited by Mr. and Mrs. Brouncker to address their tenants and the villagers. Nearly 400 listened to an earnest exhortation from the words, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Lying as Boveridge does on the ridge of a hill, and surrounded by lovely woods, the service in the open air seemed an ideal one, and made many wish that others having large country houses and parks, would throw them open and invite evangelists at this time of the year to come and proclaim the good news of salvation and win souls for Christ.

Rev. E. E. Davidson has been holding a capital united mission in Fredonia (N.Y.). For three weeks meetings were held afternoon and evening. The preaching was directed to Christians for several days, preparing them for the work. When the time came to appeal to sinners, the evangelist asked Christians to rise, then those who desired to become Christians, and the latter were asked to come to the front seats; opportunity was also given to rise for prayer. At the close he instructed the inquirers as to what it was to become a Christian. Large numbers gave their names as determined to live a Christian life, and with their name the church of their preference, and these cards were handed to the pastors representing these churches. A goodly number were received into the Church a week after the meetings closed.

Bethlehem, Penn.—Quaint, sleepy old Bethlehem has been stirred by a wave of "revival interest" such as has not been known for many a year. As one of the local papers puts it, "The labours of the evangelists stirred up the community as it has not been stirred since the Rebellion." The work is the universal theme of conversation, and little children in the schools, the students in "Lehigh," the men in the iron works, clerks in the stores, and grey-haired men and women in the homes, are the interested participants. Seven hundred and forty-five people have openly confessed Christ as their Saviour. The services were conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall and Prof. Birch, and were held under the auspices of the "Ministerial Union of the Bethlehems and Vicinity," in the great Moravian church. The fruit has been shared not only by the churches directly interested in the work, but by the Lutheran, German, Reformed and Protestant Episcopal churches as well. A few Roman Catholics have also been reached, and led to a public confession of Christ as their Saviour.

The Nestorian Tablet in China.

Writing to a Shanghai newspaper, Rev. Moir Duncan calls attention to the condition of the famous Nestorian Tablet in Shensi, North-Western China. Not long ago, in consequence of foreign representations on the subject, the Chinese Government ordered that steps should be taken for the preservation of the tablet from the effects of exposure to the weather. Of the covering which was rebuilt so recently not a trace now remains, save the pedestals for the pillars and atoms of the tiling. An old priest told Mr. Duncan that the stone was blown down by a rushing wind; others, however, said it was deliberately destroyed, because the priests were jealous of the interest manifested in it. Moreover, the stone has evidently been tampered with, several of the characters have been effaced, and there are other signs of malicious hands. Mr. Duncan mentions the inaccuracies, and adds:—"What is still required is that there be brought into service all that the camera and Chinese culture can offer accurately to reproduce and interpret the engraven testimony the stone has speechlessly uttered during these centuries." According to Dr. Wells Williams, this monument is the only record yet found in China itself of the labours of the Nestorian Christians in that country about the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries of our era. The inscription, which is very long, eulogises the propagation of Christianity—"the illustrious religion"—in China. "This truly Oriental writing," says Dr. Williams, "is the most ancient Christian inscription yet found in Asia, and shows plainly that Christianity had made great progress among the Chinese." In 1859 it was set up again by a Chinese, who had so much regard for it as to rebuild it in the brick wall where it had once stood outside of the city of Si-ngan Fu.

Obituary.

MRS. CLOUGH.

The sudden death, at Evanston, Ill., is reported of Mrs. Clough, wife of Dr. J. E. Clough, of the Telugu Mission. She was killed by a folding bed, which closed upon her and crushed her, while her daughter stood by powerless to prevent it.

REV. PETER PRESCOTT.

At the age of seventy, Rev. Peter Prescott fell asleep on May 29, at Redlands, Bristol. He did good work in his years of active ministry. Of late, while a supernumerary, he has exerted himself in helping lay preachers and young men in training for Gospel work. He recently wrote a searching pamphlet with the expressive title "Wesleyanism and the Bible; or, the true and full inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, with special reference to the ominous aspect of that question in Wesleyan Methodism at the present time."

REV. W. DAVIES.

Many Lancashire Congregationalists will regret to hear of the death, at his residence, Overdale, Woolton, near Liverpool, of Rev. William Davies, first pastor of Woolton Congregational Church. Mr. Davies went through his ordinary course as a student at Lancashire Independent College, Withington, and was ordained as a Congregational minister in 1866. On the formation of the first Congregational Church at Woolton, near Liverpool, in 1867, he was appointed its first pastor. He was deeply devoted to his church and people.

MRS. CARMICHAEL.

Much regret is felt in Dublin at the death of the Hon. Mrs. Carmichael, who has passed away after a brief illness at Great Malvern. Deceased was daughter of the fourth Viscount Mountmorres, and married the late Mr. E. Carmichael, of Monkstown, Dublin, in 1877. Mr. Carmichael's active interest on behalf of the Missions to Seamen is still remembered. Since his death three years ago Mrs. Carmichael acted as honorary secretary of the Irish branch of the society, and laboured very zealously in making the Sailors' Institute in Dublin a boon and a blessing.

MAJOR HENRY WARREN, LATE 60TH RIFLES.

With much regret we notice the death of this faithful servant of the Lord Jesus. Born sixty-eight years ago, he served his country in the Kaffir, Indian Mutiny, and North China Wars. At the first visit of Mr. Moody to Ireland, Major Warren was induced to attend his services, and there he was brought to a knowledge of the Lord Jesus. From the period of his conversion to the day of his death he never swerved to the right hand nor to the left from following his Master. Very early in his Christian career he took a prominent part in witnessing for the Lord in St. Matthias Church, and in the Union Buildings, Dublin, Major Warren's earnest work for the Lord left its clear mark. His Sunday afternoons were spent visiting the patients in the Incurable Hospital, and reading and praying with them. Leaving Ireland four years ago he settled in Tunbridge Wells, where he continued the work which he so much loved; and there he passed away on the 18th ult., leaving a wife, to whom he was devotedly attached, and who was ever his wise counsellor and his true helpmeet.

REV. DR. PRITCHARD.

At the advanced age of 84, Rev. Charles Pritchard, D.D., F.R.S., Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford, entered into rest a few days ago. He was a graduate of Cambridge, and early devoted himself to the study of astronomy, upon which during his long career he wrote many treatises. He was president of the Royal Astronomical Society in 1866, and in the same year he was awarded the gold medal of that society for discoveries in stellar photometry. He was Hulsean lecturer in 1867, and was select preacher both at Oxford and Cambridge; and five times he preached by request before the British Association at their annual meeting. He was the author of a reply to Bishop Colenso, and of one of the most interesting articles in the "Bible Dictionary"—namely, "The Star of the Magi." Several articles in the last edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" were from his pen. It was on his representations that the University built the Observatory, and provided lecture-rooms and appliances for astronomical instruction and research. In spite of serious illness of long duration he paid his visits to the Observatory almost to the last.

MOHAMMEDANISM NOT DEAD.—Mrs. Bishop (Miss Isabella Bird), speaking on Friday in Lambeth Palace, in connection with the Assyrian Mission, said it was a mistake to suppose that Mohammedanism was effete. It was making converts at an immense rate from other Asiatic religions. She recognised the good in Islam, but it had degraded woman and destroyed the fundamental idea of the family.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of the late Rev. JAMES J. BONAR, D.D., of Greenock.

May we again remind our readers of the motion condemning Government complicity in the opium trade, which comes on for discussion in the House of Commons on Friday, June 30? We trust that all electors who can bring any influence to bear on members of Parliament will impress on them the necessity of firm and decided action at this crisis. If any friends have not yet sent in petitions in favour of the motion, they can secure the proper forms and sheets for signature on application to Dr. Maxwell, 49, Highbury-park, London, N.

The United States Court of Appeal has decided that the Government has not sufficient capital invested in the Chicago Exhibition to support its claim to absolute jurisdiction. This decision means that the resolve of the local administration to open the Exhibition on Sundays is not to be interfered with. On many grounds we deeply regret this decision, which deals a heavy blow at the purity of Sabbath observance in America.

The Bishop of Manchester has his anxieties, as every thoughtful Christian must, about the lax observance of the Lord's Day, which is now so universal. The boating and lawn-tennis parties of the rich, the jests and wild mirth, and the late elaborate dinner, are neither works of necessity nor of mercy. The riotous amusements of the poor are also indefensible. The Bishop sees a danger in some "Pleasant Sunday Afternoons," or, as they are sometimes called, "Religious Free-and-easies"; they tempt the children from the Sunday-school. But in those conducted on the original lines the evangelistic element is supreme, and children are not included.

The Bishop might have found another serious aspect of the Sabbath question in the uses made of the day by those who travel long distances to hear favourite preachers, and by visitors to London who go the round of the churches and chapels as if they were theatres.

It might indeed be justifiable to run trains full of workers to needy districts, to spend the day among the poor and forgotten; but nothing can justify the waste of time, of money, of strength, of quiet and peace, of those who are bent only on pleasing themselves. These persons are of little or no use in the places they go to, but they might be very useful in the places where they live. The impression made on the minds of 'bus and tram drivers is that religious people care nothing for them. The peripatetic habits of some are no doubt carelessly indulged; then let them bethink themselves.

It is with special satisfaction that we direct the attention of our readers to the new and important missionary adjunct which has been secured in the founding of Livingstone College, "for the instruction of foreign missionaries in the elements of practical medicine." Details of the scheme will be found on p. 29. We cannot but think that this institution, which has been most happily named, will prove of invaluable service in equipping young missionaries for the fullest exercise of their Divine commission, as well as for the conservation of personal health.

Next week will be held the Mildmay Conference, which undoubtedly, with Keswick, occupies foremost rank among the conventions of the year. Moreover, a special interest will this year be felt by reason of the subject chosen. Important as the study of prophecy ever is, it becomes, at a time like the present, when, in the judgment of not a few Bible students, events are ripening fast, of peculiar urgency and timeliness. Hence next week's Conference will be anticipated with considerable interest, and earnest prayer will be made that God would bless it greatly in the mutual edification of his people and the reviving of "the blessed hope" of the Church.

In our issue of May 18 we stated that the Trustees and Council of the London Samaritan Society were, after careful investigation, preparing a reply to certain charges and adverse statements, which had appeared in a weekly periodical concerning the director of the Society, Mr. J. J. Jones. Their report (extending to sixteen printed folio pages) has now been issued. It appears, on the face of it, to be the result of a comprehensive inquiry. But seeing that the action of the Trustees and Council themselves has been called in question, it would, in our opinion, be well on their part to have the conclusions at which they have arrived reviewed by an independent authority.

Every extension of justice should be hailed with thankfulness. We are, therefore, glad to hear that the Post-office has resolved that examinations for men and women shall in future consist of the same subjects. It may be presumed that the rate of pay will also be the same, when women do the same work as men. Few things make the heart more bitter than to be doing the same work as others, while receiving a smaller wage than they. Boys, young men, and women are constantly wronged in this way, and are soured in spirit. These offences against righteousness make trade unions necessary, and give them all their power.

The great success of women this year in the Cambridge examinations has again raised the question of their unfair treatment by the University. They may pass the examinations, but they receive no advantage save the empty honour—no degree, no place even in the list of successful competitors. This injustice cannot continue; every woman who passes an examination is preparing the way for the granting of degrees more surely than by anything else that can be done; and when the degrees are given, she will have a moral claim to call them hers. It is the old story. Argument goes a short way to obtain a right; it is won by work and by suffering. Our fathers, when they combined to free the slave, accepted the co-operation of women, took their money, their work, their influence, and then denied them the right of meeting with themselves in business meetings and deliberative assemblies! Such glaring inconsistency destroyed itself, and women soon met men on equal terms to do God's work. Thus slowly they are acquiring their natural rights by paying for them.

Mr. Stead has fashioned another novelty in his fertile brain—"A New Pilgrimage" to places of national interest, for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the sentiment of patriotism. An intelligent love of country is, however, as dependent, if not a good deal more so, on the country's present condition as on the grand things it may have achieved. Working men and women cannot afford the time and money to take a ten days' trip to famous places, but if we can give them healthy surroundings, if we can take the public-house away from the street, if we can make them feel that they have a warm and welcome place in the Church of Christ, if we can set before them as good and open a career as they will find abroad in new lands, then they will love their country. Few men have enough imagination to be roused into patriotic ardour by visiting the Tower, where so many of our noblest Englishmen lost their heads, but the stolidest coal-heaver knows whether his country is now doing its duty to the great mass of its people.

The doctors are seizing the present opportunity of urging that inebriates should be placed under compulsory detention. If this is to be done, the greatest care must be taken to preserve the power from being abused, especially in the case of "fallen women." We may give too much power to medical men even for right objects. Liberty is more easily parted with than regained; and in our desire to improve a great many things we may be proceeding by the wrong method. For example, the doctors insist that few drunken women are reclaimed; then why do they not recommend the abolition of grocers' licences, and thus remove the main temptation? We should prefer the application of compulsion to prevent the evil rather than to cure it.

All lovers of peace will rejoice that on June 16th the House of Commons passed a resolution in favour of Her Majesty's Government lending their hearty co-operation to the Government of the United States, to enter into a treaty of International Arbitration for the settlement of any differences or disputes between the two countries. The discussion on the subject will prove of almost as much value as the resolution, because of the spirit of wisdom and moderation which it breathed; it contained sentences which will possess historic importance and world-wide influence. Mr. Gladstone cordially recognised the services of Lord Salisbury's Government by the appointment of the Behring Sea Arbitration Conference, and said that it was not beyond reasonable hope that this Government treaty of arbitration might ere long, under favourable circumstances, be concluded. He declared that war had found another way of making itself oppressive by establishing militarism in the time of peace. He insisted that the most effective of all ways to promote peace was to cherish that habit of mind by which they were enabled to accustom themselves to form just, moderate, and rational estimates of their own claims, and not, by pitching them at extravagant weight, to lay the basis of quarrel, and possibly of bloodshed. All parties joined in passing the resolution; it was agreed to without a division.

Was the German Emperor right when he said the other day at Danzig that "the principal virtues of a soldier were faithfulness and obedience, and he was not to trouble about anything else"? What, not trouble about being pure and truthful and honest and just and gentle? This language justifies to the full the objection made by the Friends to a military life, when they allege that it robs a man of his individuality, and turns him into a machine. The Emperor is also reported to have said that "the fundamental pillars of the State were the army and navy." Lord Macaulay used to say that English probity had done more than English valour to win and keep India for the British crown; and experience has abundantly shown that truth and righteousness, so far as we practise them, are our greatest forces, and so they are of any nation. The nation that puts its trust in material power rather than in spiritual, will find it has trusted to a broken reed. "God is" not "always on the side of the big battalions."

The curiosity of the world is now moved to see what the German Emperor will do in the face of the Social Democratic victory. How will he carry out his intentions of strengthening the army? Will this vote prove to be the turning point in the process of arming every man in Europe for fighting purposes, and from the most military nation shall we obtain deliverance from the curse of militarism? The Emperor has an opportunity of doing something really great for the cause of humanity, if only pride and self-will do not block the way. If there could be any similar popular movement in France in the direction of peace it would at least make it easier for him to alter his policy. We say nothing of the political meaning of the vote, which surely must show that the nation will no longer submit to the arbitrary will of one man.

According to the Daily Chronicle, the gorgeous vestments stolen from the Ischoodova monastery have been found in the cell of one of the monks. The search for them has also discovered the existence of secret immorality among the monks. These are the men who can persecute Stundists. These, too, are the men who make Stundism grow. The Independent reports an address given by Mr. Juakoff Preelooker, late head master of the Government School, Odessa, at Morningside Church, Edinburgh, on "Religious Life and Persecution in Russia," who says that in spite of all the endeavours of the Government and of the Church, Protestantism is spreading rapidly in Russia. The numerical strength of the non-conforming sects could not be estimated accurately, because they are compelled to live and work in secrecy; but Mr. Preelooker thinks that the Stundists alone number a million and a-half. As the Roman Church fell under the weight of her own corruption, so will the Greek Church in due time.

Few things could better illustrate the lordly assumption and proud pretensions of Popery than Cardinal Vaughan's recent letter anent the declared intention to constitute Peter and the Virgin Mary patrons of England. It is not only that the whole business is without a trace of Scriptural sanction, but for "officials" on earth to arrogate the assignment of duties to saints in heaven is, on the face of it, a monstrous piece of sacerdotal presumption and pride. Were it not that Romish tactics seem to gain favour with so many around us, so palpable a delusion and snare might pass by as too trivial to excite concern. As it is, it is well to point out the cloven foot it reveals, as a survival of pagan darkness, and designed to increase the hold which "Mystery Babylon" has upon our land. The proposal should surely be too great a farce for Englishmen in the nineteenth century.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, in declining an invitation to attend the "Parliament of Religions" to be held at Chicago, contends that "the Christian religion is the one religion," and that to rank it among other contending systems is to lower its authority by "assuming the equality of other intended members, and the parity of their position and claims." It is quite the fashion in these days to put all religions on one level. There is an Athenian eagerness to form a pantheon in which gods of all kinds shall be placed, and to bring about a confederacy in which all creeds shall be endorsed. The old story of Dagon's fall before the Ark is surely apropos to this design. The religion of Christ is truly the one religion based upon the word God has spoken, and as a Divine revelation abides supreme. It is not on its trial before men; rather, men are on their trial before it.

It is somewhat startling to read that since Jan. 1st of this year, 56,000 Jews have left Russia for Palestine or other lands, and that by the end of December fully a quarter of a million will have emigrated to the Argentine and varied shores. The Divine purpose is evolving itself by sure if slow degrees. The scattered race are scattering still, but the word remains, "He that scattered Israel will gather him, and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock." They are spoken of as "a nation meted out"; the full measure of their sin, and of their correction, must be attained, and then it shall come to pass that "Jacob shall return, and be in rest and at ease, and none shall make him afraid."

"Amongst the many ominous characteristics of our age there is hardly one which stands out so glaringly and alarmingly as the growing want of quietly-enduring patience." So wrote the late Dr. Christlieb, of Bonn, not long before he died, and the lesson is one needing more and more to be learned and inculcated. In Christian spheres the need is evident; not content to let God's own processes work out their ordained end, desired results are often sought by methods out of harmony with spiritual lines. Forgetful that, as in Nature so in grace, the Creator's mightiest works are largely secret and slow, impatience seeks to hasten by exciting and obtrusive means. Thus the Spirit is grieved, and steps taken which have painfully to be retraced. Keeping on, and holding out, in calm, trustful dependence upon God, is more effective far than meteoric flash, or bold and spasmodic action.

In the interpretation of Scripture, no less than in the study of other literature, it is a mistake to suppose that full and exact truth may be gained by a microscopic examination of words. To an extent that is not generally realised, the sentence is the unit of definite thought, and must be considered as a whole. Mr. Reader Harris recently ventured the statement regarding 1 Thess. v. 23, that "the aorist tense, in which the word 'sanctify' is in the Greek, suggests a crisis and never a process." Of course, the object of this statement was to emphasise instantaneous as distinguished from progressive sanctification. In last week's British Weekly it was well shown that the Greek aorist was as flexible as some of our own tense forms, which we use (although unconsciously) in various modified senses.

If in the passage quoted the Apostle wished to "suggest a crisis," why did he continue, also using the aorist tense, "May your spirit, and soul, and body be preserved entire"? Preservation is a process; so the aorist does not always "suggest a crisis." The correspondent remarks:—

> The believer "was saved," Rom. viii. 24; he "has been saved," Eph. ii. 5, 8; he is "being saved," Acts ii. 47, 1 Cor. i. 18, 2 Cor. ii. 15; and, finally, he "shall be saved," Rom. v. 9. Salvation is thus at once, according to the standpoint from which it is regarded, a complete act, a continuous process, and an assured hope. Sanctification, in like manner, is complete in the will and purpose of God, while in the Christian soul it is a continued work, and it shall end in heavenly perfection. So the Apostle John writes that if we walk in the light, the blood of Jesus, the Son of God "cleanseth us from all sin," i.e., "is cleansing us." The purification is continuous, and the holiest believer needs it daily.

Payson's counsels to workers for Christ are well worthy of repetition. "Love your work—be diligent in it—expect success." Half-heartedness, intermittent effort, and lack of faith are effectual barriers to anything like successful results. A happy illustration of the spirit which should animate every true servant of Christ is found in the words of that well-known worker, Mrs. Amanda Smith. Writing a few days since to an American contemporary, she says:—

> My love for the cause of Christ is the same as when I was in active work—in seeing hundreds converted. It gives me great pleasure when I look over the past and think of the great company I shall meet on the other side. My age is seventy-eight. I cannot expect to stay here long. I am still trusting in God.

Happy all who can thus rejoice in the work of the Lord, not only when it is being done by themselves, but under all circumstances for the Lord's sake.

A Jesuit to the rescue! Is Madagascar about to be saved by the mediation of a Jesuit? It may; anyhow, Father Caussègne has returned from Antananarivo to tell his countrymen that France is wrong in ascribing aggressively hostile intentions to the Hovas, that the fire-eating speeches of the French deputies alarm them and make them procure arms in self-defence, that the treaty with France gives her no ground for the lofty claims put forward in her name. He counsels more conciliatory ways. He wants hospitals rather than barracks, and benevolent institutions rather than palaces. The French will be no losers by listening to him, and Madagascar will be a great gainer.

Missionaries

THE MESSENGERS OF THE CHURCHES.

The circular letter of Pastor George Wainwright, which we reprint in full, gives voice once more to the deepening conviction that the Church of Christ first of all, then each of the churches severally, then every individual member of the church, is responsible for the evangelisation of the world.

That is to say, that neither the Church nor the churches, nor individual Christians, can transfer this privileged responsibility to a Society on the one hand, or to those who go forth as missionaries on the other.

We believe that the societies for the most part are ready to recognize this scriptural and self-evident principle. The esteemed secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society writes us :—

We have individual friends who are supporting entirely missionaries of their own, and we have churches who are supporting missionaries on the field. Moreover, we have a system of missionary correspondence, by which every missionary on our staff is brought into close and constant communication with some Christian friends at home, who keep him supplied with Christian periodicals and papers, and otherwise interest themselves in the welfare and prosperity of the individual missionary. We thoroughly believe in bringing the churches and the missionaries themselves into closer and more constant touch. After all, a missionary organisation or society is but a means to an end—for doing by union what cannot be done in unit. I have always felt that we want to bring the churches and the missionaries into deeper and closer sympathy, and anything which will secure this cannot but be beneficial. It is very desirable to give the churches a living interest in all the fields of missionary labour, and to this end we find our monthly Missionary Herald of the greatest value. We have a very large circulation, and we are thankful that it has deepened and quickened the missionary interest throughout our churches.

We shall be pleased to hear from the secretaries of other missionary societies on the same subject. But recently an idea has grown up that those Christians who are obedient to the heavenly vision, and who respond to the Lord's "Who will go for us?" with "Here am I, send me!" are not only to fare forth to the high places of the field, but are to go independently of their brethren at home,—are to go down into the mine without looking to their brethren above to hold the ropes. For example, a "Mission" recently formed declares this to be one of the planks of its platform :—

The Mission is unsectarian and evangelistic in its character, and only those are accepted as workers who are prepared to trust the Lord for the supply of all their needs.

Though this sounds like faith it implies a double fallacy—(1), that the Divine Missionary Method is that the missionary should be sent out by a council of a few individuals, who contract themselves out of any definite responsibility to supply his needs; and (2), that the life of faith is only possible to those who have no stated income.

Carrying out these ideas to their logical conclusion, a friend who is journeying in the East writes to friends at home :—

Anyone who is not prepared to trust wholly in the Lord for guidance and support had better join a society. But for a person determined to trust wholly to the Lord, to look to a society for support and to a committee for guidance, is, to my mind, the height of inconsistency. If one looks to God, how can one look to man or men? If one looks to man or men, how can one look to God? As a matter of fact, just so far as they look to the one they do not look to the other.

Now, in contrast to both of these conceptions of missionary method, we think that those who go forth as missionaries are "the messengers of the churches and the glory of Christ." They are members of the one body, of which Christ is the head, and they do not cease to depend on the Head, because they continue to recognise the oneness of the body and the interdependence of its members.

Created in the Image of God.

BY REV. A. MOODY STUART, D.D.

The greatness of God over-against the littleness of man presents no insurmountable or unsurmounted obstacle to the oneness of God with man in Jesus Christ, and our oneness with Christ; and the light of modern science makes the distance between man and God no greater than man has always felt it to be. This distance is sometimes spoken of as if it were more to us than to Abraham and to John, on account of the magnificent wonders of the starry universe as disclosed by modern research; but it has really been the same in all ages of the world, and is brought out as clearly in what is probably the oldest book in the Bible as in any book of our own day. Through faith, with an enlightened and most vivid imagination, the patriarch Job took a larger grasp of the vastness of creation than any mere astronomer can ever reach by figures and by measurements. On earth the great mountains and the wide sea far exceed man's little reach, and it is not so much a higher mountain and a broader sea that will enlarge our thoughts of their Maker as a roomier intellect, or rather an opener heart, to take in what is already before our eyes. Job sees the awful power and wisdom of God as shown in these his two greatest works on earth; and then looks on his bright work above us as grander than these, and names Arcturus, Orion, and the Pleiades, and the chambers of the south, which yet he speaks of as only the "fringes" of the vast unseen in the star-spangled curtain of the heavens; and, awe-struck with the majesty of the unsearchable Creator in contrast to his own littleness, he exclaims, "If I had called and He had answered me, yet would I not believe that He had hearkened to my voice" (chap. ix. 16; see xxvi. 14, Heb.). This is the voice of nature in man overwhelmed by dark trial; but the true relation of the Divine greatness to our littleness is to be found in the trustfulness and acceptance of the 8th Psalm, "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; what is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?"

The truth is, that as regards union and fellowship the distance from God in heaven to man on earth is neither of the same kind, nor at all so great, as the distance between man and the lower creatures of the earth beside him. The wide difference between man and beast, and the comparative nearness and likeness of man to God, are both expressed in the early Divine decree—"Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you, even as the green herb; but whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made He man." In the ranks of the humbler creatures passing before man, there is no helpmeet found for him; but the Eternal Son of God, by whom all things were made, takes redeemed man for his companion, his friend, his Bride; and because man is partaker of flesh and blood, He also himself likewise takes part of the same. He takes it in infinite grace and condescension, but with no trace of degradation, and without effacing one ray of his Divine glory; and having taken human nature, He retains it for ever as his own. Man could never become a dog without utter debasement and the abandonment of his manhood; he would cease to be honoured by himself, or loved and reverenced by his former fellows. But the Father does not honour or love his Son the less for having become man, but rather the more, if that were possible, for Jesus says, "Therefore doth my Father love Me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again."

Between man and the lower animals there is a great gulf fixed which can never be bridged over. There is rule and subjection, command and obedience, and there may be mutual understanding, and even strong affection. But there is no fellowship; and the humblest condescension on the part of man, or the highest attainable elevation of these lower natures, can never effect a mutual fellowship and friendship between them and us. Within their own limits and in their own species they know each other, and cherish their own narrow intercourse; but into either the mind or the heart of man they can never rise, neither can man descend into that which is within them. Man is capable both of apprehending the works, the character, and the thoughts of God, and of entering into his love, in a manner and to an extent in which no beast of the earth or fowl of the air can make the least approach, regarding the works, the character the thoughts, and the affections of man.

Viewed in some of its aspects, the distance may seem little between a man and the dog that follows at his foot. We are both creatures formed by one Maker out of the dust of the same earth, and, although not of one blood, we are both born out of flesh and blood, and at death the bodies of both return to the dust. Fascinated by this resemblance, some acute men of science, ignoring man's creation in the Divine image, and his peculiar and completely distinctive capacity for God, and seeking a oneness for man beneath him and not above him, have pored over this earthly likeness till what is heavenliest in their own faculties seems to have been benumbed; and they have pictured to themselves a man near of kin to the other beasts, only a little higher, and almost, if not quite, self-promoted from among them. As in its childhood the world by wisdom knew not God, but changed his glory into the image of corruptible things, so, again, in its old age, the world seems ready to relapse into a second childhood by returning, after another fashion, to the glorifying of "four-footed beasts, and birds, and creeping things."

Man has been said, rightly enough, to stand in some way in the place of God to the dog whom he feeds and commands. But in all that relates to likeness and fellowship, the difference is vastly wider between the dog and man, who tread the same earth, than between man and the great God who guides the stars in their courses. As regards power, the distance indeed is limited from the worm to the archangel, but is infinite from the archangel to God Almighty; and it is equally so from man to God, man formed out of dust and the great unseen Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable. Between the littleness of man and the greatness of Him who holds the sea in the hollow of his hand, the distance is immeasurable; and between the creature and the Creator it is absolutely infinite,—between us who are moulded like clay by the hand of our Potter, and God who createth all things out of nothing by the word of his power. Such power, with the manner of its exercise, is to us what has been called in recent phraseology "unthinkable"; and its apprehension is in the Bible denied to the mere intellect of man, for "the world by wisdom knows not God," and is ascribed to the child.

likeness of faith; yet it is so ascribed to faith that the intellect shares in that which faith enables it to grasp, for "by faith we understand (we mentally apprehend) that the worlds were framed by the word of God; so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." As creatures the distance between us and this great Creator is infinite; yet man was created in the image of God, but the dog was not created in the image of man; and as concerns oneness, friendship, communion, the distance between man and the dog that serves him is immeasurably greater than the distance between God and man formed in the image of God. Between man and the wisest beast of the field there is interposed a chasm, deep and dark, across which millions of years can weave no thoroughfare. But man was created in likeness and for fellowship with God, and in that likeness we are renewed, and to that fellowship we are more than restored by Jesus Christ: "I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one." Then "truly our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ," and our whole training on earth is for its furtherance and perfecting. Under severest trial it was asked of old, "What is man, that Thou shouldst magnify him and set thine heart upon him; and that Thou shouldst visit him every morning, and try him every moment?" and it is answered in the new covenant that "He chastens us for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness," that we may be one with Him in likeness and in communion.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

DEAR SIR,—Many of your readers will remember the poem entitled "The Starless Crown," which was published about thirty-five years ago, and which was a trumpet-call to hundreds of half-hearted Christians (myself included) who were seeking to receive the blessed experience from God, which they longed to enjoy, but whose "cruse of comfort" was always in a state of failure, because they did not 'rise and share it with another."

On Tuesday last I was present at the marriage of Captain Mary Hoe, of the Salvation Army, the eldest daughter of the authoress of "The Starless Crown," and I felt the inspiration of the occasion, as I looked back to the time when I read and re-read its truly Spirit-taught appeal to my heart to become a soul-winner. I cannot tell what were the feelings of the dear mother (Mrs. Hoe) as she saw her child stand upon that platform and pledge herself afresh to the holy warfare, in which she has already been engaged for six years. As quite a young child, she learned to know the voice of God, and, praise be to his name, she obeyed it, giving herself unreservedly to Him to be his channel of grace to many a sin-stricken, desolate heart, first in Switzerland and France, and later on in the Piedmontese valleys, where, with her husband, Captain William Appleton Salter, she is returning in a few days, to continue a work which God has greatly blessed, and where stars are being added daily to the crown which the band of Salvationists toiling there will one day wear to his glory. Particulars of the progress of the work in Italy, which is very interesting, would be gladly sent by Mrs. Salter, 57, Finsbury Park-road, N.—Yours truly,

June 14. C. ISABEL WALKER.

MADAME TEL SONO.—We are desired to state that Miss Maclean, of the Conference Hall, Eccleston-street, S.W., is no longer acting as secretary for this Japanese lady. Mr. Edward Trotter, 5, Montagu-square, W., who has by request acted hitherto as treasurer, has also relinquished that office. Madame Tel Sono's address is 19, Pelham-place, S.W.

IT IS OFTEN SAID that sermons are wearisome to children, but the truth is that the services are often more wearisome than the sermons; and that man will be a benefactor to the growing race who can show us how to make worship so fascinating to children that the love of worship shall be settled into their young hearts.—Sunday School Chronicle.

State-Regulated Vice.

WE are quite familiar with the objection that is constantly being urged against the publication of facts, and comments upon them, that are calculated to excite inquiry in the hearts of those who are innocent of the great evil of the world; and it is with great diffidence that we address our readers once more upon one of the most momentous moral questions which it has ever been our lot to discuss.

On many occasions we have recurred to the subject; yet again we invite attention to statements which we now make, with a view to urging readers to use every measure within their reach—either of petition, or of influence brought to bear upon members of the House of Commons, and above all by prayer—to save our nation from drifting into a course which must entail the horrors of another Indian Mutiny, or of some intestine strife which should be God's vengeance upon us.

We refer, of course, to the investigations lately made by two heroic ladies, whose patient toils in this direction cannot be too highly commended, when we consider the cost of womanly sensibility and of Christian feeling at which their inquiries must have been prosecuted. But we cannot wonder that Christian principle has urged them to undertake the unsavoury task of tracking the iniquity to which we refer through some of the most abominable manifestations of vice that could well be imagined. For Christ's sake such things have been suffered before, and for Christ's sake worse things may be endured. Because Christ's cause is the cause of man, his people have always led the van in endeavours to combat the crying evils of their time. They have never counted the cost.

It is, of course, well known to most thoughtful Christians that for some time a notion has been abroad in the minds of a section of our legislators, that we should improve upon God's government of the world by breaking the inevitable connection which He has established between the commission of sin and the suffering of its consequences. In those quarters there is an impression that it would make for the best interests of mankind if it could be made possible for young and old to sin with impunity. It is supposed that what is morally wrong can yet be politically right; and that the connection between sin and suffering can be dissolved without at the same time dissolving the foundations of public morality and social purity.

By heroic efforts, for ever associated with the name of Josephine Butler, this abominable attempt to improve upon God's moral government of the world was frustrated so far as the British Isles are concerned. Then came an attempt to establish the system in India, but there again, through the influence of Christian intrepidity and courage, the attempt was defeated, and Parliament decisively declared that no such iniquity should be permitted. It appears, however, from the investigations of Mrs. Andrews and Dr. Kate Bushnell, that although Indian officials have ostensibly complied with the injunctions of Parliament, yet under another name the same thing is being fostered in every cantonment where our English soldiery are located.

As young men, raw recruits fresh from England, land in India and join their regiments, they find that every facility is given for the perpetration of immorality; that those facilities are afforded under the sanction of commanding officers and others, who surely should be held responsible for the morals as well as for the soldierly bearing of their men. In fact, the young soldier finds that he is expected to break one at least of those Ten Commandments which in his home he was trained to reverence; he is taught that the evil in question is, in the eye of men at least, a "necessary" one, to be committed without blame or evil result. Further, he is taught that, for some reason, Hindu women occupy a different position from his own mother and sisters, and that they may be subjected to unutterable horrors, in order that licence may be given to his sin.

We need only state the case before the sacred tribunal of the Christian conscience, to extort a verdict of indignant repudiation. In many cases, those who read are even disposed to throw the paper down, almost offended that a subject bristling with such horrors should be introduced, to break the routine of their ordinary equanimity. But it is impossible that anyone who understands what has been written should persist in so dismissing the matter. We are members one of another. The entire English people is bound together by indissoluble ties, and no one part of the community can condone iniquity without inflicting some detriment upon every other part. In addition to this, each one of us is responsible for the use of that amount of influence with which God has endowed us; and the curse of Christ does not rest only upon those who use that influence amiss, but also upon those who refuse to use it at all. It is the servant who knows the better and does not do it—the Levite who leaves his brother man to welter in his blood—that comes beneath his severest censure.

What can be the effect on India, as it witnesses Britain's condonation of vice? What is the good of our trying to convince Hindus by our Zenana work that we sincerely desire to emancipate woman, when she is being degraded throughout the land? What must be the effect on our young soldiers, as men come home and spread the news that for some reason it is easier to sin in India than in England, and that indirectly our Government is lending its prestige to promote in India a vice which it condemns in England? And what, again, will be the effect in the presence of that God who has so evidently entrusted India to Great Britain for high and holy purposes?

What shall we, as part of the English nation, say to Him when the millions of India accuse us of having degraded them with opium;—with the widespread sale of strong liquor in order to increase our revenue at any cost of life to them;—and with having taught them the infamies of European vice? Let the Church of Christ at last awake; let her rise and lead the sentiment of the nation, which, thank God, is not yet wholly rotten, in a crusade that shall never stay its progress until every form in which this evil still lingers in our vast dominions, has been chased back to the darkness out of which it came.

MORMON EMISSARIES.—Writing from the far West, an American friend deplores the intolerable iniquities practised by the Mormons, who, while prevented at the present from openly "living their religion," are by no means inert or powerless for evil. He thinks Christians ought to be reminded that these Mormons have emissaries in England and Scotland bent resolutely on leading souls astray.

GRANGETOWN, NEAR MIDDLESBROUGH.—The Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists have started a united open-air mission after the Sunday evening's service, the different denominations in the village being invited to co-operate. Accordingly, on Sunday week, members of the Wesleyan, Primitives, Congregationalists, Brethren, and Salvation Army took part in a good meeting, and numbers listened to the Gospel. Prayer is asked that God's blessing may rest upon the work already begun.

THE CHURCHES AND FOREIGN MISSIONS.

BY REV. G. WAINWRIGHT.

We have lately celebrated, with considerable enthusiasm, and perhaps with some little pride, the Centenary of the Baptist Missionary Society. With devout thankfulness to God we have recognised in the pioneers of this movement God's gift to his Church a century ago. But in our gratitude for what is past we have not overlooked the pressing needs of the present. It would be a poor and unworthy thing to pay eloquent compliments to the virtues of our illustrious predecessors if we did not seek to repeat, in our own lives, what we profess to admire in them. The best compliment we can pay to the founder of our Mission, is to accept as a sacred trust the work which he commenced, and to do our utmost to perpetuate and extend it in our own day.

For we may be sure that William Carey would not regard the work of the century with entire satisfaction. Regret for what has been omitted would mingle with thanksgiving for what has been achieved. What he desired as the result of the century's work we know from his own words. "I often wonder," he wrote to Andrew Fuller, "what the state of the world will be a hundred years hence; think you, will the disciples of the Lord Jesus have carried the blessed Gospel to the ends of the earth?" This was the measure of his desire, even if he was not sanguine enough to hope for it. And in view of the fact that thirty years after the day of Pentecost, Paul could speak of the Gospel as having been preached to every creature under heaven (Col. i. 6, 23), would it not have been a reasonable thing to hope that the larger world known to us to-day would have been evangelised in a whole century?

DISPROPORTION.

Yet, let us acknowledge the fact, however humbling it may be, this has not been done. It checks every tendency to pride and self-satisfaction to be told that fully half the world remains unevangelised; that in India, China, and Africa, there are large districts, inhabited by millions of people, who have never seen the face of a Christian Missionary, or heard the music of the Name of Jesus; that if the Missionaries in these three countries were equally distributed among the people the proportion would be: In India, one Missionary to every 110,000 of the population; in Africa, one to every 140,000; and in China, one to every 270,000; that notwithstanding the multiplication of Missionary societies, the removal of barriers that were like granite walls in the way of Carey, the opening of countries that seemed absolutely impenetrable a century ago, we have yet not more than 7000 Protestant Missionaries in the whole of the Mission-field. Verily the time for self-congratulation is not yet!

These are the facts that confront us as the begins. They call for deep searchings of heart, and for prayerful inquiry into present methods of creating and sustaining, and expressing the Missionary spirit in our churches. To ignore them would be folly; to despair concerning them would be sin. For we remember that the same facts confront our Lord, whose we are, to whom this work belongs, whose heart goes out in love to every individual in the heathen world, and who dwells in the midst of his Church to meet by his infinite resources all the needs of men to-day. And there are not wanting signs that He is awakening his Church to a deeper interest, and is giving counsel as to the direction in which a forward movement may and must be made.

It is surely a sign of his working when several of his servants in different parts of the world, after prayerful study and observation of the facts, agree in saying that, in some form or other, the pressing need is that the Churches be brought into closer contact with the Missionaries. Dr. Pierson pleads for this in his inspiriting book on "The Crisis of Missions." Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, makes it the theme of an article in the Missionary Review; and writers in some of our most widely-read Christian papers have been giving the same counsel. It is surely not a mere accidental coincidence that so many voices should be saying practically the same thing.

At first sight the recommendation might seem to have little meaning. Let us endeavour to explain it. It means that the Churches should practically, and not in theory only, accept this work as their own; that each Church should regard itself, as God meant it to be, a Missionary Society; that Missionaries should be sent out, not as from a Society, but as from a Church; that the contributions of the Churches, instead of going into a common fund to be spent on Mission work in general, should, in part at least, be devoted to the support of their own Missionaries in the field; that Churches and Missionaries should be kept in living touch with each other, so that Missionary successes should be the Church's joy, and Missionary difficulties and trials and dangers should be the burden of the Church's prayers. In some such direction the longed-for revival must come.

"CHURCHES TO THE FRONT!"

is the call of an old Missionary in China; and we share with him his deliberate conviction, that if separate Churches would take up the work Missionaries would soon be multiplied a hundredfold.

But would not this plan set aside altogether the work of our Society? Our answer is, No; but it would alter and improve the relationship existing between the Society and the Churches. No one believes that the relationship existing at present is as perfect as could be desired. Beside the work of choosing and accepting the right men, selecting for them the right field of labour, sending them forth, supervising their work, and transmitting supplies, the Society has now to send down deputations to indolent Churches to stir up their flagging zeal and to secure support for the work which the Society undertakes. The officers of our Society will welcome a change from a condition of things in which the Society does the work with the help of the Churches, to one in which the Churches do the work by means of the Society. The habit which we deplore, and which we seek to remedy, is that which makes the Society a substitute, and relegates to that the responsibility and the work which

BELONG TO EVERY MEMBER OF THE CHURCH.

We repeat, "the responsibility and the work properly belong to to every member of the Church." For the Church, after the New Testament pattern, is not a social club in which can be realised the best kind of social fellowship; not an organisation for the mere amusement or even social elevation of the people; not a hospital, whose main work is to care for the spiritually sick; but it is a company of men who not only have life, but have it abundantly, and who are called of God for the purpose of making known his Gospel to the heathen. The will of God for the Church in any century is recorded in his Word. The commission given to the early Church is equally given to us to-day. To "make disciples of all nations"; to "preach the Gospel to every creature"; to be witnesses for Christ "unto the uttermost parts of the earth," is the very purpose for which the Church exists. Not to do this, is to be useless for the object for which we were intended. Other things we may do, but this we must do, or be guilty of disobedience and neglect. The obligation must be accepted, not only by every Church in the aggregate, but, by each Member in particular. How solemn a thing it would be if, having given a very partial obedience to this command, and chosen another work in which our success has won us great applause, much of our building should prove but "wood, hay, stubble," which the fire will utterly consume! Let us remember that on that day what our Lord will value and praise, is not success in that which He never required, but fidelity in that which He clearly commanded.

And let it not be forgotten, that it is only as we yield ourselves to this work that the presence and power of the Spirit can be fully known. More than once our Lord linked together the promise of the Spirit and the command to evangelise the world. "Ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you." Too often our reading of the text has stopped there, and when we have prayed to be filled with the Spirit we have wondered why the prayer has not been answered. The next clause would have corrected our mistake. "and ye shall be witnesses unto Me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth" (Acts i. 8). Do not separate

THE PROMISE FROM THE DUTY.

The Spirit of God is here upon a mission; only those who put themselves in line with Him, and who are willing to be used by Him in his work, can know what the fulness of the Spirit's presence and power really means.

But the practical question comes next, How shall we realise this ideal? We answer, Let every Church adopt some such system as that embodied in the Missionary Prayer Union. Seek to extend it until every member of the Church agrees to pray and to give daily for Missionary work. If no Missionary has been raised up among yourselves, apply to the Society to have one allotted to you. Let him visit you, and so become known to the Church; and let the Pastor, or someone appointed for the purpose, be in constant communication with him in the field; and let it be understood that while he goes down into the mine it is yours to "hold the ropes"; and every day, as the members pray for him, let them give according to their ability for his support. There is nothing impossible in such a scheme as that; nothing difficult or complicated in its working. It asks of the Members of our Churches nothing more than is involved in their professed allegiance to the Lord Jesus.

"But are not many too poor?" Possibly so; yet it may be found that many of those whom you consider poor will be the first to join such a union. And from others the excuse must not be accepted too readily. A small portion of what some men spend upon doubtful, if not positively harmful, luxuries; of what others spend in very empty and unsatisfying amusements; of what it costs others for useless adornments, would add very largely to the Missionary funds, and would soon multiply the number of workers in the field. Annual self-denial efforts are not the best, nor will they prove in the highest degree successful. Daily denial of self, prompted by a sense of loyalty to Christ, and of responsibility concerning his work, is not only more desirable but more easily within our reach.

that will result from the Churches' response to this urgent appeal are many. (1) How the Missionary spirit will grow! The fear that it would tend to limit interest to the field where our own Missionary was at work is a mistake. Many a man who had shown comparatively little interest in this work has found his interest spreading to the whole field when one of his own children has become a Missionary. Christians have been divided into three classes, "mission, anti-mission, and omission." The last two would soon become extinct if these "living links," as Dr. Pierson calls them, could be established between the Churches at home and the Missionaries in the field.

(2) How the spirit of Prayer for Missions would grow! There are some Churches in which (we speak it to their shame) the prayer-meeting is an obsolete institution; and there are many others in which it lacks life and earnestness and enthusiasm. Nothing would from decay and death more surely than the thought that there were some representing us in the Mission-field who are our own particular charge. Not only the physical dangers to which they are often exposed; not only the discouragements incident to their work amid such unfavourable surroundings; but the difficulty they must find in maintaining their own piety in a healthy and vigorous condition, would compel the Church to pray. The very life of prayer is a deeply felt need; and prayers are all the more in keeping with those of the Great Intercessor when the need that prompts them concerns others beside ourselves.

(3) The question of adequate support for the Missionaries would then be settled. We have no sympathy with those who, while living in comparative luxury themselves, would seek to reduce the amount for the support of the Missionaries to the lowest possible limit. It is possible so to cheapen Missions as to destroy their efficiency. While Christians at home have plenty and to spare, it is a sin which God will judge, if we leave his servants, who are our representatives, with barely enough for their support.

This is our Message to the Churches. Very earnestly we ask,

"WHAT SHALL BE THE RESPONSE?"

Our duty is clear—our Lord's command leaves us in no doubt about that. There is no lack either of men or of means to enable the Church to convey the message of life to the whole world in a very few years. The crisis of missions, in which, as Dr. Pierson says, "grand opportunity combines with great responsibility, the chance of glorious success and the risk of awful failure, confront each other"—that crisis is upon us now. And from whom, if not from us, may a worthy response to present needs be looked for? What will the world think of our rejoicing in the men that have been, if their names do not inspire us to similarly heroic service? Too long the world has smiled

To see us stir the martyr fires
Of long ago,
And wrap our satisfied desires
In the singed mantles that our sires
Have dropped below.

Oh, let the cross our worthies bore
On us be laid;
Profession's quiet sleep be o'er;
In action's earnest scale once more
Our faith be weighed.

Why ask for ease where all is pain?
Shall we alone
Be left to add our gain to gain,
When to the world's wide battle plain
God's heroes throng?

To suffer well is well to serve;
Stint not nor stay!
The years have never dropped their sand
On mortal issue vast and grand
As ours to-day.

Oh, small shall seem all sacrifice
And pain and loss,
When God shall wipe the weeping eyes,
For suffering give the victor's prize,
The Crown for Cross!

MODERATION AND WORLDLINESS.

In the principal "High Church" here in Cannes may now be seen a side oratory, with paintings and altar, specially set apart for the faithful to pray to the Virgin Mary! All day long the church is open, and deluded votaries prostrate themselves in this Jesuits' corner in adoration of the Blessed Virgin, supplicating her intercession, to the denial of the One Mediator.

From this so-called Church of England already has one able Jesuit, Father Rivington, who used to preach disguised Popery, slid into Rome, and there seems no other ultimatum for the deluded souls who attend this three-quarter-way house.

Gorgeous is now the millinery to tickle the fancy. So-called priests strut in the aisles, attired now with an alb, which was the shirt of the ancient Roman; when this shirt had ruffles it was called a dalmatica, and when the working man officiated he tucked up his sleeves. This shirt, or shirt with ruffles, was the first element of ecclesiastical vestments. The first who wore these things were the infamous Emperors Commodus and Heliogabalus. The surplice was this shirt drawn over the barbarian's dress of skin, and was formerly worn by clergy and laity indoors and out of doors. The rochet, or little coat, of the bishops is now worn in place of the surplice.

The toga, or pallium, otherwise the shawl or blanket, was formerly worn by both ecclesiastics and laity; it is now called the pall of the Archbishop, and confined to him. The cassock was brought into use by a Roman Emperor. The chasuble was an outdoor garment of the clergy until the ninth century, when it was first adopted as a vestment. It was the common overcoat of the wealthy. The cope was a waterproof worn in rainy weather. The chimere, now used by bishops, was formerly worn by ladies when riding on horseback. The mitre was the cap, or turban, worn by nobles in former days. It is now worn by peasant women in Russia, and by some bishops in Rome and England. The stole was formerly a handkerchief, used to wipe the face.

Dean Stanley says, "The surplice, from its position as a frock over the fur coat, came to be regarded as an emblem of imputed righteousness; the turban, or mitre, when divided by its crease, came to be regarded as the cloven tongue. The handkerchief with which the Roman gentry wiped their faces came to be regarded as wings of angels. The ponchos and waterproofs of the Roman peasants came to be regarded in the nineteenth century as emblems of sacrifice, priesthood, real presence, communion with the universal Church, Christian or ecclesiastical virtues."

Such is the nonsense now paraded in the "High Church" to attract the ignorant, and invest with a false sanctity the poor ritualist. They appeal to the worldliness of nominal Christians, and, alas! all these mummeries, instead of being denounced firmly by Evangelicals, are winked at under the dangerous plea of moderation. Let Evangelicals of every denomination withdraw from all worldly affinities, and denounce with all their energies the wretched Romanism which is eating into the vitals of true religion.

To-day has brought to a close the visit of Rev. Hubert Brooke, who for three weeks has delivered daily Bible-readings similar to those with which his name has for so many years been associated at Keswick. Mr. Moody's Bible Institute has thus become a scene of blessing to a very considerable number of residents and visitors, who, with the 250 male and female students, have combined to make a good large audience on every occasion. For one week Mr. Brooke was accompanied by Revs. Chas. Inwood and G. H. Macgregor in a series of meetings for the deepening of spiritual life. Since then he has had a place in the daily curriculum of the Institute, and his lectures have been full of instruction as well as interest.

The ordinary daily course for the students is as follows:—Breakfast, 7 a.m.; worship, 8; Bible lecture, 9; singing class, 10; Bible lecture, 11; dinner, 12.30. The afternoons are devoted to private study and recreation; supper, 5.30; worship, 6; and in the evening practical Gospel work in various forms in different parts of the city. The first Bible lecture is undertaken by some prominent Biblical expositor (of pronounced Evangelical views) for a period of a month or more at a time.

When I arrived here, early in May, a course of study of the Minor Prophets by Dr. R. F. Weidner (a teacher of some repute in Chicago) was just being completed. For the five weeks supervening Rev. Professor Moorehead, D.D., of Xenia, has presented an exceedingly useful series of lectures upon the Tabernacle and its offerings, together with doctrinal teaching appertaining to it in the Epistles to the Romans and the Hebrews. Some good solid foundation truth was elicited, which will prove of great value to those who heard it, in their practical apprehension and use of the cardinal doctrines of our Christian faith. Other professors alternate with these, while a large share of such work also falls to Rev. R. A. Torrey, D.D., the director of the Institute, who discourses in turn upon the "Biblical Doctrine," "Practical Christian Work," and "Studies in the Books of the Bible." In these three directions lies his special forte, and by what I hear from the students his lectures are of great intrinsic value.

In all of these the members of the Ladies' Department take an equal part, their daily routine being practically the same as that of the men. They occupy a separate building under the very genial and capable management of Mrs. Capron, who undertook the position in 1889 after thirty years of labour as a missionary in Southern India. She is a veritable mother in Israel, in the highest sense of the term, and all who come under her holy, kindly influence, treasure it up as a very blessed memory when the calls to work in many fields necessitate the divergence of their paths. She also conducts a weekly mothers' meeting attended by some hundreds of women, a vast number of whom can testify to the blessing God had wrought in their lives through her teaching.

I alluded in my last letter to the hiring of a huge building accommodating 10,000 persons for Mr. Moody's service last Sabbath afternoon. Considerable effort was obviously necessary to secure a full audience in view of the multitudinous worldly attractions rife in the city on Sunday and week-day alike. Accordingly twenty men visited the "back parts" of the city for several hours on the Saturday night and Sunday morning, distributing tickets of admission from house to house, in drinking and gambling saloons, brothels, and in the streets. On the whole, and especially considering the low type of places visited, a very favourable reception was accorded, and it was especially gratifying to find the unqualified respect in which the evangelist is held even by those whose business suffers at his hands. The individual testimonies to this were quite as forcible as the splendid muster of men of every class who throng every building in which he is announced to preach. Let this statement go forth in strongest refutation of the assertion that his own countrymen heed him not.

An amusing incident occurred during this district visitation. A saloon-keeper becoming enraged at the invasion of his premises for such a purpose, tore up all the tickets he could grab from the hands of his customers, and summoned a policeman to eject the perpetrator of the outrage. A burly form in blue promptly seized the offender who, however, by dint of some facetious remark raised a laugh at the officer's expense. This dispelled the solemnity of the occasion, and he followed up his advantage by asking the saloon-keeper whether, as he objected to his customers going to the meeting, he would not represent them by going himself. "Ah," he said, "you wouldn't welcome me if I did!" "Indeed we would," was the reply; "see, here's a special ticket" (writing a pass to reserved seat on a visiting-card). "Then I'll go," he responded, "that's a bet!" (Nor was it an idle boast; like a man, he kept his word.) Needless to add, the visitor was allowed to repeat his distribution among the customers, and the policeman, somewhat disappointed, resumed his beat alone. In another saloon the keeper, an irascible German, besought the visitor not to "make fool out of himself," which gave rise to a discussion between himself and his wife (who, standing behind the bar, had already accepted a ticket), during which the distribution was continued without further interruption.

As to the meeting itself, there was a splendid concourse of 8000 people, who listened with closest attention to an address longer in point of time than is Mr. Moody's wont; and although the hall did not afford facilities for an after-meeting, about 500 young men responded to an invitation to remain awhile at the close. Many of these proved to be strangers in the city, whom Mr. Moody invited to co-operate in or to attend the various services to be held during the summer for their own blessing and that of others. Such an audience as had assembled was the more remarkable, seeing that the evangelist had already addressed 4000 persons in a large theatre during the forenoon, and that, to say nothing of other attractions, the day was one of the few Sundays in which the Fair would be opened without disobeying the Federal Court, which, as I write, has just given its verdict against Sabbath opening.

The advent of Rev. John McNeill ten days ago has added a further extension to the work, into which he has entered with his accustomed vigour. An open door has not yet presented itself for the securing of a large building as a permanent daily centre of activity in the immediate vicinity of the Fair. In the meanwhile, therefore, various parts are being reached with the object of working towards the Fair, so that, by the time such a structure becomes available, the campaign will have become a well-known fact in all sections of the city.

As an item of more general news, an important event of the week has been the Temperance Congress, in which the drink evil has been considered by able men from medical, scientific, and practical Christian standpoints. I close with furnishing the names of those helpers from various parts of the world who, among others, are expected to assist in the work here during the summer:—

Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, Dr. T. C. Cuyler, Dr. A. J. Gordon, Prof. Moorehead, Prof. J. M. Stifler, Rev. B. Fay Mills, Rev. J. W. Chapman, Mr. Geo. D. McKay, Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea, Dr. Wharton, Mr. Merton Smith, Major Whittle, Mr. Frank T. Pierson. For singing, Mr. Sankey, Mr. Stebbins, Mr. John H. Burke, Prof. Towner, Mrs. F. T. Pierson, the Oberlin Quartette and Quartettes from the Institute. From across the sea, Messrs. Charles Inglis and Henry Varley (London); Rev. John McNeill, Dr. John Riddell, Dr. John Robertson, and Mr. John M. Scroggie (Glasgow); Rev. Geo. H. C. MacGregor (Aberdeen); Rev. Hubert Brooke (Reading); Rev. Charles Inwood (Ireland); Dr. J. Pindor (Silesia, Austria), Dr. Theo. Monod (Paris); Dr. Stöcker (Berlin).

FOR ALL OUR CHILDREN, nothing can take the place of loving, faithful, and earnest teaching at the mother's knee; and to bring this about there must be true religion in the mother's heart.—Rev. S. A. Donaldson, M.A.

MISSION TO PLATELAYERS: MIDLAND RAILWAY.—Miss Murray MacGregor writes from 18, Millfield, Folkestone:—"I desire to bring before readers of The Christian the urgent need of helpers. While our Mission aims at no less a task than that of supplying all the permanent way men with monthly packets of Gospel papers, we have a special interest in the platelayer. These men thoroughly appreciate the monthly packets of papers with which our Mission supplies them, and many who have asked for them are at present unsupplied through lack of helpers. One valued worker who used to send papers to thirty men has now left England. I should be glad to send copies of the report to any who may wish to make themselves acquainted with the work of our Mission."

Key Words of the Inner Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., Christ Church.

THE FATHER'S WEALTH.

The Epistle to the Ephesians is full of the wealth of God's nature. It is set to that master-chord struck centuries before by a temple minstrel, "Thou Lord art good, and ready to forgive, and plenteous in mercy unto all those that call upon Thee." The Apostle struggles with the inadequacy of human language in his attempt to convey some conception of what God is willing to expend upon the heirs of salvation.

We are all familiar with God's prodigality in Nature. Every common hedgerow with its wealth of vegetation; every lazy trout-stream, where the fish lie in the cool depths and the flowers dip down their dainty cups; every square foot of the midnight sky, set thick with rare jewels, attests the unsearchable resources of his power. But these are for all the world to see. And as the man of wealth opens richer stores to those that share his love than he displays to the casual visitor, so God has prepared for those that love Him, things which eye hath not seen, or ear heard, or the heart of man conceived. There are riches of grace in the heart of God, of forgiveness, and pitifulness, and mercy, of which the foremost of the saints in the heavenly ranks, and the chief of sinners on earth, however heavily they have drawn on them, know comparatively nothing. We have no standard for computing infinity, and infinity is the orbit in which God lives and loves. This is what the Apostle means when he speaks of the riches of God's grace.

Eph. i. 7. Our trespasses are forgiven according to the riches of God's grace.—Trespass is the term used by our Lord of the negligences, sins, and ignorances, which mark the lives even of those who can look up into God's face and say, Our Father. The conjunctive and which links the prayer for forgiveness with the petition for daily bread, suggests that we need to plead for the one as often as we ask for the other. And our Father instantly and freely forgives us according to the riches of his grace. He is only too ready to forgive. He yearns over the wayward and stubborn, who keep their faces averted from his. He sorrows for their sin, but sorrows most of all that they will not take the only position in which his tender, forgiving grace can come to them.

As the hungry sea frets down the line of cliff to find an aperture through which to pour itself, and seethes and sobs until it find room; so does the love of God wait impatiently outside our hearts till we open to it in confession and repentance. Then God forgives, not meagrely or stintingly, but royally, gracefully, abundantly. His forgiveness is worthy of Himself, proportioned to the wealth of his glorious being, and according to the riches of his grace. He does more than forgive, He remembers no more. He does more than forget, He sets the joy-bells ringing and cries, Let us make merry. He does more than this, He insets the scars of our sins with jewels, and all because of the Blood that has set free this wealth of mercy.

Eph. i. 18. God indwells us with the riches of his glory. His inheritance in the saints is not what they have in God, but what God has in them. "The Lord is the portion of my soul" is one side of the truth; but "the Lord's portion is his people, Jacob is the lot of his inheritance" is the other, and is equally important. We settle on the nature of God as our estate, living on its abundant crop, and mining for its hidden treasures; and God comes into possession of us, as a man might of an estate which had lain for long years exhausted and barren.

Ah, what gladness sings through the deserted acres when the tidings fly from hedge to hedge and from field to field, as though the birds carried them, that one has come into possession who is well able to pour in tons of enriching soil, and to continue doing so for long years, if need be, until corn replaces weeds, fir-trees thorns, and myrtle-trees briars. It may be that some soul, reading these lines, is sick at heart, and cries, I am that barren thorn-cursed soil. Nevertheless, lift up thy head and rejoice, for the Lord has come in to dwell, never to depart, and He will do great things. He will create all that He commands. He will put in what He calls out. He will pour into thee wealth on wealth, as though a millionaire should put ten fortunes into an unproductive mine. He will make thee know the riches of the glory of his indwelling in the heart, and He will not forsake thee until the revenues of thy life begin to repay Him in love and adoration.

Eph. ii. 4–8. We are monuments of God's wealth.—That He could love us when we were dead, like Lazarus, in trespasses and sins; that He has linked us in the bonds of indissoluble union with his Son; that He has made it possible for us to share his Resurrection, his Triumph, and his Throne; that we, the poor children of earth and sin, should be admitted into the inner circle of Deity—this will be, to all eternity, the mightiest proof of the exceeding riches of his grace.

The word "exceeding" might be rendered "beyond throwing distance." Fling your thoughts forward as far as you can, and there will always be an immense beyond: throw them as high as you may, till they outsoar the stars, and there will always be an above: let them sink for ever and there will always be a beneath: in the exceeding riches of God's grace.

The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork, but the glory of the position and character of the saints, contrasted with the degradation from which they were raised, will be accounted in all ages the unparalleled exemplification of the riches of Divine grace.

Eph. iii. 8. God's wealth is for all.—The special note of this Epistle, and of that to the Colossians, is Paul's desire to express his conviction of the universality of God's bounty. It is not for Jews only, but for Gentiles. His commission was to preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ. The mine is inexhaustible, in it are the precious things of heaven above, and of the depth beneath, of the fruits of the sun, of the fulness of the earth, of the abundance of the seas, and of the hidden treasures of the sand; and it is all for us.

Eph. iii. 16. Our strength may be in proportion to our Father's wealth. Who is there of us all that does not long for strength, whether to suffer or to do? The sapling says, Let me be strong to bear the harvest of the rich autumn fruit. The child says, Let me be strong that I may help mother carry her burdens, and do her work. The invalid says, Let me be strong that I may tread again the heather, and roam the woods, and carry light into darkened homes. Let me be strong, the Christian cries, that I may not faint or be weary, that I may launch the Master's boat, and that I may gather in the golden sheaves. Who would not wish to be strong for his sake, who speaks as a Lamb from the Throne?

The strength of God awaits us, through his Spirit pouring into the inward man. Strange that the invisible power of the Spirit should make souls strong, as the nibbled grass of the upland lawns builds itself into the branching antlers of the stag. Yet, so it may be. Wave after wave of power from the Holy Ghost waits to enter the receptive spirit, until it becomes strengthened according to the riches of the glory of God. Reader, I implore you, in moments of weakness and discouragement, to appropriate that strength in that measure.

A CHILD'S CREED is the shortest, the most comprehensive, and perhaps the most sincere. It is comprised in one word—Mother.

THE ROYAL WEDDING.

God bless our Prince, we pray,
On this his nuptial day,
Upon him smile;
Him in our hearts we bear,
Make him thy special care,
Hear thou a nation's prayer,
Upon him smile.

Bless, too, our Princess dear,
Joined to our Edward's heir,
Our Princess bless;
Standing so near the throne,
Seal her in truth thine own,
Loving and loved alone,
Our Princess bless.

Smile on our gracious Queen,
Thou, who so long hast been
Her guard and stay;
Still strengthened from above,
Sure in her people's love,
May she thy blessing prove,
Strength as her day.

Hear from thy throne on high,
Our swelling notes of joy,
O, bless us all;
Dry up each mourner's tear,
Unite us in thy fear—
Queen, Prince, and Princess, dear,
God bless us all.

Newport, I.W. Albert Midlane.

Now, Lord of lords, to Thee
Bring we a nation's plea
Breathed far and wide;
With Heav'nly gifts endow
Those who with solemn vow
In sacred union bow,— Bridegroom and Bride.

Heirs of our Royal race,
For them thy bounteous grace
Seek we to-day:
On them thy blessings shower
In joy, in sorrow's hour,
Save by thy mighty pow'r,
Our God, we pray.

Steadfast in love and truth,
Keep Thou their radiant youth,
Guardian and Friend!
Strong for their Fatherland,
Grant them still, hand in hand,
Faithful for Thee to stand
On to the end.

Bless from thy throne above
Those who with parent love
Joyful are seen;
Bless, on to endless days,
Her for whom Thee we praise;
Hear while our prayer we raise—
God save the Queen!

And when the King of kings—
Life-healing in his wings—
Earth shall adore!
When, with angelic train,
Lord, Thou shalt come again,
Grant them with Thee to reign—
Thine evermore!

SPITE OF WHAT THE SCOFFERS SAY, the religion of Jesus Christ has done and can do more for the children of the slums than anything else. But—alas for the supineness of Christians!—the poor neglected 'human weeds" of the cities continue to suffer vicariously for the sins of others.—Dr. Barnardo.

THE MATAMOROS MEMORIAL HALL, MALAGA.—Our readers will be glad to know that this hall is now about finished, the greater part of the funds having been furnished by two devoted Christian ladies who wished to show their respect for the martyr and his country. Gas, water, and seating will require a further outlay of over £50.

THE ROYAL WEDDING.—We are requested to state that a plan is on foot for presenting a Bible to H.S.H. the Princess Victoria Mary on her marriage from members of the Y.W.C.A. and any other women of the United Kingdom. Subscriptions may range from 1d. to 5s. Collecting papers may be had from the Hon. Louisa Kinnaird, 115, Mount-street, London, W., or Hon. Kathleen Ward, Castle Ward, Ireland.

For the Young.

A STORY OF A SOLDIER BOY.

By William Luff.

"Can I be a Christian?" said a little bugler.

The question was asked, after a Sunday evening service at the Soldiers' Home, Winchester, and was answered by Miss Perks, who guides the Mission.

"Why do you want to be a Christian?"

"To be like this soldier," replied the boy, pointing to the man who had brought him to the "Home;" and who was "this soldier?"

He had been invited to a tea some time before, but being of an independent mind had not come until after tea, lest comrades should say he came for what he could get. Hymn 93 in "Sankey" was sung, and the words impressed him:—

Oh, how sweet when we mingle with kindred spirits here,
And tell of Jesus and his love!
When by faith we can see Him, and feel his presence near,
And lift our longing souls above.

He became an eager listener, and then an earnest inquirer, and, though infidel notices had somewhat disturbed his mind, "this soldier" was, bit by bit, convinced that the truth of Jesus dying for sinners was real; and if so, it claimed all his devotion, heart, mind, body, time and talent. He felt

Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were an offering far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my life, my soul, my all.

And for two years in the barrack-room he sought to live this song of consecration.

Being marked for his steadiness, the new bugler had been placed under his special care, and his life had so impressed the boy, that he wanted to be like "this soldier."

Miss Perks prayed with him, and told him he was just the one Jesus died for: so, on his knees, he gave himself over to Jesus to be saved and kept. A little while after, he was seen to be crying.

"You are not sorry you have trusted Jesus and become his soldier, are you?" asked the lady.

"No! oh, no!" he replied, "but it's the boots and belts I was thinking of."

He had heard of wicked cowards throwing such things at comrades who had the courage to kneel by their beds, and he was afraid.

An old artilleryman was there, and, putting his arm round the little chap, he said:

"All right, chummy, don't you fear; I've had them, but I didn't mind the boots and belts; what I was most afraid of was the spurs."

"And what did you do?" said the young convert, looking up through his tears.

"I used to ask Jesus not to let them stick."

"And didn't they?"

"No, never."

Brightened by these words, and with Jesus as his Protector, the dear lad went forth to face the foe. On Monday he appeared at the Home unwounded: more than this, he had captured a prisoner.

"Did any boots come?" asked Miss Perks.

"No, not one." He then introduced his prisoner.

"It's all through the boy, miss, that I have come. I am corporal in his room, and years ago I promised my mother not to neglect prayer; but I did neglect it, and when I saw him come in and kneel last night, it fairly shamed me, and I told the fellows the first one who threw a boot at him I would report."

"That was kind of you," said Miss Perks; "and now you had better start, as he has done, and write home to your mother, telling her the news." He came to Jesus, and he and the bugler were henceforth fast friends. Soon they brought two more, and altogether fifteen came down to the Home, and to Jesus also, it is hoped: thus, through one boy, a great work for God was done in that room.

In process of time he went with his regiment to India, and last spring an officer called, who said he was going on as he had begun.

The first soldier, who brought the lad, has left the Army and is now a lamp inspector at a mine; but he still believes Jesus deserves all, so he has started what he calls "A Little Soldiers' Home," where he has three hundred children, besides meetings for grown-up people. I have copied part of a letter he wrote:

"You want to hear about my work. Well, in the first place, I am twelve hours a day at the colliery. All the spare time that I have is taken up with music, singing, visiting the sick and dying, and with Bible study and teaching the young sometimes on week nights, and I have a class of over forty young men and women every Sunday morning. . . . . I endeavour, by the grace of God, to live a pure and holy life, and to teach the plain simple Gospel."

In addition, "this soldier" has such sweet memories of the old spot where he was saved that every month he sends a subscription. One year Miss Perks received £6 10s. from him. What a pity others besides the bugler do not want to be "like this soldier"!

"THE GOLDEN CLEW."

In the extract from this work, given in our issue of June 1 under the heading "The Love that is Greatest of All," we inadvertently omitted to state the names of the author and publishers of the book. The author is Mrs. Crosfield, and the publishers are Messrs. West, Newman & Co., 54, Hatton Garden, E.C. We much regret the omission, and repeat our hearty commendation of the book given in a later issue.

MR. JOSIAH SPIERS has had a Mission to young people at Portmadoc with very decided blessing. The evangelist is greatly improved in health.

A VOICE FROM THE FEVER WARD.

Not often do we hear a voice from the fever ward of a hospital, and yet messages there are of import to be delivered from within its walls. Having recently left one of these institutions, with great thankfulness for kind and efficient medical attendance and nursing received while there, I feel led to put in a plea that fever patients of the wealthier classes should more generally avail themselves of the advantages afforded by removal to these wards.

Such a course is the best means practical, as yet, of preventing the spread of infection, and of avoiding the great inconveniences and trouble suffered by other members of the family in having the house looked upon as a plague spot, and themselves as unfitted for mixing with others in social and business life. Superior nursing is thus secured, firmer and wiser treatment administered, there are found greater facilities for immediately obtaining medical advice and necessary appliances, also a great saving of expense is ensured.

In some cases, at least, a greater interest might be displayed in these rather melancholy institutions by the Christian public. Naturally enough, they are avoided and unvisited except by devoted pastors and relatives. Being "centres of contagion," all superfluities in the way of decoration or luxury are wisely avoided, consequently there is a painful and exclusively sanitary look about the interior.

In sending flowers, texts, letters, &c., to hospitals, the Lord's people might remember the special needs of the fever wards, which, being generally in the background of the buildings, are too often in the background of the memory. The nurses there deserve kindly sympathy, and if Christians had the mind of Christ in this matter there would not be the painful isolation and neglect experienced in some cases.

One honoured servant of the Lord, for eleven years staff nurse in these wards, complained justly of the total neglect of her minister and fellow-members of her congregation (the latter never visit her except to ask for her contribution to the funds of the church), of being uninvited to social gatherings of the congregation, and of being avoided when she attended Divine service. Christian friends also seemed to excuse themselves from offering her hospitality, on the ground of laying themselves open to infection, a contingency which is conscientiously avoided by carrying out the rules for washing and changing of clothes, preparatory to leaving the wards when "off duty." Surely we have "not so learned the Christ" who put forth His hand and "touched" the leper. E.

HIS SECOND COMING.

In the New Testament, this event, which is yet future, is as much a part of the Gospel as the first coming of Christ, which is past. The Christian is one who looks back to the death of Christ, as the occasion when his sin was put away; who looks up to the High Priesthood of Christ, who lives to make intercession for him; and who looks forward to the second appearing of Christ as the time when he will be glorified with Him. Read carefully Heb. ix. 24, 28, and see how these three appearings of Christ are put together.

The promise of the second coming was given by Jesus Himself, first to his disciples (John xiv. 3), and then in a very solemn manner before the wicked high priest Caiaphas (Matt. xxvi. 64). It was repeated by the angels, when the apostles were looking up after their ascended Lord (Acts i. 2). And it is further declared in the Epistles so often, that it is impossible to quote the passages. Have you looked through the New Testament for its teaching upon this theme? Do so now; and you will discover, not only how much is said about it, but how very important and practical a truth it is. It is impossible to be indifferent to it without suffering loss.

In this brief paper there is not space for more than a mere summary of what Scripture teaches, and of the lessons connected with it.

It is certain, first, that we are to expect a literal and personal coming. The language is incapable of any other interpretation. The angels emphasise this fact in the words "This same Jesus." Paul does the same when he says, "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven" (1 Thess. iv. 16); John makes it clear when he promises that "we shall see Him as He is" (1 John iii. 2). The Old Testament predictions concerning the first coming have been fulfilled to the letter. The time, and manner, and place of his birth, his appearance before men, the mode of his entering into Jerusalem, the miracles He would perform, the death He would meet, all were foretold exactly as they were afterwards fulfilled. Equally literal will be the fulfilment of all that relates to his second coming. Say it to yourself:—The very same Jesus who was crucified, and who has been absent from the world in the body for eighteen centuries, is coming again.

Next, his coming will be sudden and unexpected. This is made clear by such statements as Mark xiii. 32-37. Any attempt to fix definite days, in face of such words, appears like blasphemy. Perpetual watchfulness would be impossible if the date were accurately known. All calculations are likely to be at fault upon this matter. Just when, according to our judgment, it seems most unlikely, then it may take place. Do you think it may interrupt your reading of this message? You think not? Then remember, "In such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh" (Matt. xxiv. 44).

What important results will be effected by it! The first result is the resurrection of the dead in Christ, and the change of the living saints (1 Thess. iv. 13-18). These are the words with which Paul would comfort the bereaved. Who knows? You and I may be among the number of those who shall not have to die. The judgment of believers according to their works is connected with this event. Not that the question of their being saved or lost is to be decided then. That is decided already for everyone who believes in Christ (John v. 24). But their service may be either like wood, hay, and stubble, fit only for burning; or like gold, and silver, and precious stones, able to stand the test of the fire (1 Cor. iii. 12, 15). That day is to decide for us the question of reward or of loss. Is it not a solemn and important event? The return to the earth with the saints follows upon this. (See Zech. xiv. 4; Jude 14, 15). With that event the new era for this earth begins. When the King is accepted to reign we share the reign with Him.

Cherish this hope. Live each day in view of the possibility of your Lord's return that day. Watch for his appearing, not with the dread which his foes may well feel, but as you watch for the return of your father after his long absence from home. Should you not long to see One whom you love, and who so loves you? Let the prospect lead you to self-denial (Col. iii. 4, 5), to "purify yourself as He is pure" (1 John iii. 3); to continual abiding in Him that you "may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at his coming" (1 John ii. 28).

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, JUNE 25.—ESTHER VI.

THOUGH the name of God does not occur in this book, we are again reminded of the way in which He works for his own, standing in the shadow. The very sleeplessness of the monarch is a link in the chain of providence, and all things are made to work together for the people whom He loved. The prayers of Esther for her people were not forgotten before God, but were had in constant remembrance; and though it might have seemed to them that the answer tarried, yet God was working in the darkness of the night, and in the inner chamber of the palace. Though the answer tarry, wait for it. Sure as the morning, it will break upon the eyes of those who have learnt from God the secret of patience.

It is helpful to see how ineffectual the enemy's attempts are. Satan plots his worst, and meditates our dishonour and destruction, but God turns his evil designs against himself, and takes him in the net that he had laid. The devil brought Christ to the cross by the wicked hands through which He was crucified and slain, but the death of the cross has annulled him that had the power of death, and has delivered those who were all their lifetime subject to bondage. And the same result will accrue in the smallest spheres of our lives. We most of us have a Haman, but we have no cause to fear if we are resting in the protection of our God, No weapon that is formed against us can prosper, and every condemning tongue shall be condemned. "Fret not thyself because of evil-doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity." In the exaltation of Mordecai there is a prediction of the ultimate glory of the saints and the reinstatement of the Jews.

MONDAY, JUNE 26.—ESTHER VII.

If the King was able to make so large a promise to Esther, pledging its performance, though it taxed half the resources of his kingdom, what will not God do for those whom He loves even as He loves his Son? Oh suppliant, understand that He can hold nothing back from thee, which it is fit for thee to have, or which it will not hurt thee to receive. Not to half a kingdom, but to the whole of the resources of God, thy prayer will be granted. He is rich in mercy to all that call upon Him. He will fulfil the desire of them that fear Him. He also will hear their cry, and will save them.

When we plead for our life we are asking for that which is guaranteed by the death of Christ. Esther pleaded against the arbitrary decree of a deceived king. We plead in the line of the purposes of God. Indeed, there is no need for us to plead as though God were unwilling to bestow. It is for us to take. "Let him take the water of life freely."

Haman's fate may reassure any who shall read these lines, and who dread because of the fury of the oppressor. Only trust in God. While he plots against thee, and gnashes upon thee with his teeth, the Lord laughs at him. And when he draws out his sword, and bends his bow, the former enters into his own heart, and the latter is snapped in twain. God takes delight in thy way. Thy goings are established by Him. He shall be thy salvation, and thy stronghold in the day of trouble.

TUESDAY, JUNE 27.—ESTHER VIII.

When the King gave his ring to Mordecai, he empowered him to act in the King's name; and there is a sense in which those who abide in Christ receive a warrant to act in his name. They come to Christ for crumbs, and He puts the key of his granary into their hands, and bids them help themselves. They cry for life, and lo, He makes them co-heirs with Him, of the infinite resources of God.

They who, like Esther, have the right of entrance to the King, should use it on the behalf of others. It was little enough for Esther to escape from death; her tears flowed freely, and her voice pleaded with the pathos which love and heroism can alone inspire, for her nation, her people, her kindred. How swift the posts sped, but not swifter than that woman's thoughts, to all the one hundred and twenty and seven provinces which stretched from India to Ethiopia. See how the purposes of God work themselves out through men. Their schemes and plans, and resistance, and counter-plotting, are made to subserve the decree of the Court of Heaven.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28.—ESTHER IX.

When a man's ways please the Lord, his former enemies are inclined to help him. And so those that did the King's business helped the Jews. God can send us help from very unexpected quarters; and if there are no men to be his agents, then angels minister. There was little of the vindictive on the part of the Jews. They stood for their lives, but they took not of the spoil of their foes. The ten sons of Haman were hung on the gallows at Esther's request; thus consciously or unconsciously she was carrying out God's declaration that He would blot out Amalek from under heaven.

Who shall tell of the joy that filled hearts and homes as the Jewish people realised how completely God had turned their sorrow into gladness and their mourning into a good day? And even until now the Feast of Purim brings back to mind the gladness of that great deliverance. Do we sufficiently rejoice in a yet greater deliverance, by which our night has been turned into daylight? But supposing that the Jews had forgotten their benefactress, or supposing that she had purchased their liberty by her blood, and that then they had forgotten her, how stern would have been the verdict of history against them, as wanting in the elements of gratitude! But, alas! we are liable to that condemnation, who have failed to estimate at its true worth and to reciprocate with sufficient gratitude the blood and tears and soul-travail by which we have been redeemed.

THURSDAY, JUNE 29.—ESTHER X.

The Word of God takes no note of the other great deeds of Mordecai's life, though it devotes pages to his interposition on behalf of the Jews, teaching us that much which the world esteems so highly excites no remark in Heaven, whilst those things which the world does not think worth chronicling, deeds of love and mercy to the suffering people of God, are written in the book of the Chronicles of the New Jerusalem.

Let us seek to imitate Mordecai in the two objects which he pursued with undeviating devotion during the remainder of his life. Let us promote the good of our people, and speak peace to our household. Let us judge and put away anything which is inconsistent with the good of another, or which scatters on the breeze the thistledown of maledictions, rather than the perfume of blessing.

Beneath this Eastern story opened eyes have seen a deeper meaning—the King, the Adversary, the Redeemer, the Redeemed.

FRIDAY, JUNE 30.—JOB I.

Let heads of households imitate Job in offering intercessory prayer on their behalf. There seems to be a kind of solidarity of family life before God. No one can sin, or suffer, or be glad, without affecting the life of the rest.

God is pleased with upright men, who fear Him, and eschew evil. He considers them with complacency, beholding them in Christ. Satan considers them with malevolence, imputing wrong motives to them. The point of Satan's remark was that Job's goodness was a species of refined selfishness, and that he was what he was, simply because it paid him well to be good. Strip him of his possessions, and you will cause him to curse. It is devilish to impute sordid motives for noble acts.

How does Job condemn many a Christian, in daring to bless God equally when He took as when He gave. We think God good when all goes well with us. He is not less good when messenger after messenger brings news of disaster.

SATURDAY, JULY 1.—JOB II.

Satan goes to and fro in the earth, as Peter says, like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour. How little we realise that we are being eagerly considered by envious eyes that watch our every movement, our every thought. And we are also being watched by the principalities and powers in heavenly places, to whom God would make known through us what his Spirit is capable of producing on the lives of his children. It is only through the experiences of his saints that God can show what his grace can do, because it is only his grace that can make a man gentle and resigned amid such trial as had befallen Job.

With Satanic ingenuity Satan again insinuates that Job's patience had sprung from pure selfishness, that he had been willing to pay it as the price for his life. Let him once feel the pressure of God's hand on his body, and nothing would stay him from breaking out into reviling. It is important to notice that throughout this prolonged trial Satan acknowledges that he has no power against God's servants unless it be given him from above. Permission must be sought and obtained before he can lay his evil hand upon him. Learn, O Christian, that evil has no power against thee so long as thou art abiding in the Son of God. The Only-begotten of the Father keepeth thee, and that wicked one toucheth thee not. His hope is by alluring thee from the safe refuge.

His wife added her taunts to his sufferings, and challenged him to renounce God. But he was too firmly entrenched in his faith to be moved. What seemed evil was no less good than what seemed good.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

JULY 2.

PAUL CALLED TO EUROPE. Acts. xvi. 6—15.

GOLDEN TEXT, Matt. xxviii. 19.

THIS second missionary journey commenced with an apparently unfortunate contention between Paul and Barnabas (xv. 38-41). The apostles were men, and therefore liable to difference of judgment. Yet they seem to have parted as friends, as Paul's references to Barnabas and to Mark clearly prove (1 Cor. ix. 6; 2 Tim. iv. 11). God overruled the event to the sending forth of two companies of missionaries instead of one. Silas, who accompanied Paul, had been a prophet in the Church at Jerusalem, and had returned with Paul and Barnabas to Antioch (xv. 22, 32, 34). The journey commenced A.D. 51, while Claudius was Roman Emperor, and Cumanus was Governor of Judea, soon to be succeeded by Felix. Timothy, evidently a convert of Paul during his first journey, made one of the company (1-3).

The story of their journeyings through the midland districts of Asia Minor is very brief, and introduces many places, whose exact geographical limits cannot now be determined. What is important in this narrative is the manner in which God guided his servants (6-9). The Holy Ghost evidently told them when and where to be silent, as well as when and where to speak. For "the Spirit of Jesus" (7, R.V.), is evidently the same as "the Holy Ghost" (6). The restraints as well as the impulses of the Holy Ghost are to be heeded by the servants of God. These restraints were given either by the closing up o ithe way Paul had determined to take, or by some direct message to his own spirit. Their journey was not so barren as this brief record would lead us to suppose. A very interesting and blessed incident that occurred was an illness which the Apostle suffered, which detained them in Galatia, and by which he was led to form the churches there (Gal. iv. 13—15). Sickness is the servant of God, and is overruled for his glory. Led by the Spirit they came to Troas (8), on the coast of the Ægean Sea. The people among whom Paul supposed he was to labour were behind him, the open sea is before him, what can be the meaning of such strange leading as this? Would he not ask for light? God gave it that night by a vision—not a dream, but by an appearance of a man whom Paul recognised, either by his speech, or his dress, or both, as belonging to Macedonia (9). The purpose of God's strange leading is known now. Learn that if God thwarts our purpose it is only that he may substitute a better.

We cannot read the story of the journey from Troas to Macedonia without recalling, with deep interest, that the apostles had been thus miraculously directed to our own continent of Europe. With this journey the evangelisation of Europe begins. Luke evidently forms one of the company—the pronoun "we," and the more detailed story that begins here (10), prove this. Probably the recent illness of Paul in Galatia had led him to value the services of "the beloved Physician," and at Troas he attached Luke to himself. Macedonia is on the opposite side of the Ægean Sea, and more than a hundred miles from Troas. The island of Samothracia is north-west of Troas. Neapolis was the seaport of Philippi, and is supposed to be identical with the modern Kavalla. Macedonia was founded by Philip of Macedon and his son Alexander, and was afterwards taken from Perseus by the Romans. Philip also built the city of Philippi, the site of which is now occupied by a small village named Filiba. "Chief city" should be rather the first which the Apostles reached (12 R.V.). Thessalonica was the chief city of Macedonia.

The first convert in Europe (13-15). The Apostles did not murmur at the comparatively modest commencement of their work. Their only opportunity seemed to be that of quietly speaking to the few devout Jews and proselytes who gathered on the banks of the little river that flowed by the city. Lydia belonged to Thyatira, a city of Asia Minor, and famous for its purple dye, procured from a shell fish; and for its purple fabrics. It was one of the cities of that region in which the Apostles had not been allowed to preach. It is not an improbable conjecture that Lydia, converted in Europe, was instrumental in forming the church in Thyatira on her return home. She was evidently a Jewish proselyte, and the same spirit which led her to forsake idolatry for the Jewish faith, made her ready also to receive further light when the Apostles gave it. Her conversion appears to have been an exceedingly quiet one, and stands in significant contrast to that of the jailor. God opened the heart—this is always a Divine work. The evidence of her conversion appears at once in her baptism, and her readiness to show hospitality to the Apostles. The story of her conversion has been described as an open heart; an open mind; an open mouth; an open hand; and an open house.

TOTTENHAM DEACONESSES.

The Deaconesses' Institution and Hospital at Tottenham, under the direction of the veteran Dr. Laseron, its founder, is the centre of a remarkably good and extensive work of the highest order. Here is not only a training-ground for young ladies who desire to give up their lives to work for God among the sick and the poor, but a large hospital almost constantly full of patients, who are nursed by the sisters in residence, while the Hospital is also the centre of quite a network of Christian agencies of all kinds for the benefit of the people in the immediate neighbourhood.

The number of sisters at present in residence at Tottenham is forty-five, while there are also thirty-two working under the auspices of the Institution at various "out-stations," being distributed thus:—In Cork, two; Dublin, five; Sunderland, twelve; Scarborough, three; Woodford, two; and in Jerusalem, Sierra Leone, Jaffa, Newcastle, Rochdale, Farnley (near Leeds), Victoria Docks, and Edmonton, one each. The number of patients who have been attended by these sisters during the year just ended was nearly 17,000; in every case the sisters embrace every opportunity of speaking of the love of God and the power of the Great Physician to give new life in the soul.

The annual meeting was recently held. Mr. John Cory, presiding, said that while the present institution had been carried on for twenty-six years, he had known it during twenty years of that time, and he had admired it all through. The work was commenced thirty-two years ago in a little ragged school at Edmonton, and it had continued to increase until it had reached its present splendid proportions. He felt sure if it were more widely known it would receive help from the public. No one (he said) could pay a visit to the hospital without being struck with the splendidly efficient arrangements. One of the most striking features of the institution was the essentially Christian character of the work carried on by the sisters. Mr. Theodore Howard testified that the institution had actually been the very gate of Heaven to hundreds of people. Mr. R. C. Morgan remarked that Dr. Laseron might be taken as a splendid example of the term "bringing forth fruit in his old age." It was the duty of Christians interested in the extension of the Kingdom of God to support such a work. Rev. W. H. Harwood, of Union Chapel, Islington, bore hearty testimony to the good work the sisters are doing in Sunderland, where he formerly laboured. Rev. H. T. Smart, a local Wesleyan minister, added similar testimony as to the work in the district.

After Rev. J. B. Barraclough, Rev. David Fotheringham, and Mr. Eliot Howard had spoken on behalf of the work, Dr. Laseron expresse his hearty thanks to the several medicalmen attached to the Hospital, all of whom give their services free. While it was true that the sisters carried on a spiritual work and nursed the patients, if it were not for the devotion of the medical staff the institution could not possibly hold the position it does. Speaking on behalf of the sisters, he asked if there was not anyone who would give a villa or a cottage as a home for the sisters after they were unable to work any longer? An earnest appeal was also made to those young ladies who, endowed with good health, and still at leisure, are anxious to show their real gratitude for the love of God extended to them. To such, a special invitation is given to come and offer themselves for work in connection with this Institution.

WORDS OF PRAISE are almost as necessary to warm a child into a genial life as acts of kindness and affection. Judicious praise is to children what the sun is to flowers.

THERE ARE STILL SOME who seem to think that the plastic nature of the child must first be hardened into stone, petrified into enmity against God, and alienated from all duty; and then when it has drifted down among the "dangerous classes," it may become a candidate for Christian character, and be saved after it has been lost.—Canon Fleming.

PERSECUTION IN ARMENIA.

MR. THOUMAIAN CONDEMNED TO DEATH.

The worst fears have been realised in the matter of the Armenian trials. Pastor Thoumaian and Mr. Kayayan, both professors in the American College at Marsovan, with fifteen others, have been condemned to death, and a number of other Christian people have been sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. The interesting life story of Mr. Thoumaian and his wife were told in our columns some time ago. We are glad to learn that the representatives of the European Powers at Constantinople are awake to the outrageous character of the recent proceedings. It was stated in the House of Commons on Monday last that Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires will use every effort to prevent the sentences from being carried out, pending full consideration of all the circumstances.

It is hoped that Germany will share British vigilance, and that the American Legation will not be wanting in concern for the lives of men who are openly declared to have been condemned on documents forged for the purpose of incrimination.

Several strong protests against the sentences have been published in the daily newspapers. The Daily News well remarks:—"The Powers have a right of intervention, under the numerous treaties by which the Turks, in return for important concessions and guarantees, have pledged themselves to reform, and to, at least, a rudimentary justice and humanity. It is a religious question, and it does not touch politics in the least, except in the imagination of the ignorant and fanatical Turkish cadis. The real reason why this horrible holocaust is to be made is, that the Turks have chosen to misinterpret a great Evangelical movement which is now going on in Armenia, principally under the influence of the American missionaries. The movement is in the nature of a religious revival, and the attempt to bring the scattered congregations into union with one another, and with the old Armenian Church, has driven the Turks into a panic of suspicious terror. They detect the deepest designs of disloyalty in a sermon preached on the text, 'Awake, thou that sleepest.' They have themselves awakened with the most appalling consequences. Their prisoners are as whole congregations in number. Of nearly sixty who have been brought to trial, only fifteen have been acquitted. The rest are to be slaughtered by bullet or poison, or to find a somewhat slower death in Turkish gaols."

We sincerely trust that, by Divine intervention, the apprehended evil will be averted. Then, in the words of the journal from which we have already quoted:—"If the lives of the innocent are saved, the Armenians may yet have reason to look back with some satisfaction on this latest outrage, as having at last attracted world-wide attention to sufferings which have been endured for a long time without redress."

At this critical moment we reproduce Mr. Thoumaian's portrait. We are sure that many of our readers will pray God concerning him and his fellow-sufferers; and also beseech the King of kings in his own time to overrule for good the counsels and deeds of the enemies of Christ.

THE MISSIONARY BUREAU.

On Thursday afternoon last a number of friends of mission work assembled under the Mulberry Tree at Garden House, Mildmay Park, and listened to inspiring reports on the progress of the work of God in foreign lands. Dr. Newman Hall presided; the meeting being held under the auspices of the Missionary Bureau.

Mr. Osborne Howe, of Natal, told o work in which during a goodly period his wife has been engaged in various parts of South Africa. At present she is working with him in the direction of the South-East Africa Mission, which is specially endeavouring to evangelise the many Zulus in the colony, who are practically heathen. The mission has some twelve workers, who preach Christ to Europeans as well as natives. More helpers are required, and the mention of that fact reminded the speaker of the obligation of his mission to the Bureau. When in the past they wanted workers, and could not seek them, he and his wife wrote to the Bureau for two tried men; and they had not ceased to praise God for the workers that were sent out in response to that appeal.

Rev. J. J. Turner, from China, spoke of the needs of that great empire. Taking the lowest estimate of the population, more than a thousand souls pass into eternity every hour, who have never heard the name of Jesus Christ, or only know it as a term of reproach. In 1878, during the terrible famine, nine millions of people succumbed to starvation and disease, although thousands of tons of grain, given by the Emperor for the relief of the people, were stored a few hundred miles away. The food was rotting while the people were dying. Why? Because the roads were bad; there were no railways, and there was a lack of men to convey the food to the starving people. In like manner, people are dying without a knowledge of the Gospel, through the lack of messengers to tell them of Christ. And many are hungering and thirsting for a knowledge of God. A Christian Chinaman, named Li, after receiving, by order of the mandarin, two hundred blows for attending meetings in connection with "the foreign religion," said that the physical pains he had endured were as nothing compared with the pains of his heart, before he knew of Christ his Saviour! For many years he sought for peace of mind. Why for so long? Because no missionaries passed his way. The Missionary Bureau endeavours to send forth messengers of the Word of Life to places that are without them.

Rev. W. Fuller Gooch, urged greater interest in the subject, and more prayer on behalf of missions. He told of a servant maid, who, having found peace with God, insisted upon giving all her savings, amounting to £35, to the foreign mission cause.

The last speaker was Rev. Charles Rudge, secretary of the Bureau, who defined the institution as a central agency having for its object the dissemination of information regarding mission work, and the sending out of suitable workers wherever there is an opening, and a real necessity. It has already introduced fifty workers into the foreign field, and is now arranging to provide suitable preliminary training for intending missionaries.

The Late MR. GEORGE GRAVERT,

"THE SAILORS' FRIEND," SUNDERLAND.

ON Sunday, March 19, Mr. George Gravert, of Sunderland, a much loved and devoted servant of the Lord Jesus Christ, passed into his rest. This brother, who might well be called "The Sailors' Friend," for upwards of forty years was privileged to spend an exceptionally useful life, preaching the Gospel of Christ in seven languages with great acceptance, and lovingly and patiently teaching the truths of the Scriptures, and especially the glorious hope of the Church in the second coming of the Lord. He always spoke with much power, yet with very quiet utterance. How the great gap left by his removal will be filled, is more than we can say.

Mr. Gravert was the son of a captain in the service of the German Government, and was a native of Hanover. He chose a seafaring life, and in the Providence of God was put ashore at Sunderland with a broken leg, through an accident on board ship, and had to remain there for three months. Before leaving he went to hear that faithful and able preacher, the late Mr. Arthur Augustus Rees, shortly after the opening of "Bethesda" Free Chapel, when he was so deeply impressed that it resulted in his conversion. On recovering his health he again went to sea, and after three years returned to Hamburg, when he was ordained a preacher of the Gospel by the late Pastor Oncken. Following a year's residence in that city, he went again to Sunderland, and joined in fellowship with the church at "Bethesda."

Soon after this he became a missionary to foreign seamen, visiting the ships as they arrived in port. Getting permission to hold service on board one of them, the Bethel flag was hoisted, and other crews invited. One friend—still an elder at Bethesda—built a room for him at the docks to hold meetings. This was succeeded by a small chapel, and from there, through the kindness of the late Mr. Edward Backhouse, a large-hearted member of the Society of Friends, he was provided with suitable rooms in the fine structure at the east end of the town, known as "Pottery Buildings" (named after the site). The erection of these buildings was a remarkable answer to prayer.

A number of young men were accustomed to meet at the house of a beloved Christian on Saturday evenings, for prayer and study of the Scriptures, and were joined by Mr. Gravert whenever circumstances permitted. The occasion is well remembered when he entered during prayer, unusually anxious and depressed, exclaiming, "Brethren, I want you to pray for me! My little chapel (at the docks) is surrounded by trucks of timber, and the poor sailors can't find it. Pray that the Lord will give me a suitable place."

After prayer three brethren were led to go and look round for a site, and one, a recently disused pottery, seemed strongly to commend itself. A plan of the site and terms were procured, and the matter was again brought before the Lord, who had meanwhile been acting upon the heart of Mr. Edward Backhouse, who wrote to Mr. Gravert in such a manner about the mission work as clearly to indicate that prayer was being answered; which eventually proved to be so most abundantly, for not only was ample accommodation for foreign seamen provided, but the erection of the magnificent buildings referred to includes a large and lofty hall, where Gospel services are regularly held, and various meetings for the social welfare of the masses.

Mr. Gravert spoke fluently in the High and Low German, Danish, Swedish, and Dutch tongues, and fairly well in French. In addition to his daily and nightly visits to the ships, he preached generally four times on the Lord's Day in different languages, besides being ever ready with counsel and help to any who sought them.

It was his custom to invite all anxious ones, or any who might wish to spend a quiet evening, to come to his home and have tea with his family. For many years they never took their Sunday tea alone. There have been Norwegians, Swedes, Germans, Dutchmen, Spaniards, and Russians all partaking of the same meal in perfect friendliness. He was most generous; what he had he gave freely, implicitly trusting the Lord for further supplies. It is needless to add that his faith was often tried, but he never wavered.

Not only was Mr. Gravert a devoted friend of foreign seamen, but also of young men generally, many of whom owe much to him for his valuable teaching. They were specially drawn to him by the tender, loving way in which he dealt with them in their difficulties. He was truly a father in Christ, and all felt that they could fully confide in him. A diligent student of the Scriptures and a man of much prayer, he was ever ready with comfort, counsel, and reproof, yet such reproof as only called forth gratitude. The manner in which he dealt with all opinions by testing them with the Scriptures made a lasting impression.

During his long period of service, Mr. Gravert sold or gave away many thousands of Bibles and portions of Scripture, and distributed untold numbers of tracts in various languages. A large portion of these tracts were his own writing.

This brother's work was arduous, and oft-times dangerous, but he counted not his own life dear unto him. He was the pioneer of missionary work among foreign seamen on the north-east coast, and his loss will be deeply felt far and wide. He had a true helpmeet in his beloved wife, and enjoyed the highest esteem of Mr. Rees, whom he always liked to speak of as his pastor.

The incidents of his life's work are many and thrilling, as well as joyous, and often has he delivered the very last Gospel message to sailors ere they have gone down to a watery grave. He knew and felt deeply his great responsibility, and used to plead as a dying man to dying men.

He literally fell asleep in harness, for the day before his death, unconscious of his own weakness of body, he wished to go down among the ships. He was longing with handsome, beaming face to meet his Saviour, and fell suddenly and peacefully asleep on the Sunday afternoon. His widow and three daughters are bereaved of a devoted and loving husband and father.

THE HOLIDAYS.—Miss C. F. Ryffel, Directress of the Home for Foreign Governesses, 3, Colville-houses, Talbot-road, N., writes:—"We are ready to receive applications from families for holiday governesses."

THE GUILDFORD CONVENTION.

We have no very special feature to record with respect to this gathering, which extended over the whole of last week. The attendances were good, though not quite up, we think, to those of former years. The novelty of the Convention, so far as the townsfolk are concerned, has disappeared, and it is said that they do not attend so freely as at first. The list of speakers is not greatly varied from year to year, and that may keep some away, though there are, doubtless, many on each occasion present for the first time. Rev. Francis Paynter, the genial rector of Stoke, continues to take a paternal interest in the Convention, and presides at nearly all the general meetings. Mr. Paynter is not strong in exposition, and we are expressing the view of many when we say that a little self-effacement in the matter of his introductory talks would not seriously lessen the profit of the convention.

The chief speakers of the opening days were, Revs. A. Barnes Lawrence, of Blackheath, J. J. Luce, of Gloucester, J. T. Butlin, and J. S. Hill, Bishop-designate of the Niger. These brethren gave helpful addresses, throwing fresh and practical light on the sacred oracles, and earnestly exhorting to full consecration of life. The early prayer-meetings were much enjoyed; and it is a very interesting fact that the morning missionary prayer-meetings grew so greatly in interest and attendance that they had to be moved from the church-room to the tent.

A SPECIMEN DAY.

Thursday last was a good specimen day of the Convention. Rev. G. F. Head, of Hampstead, gave the morning Bible reading in the tent, and his words were weighty, as showing the beauty of a life that is well pleasing to God. At the general meeting which followed, the speakers were Rev. Evan Hopkins and Rev. C. A. Fox. Truly admirable were their addresses—that of the former marked by wise discriminative teaching, while Mr. Fox's was brimful of fervour and sparkling with beauty of thought and expression. Some notes of these addresses will afford the basis of profitable study.

HOLY GHOST LIBERTY

was Mr. Hopkins's theme; his text 2 Cor. iii. 13, "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty." Liberty, he said, is a word that has a gladsome sound; it is the keynote of redemption. The Apostle speaks not here of a future blessing, but a present experience; and it is bound up with the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. The presence of the Spirit was never intended to supersede the presence of the Lord Jesus. In one sense Christ has departed; his humanity is in heaven, but his words were, "Lo, I am with you alway." Some think the visible is the real, and the spiritual is but figurative. Not so; the unseen is the eternal, while the visible is after all but the shadow. What then is the place of the Holy Spirit? To take of the things of Christ and reveal them to the heart of the believer. The Spirit is our Sanctifier; but the Lord Jesus Christ is our Sanctification.

How does the Holy Spirit give liberty? By shedding light into the mind, by bringing purity into the affections, and by communicating power to the will. He imparts the light of truth by leading us to Him who is the Truth—the only embodiment of Truth; by teaching us God's attitude towards fallen men, and towards the atoning work of Christ. What a blessed emancipation this brings to the bound and burdened sinner. Another step—the Spirit purifies the affections. The true believer may be troubled by unhallowed desire, by selfish inclination, by evil disposition. He may battle earnestly against these and yet fail. We are exhorted not only to be pure in outward life, but to be "pure in heart." That does not imply sinlessness or the entire eradication of evil in the flesh. What is the heart? Keeping close to Bible teaching, we find that the heart is the seat of the thought, the affections, and the will. The heart is not the same as the nature. The believer gets a new nature, but if he backslides he does not therefore become *un*regenerate. He has *de*generated, his heart has gone astray. This distinction between the heart and the nature throws a flood of light on the whole question of the cleansing of the heart, the purifying of the thoughts and affections, and the giving a right attitude to the will. The Holy Spirit brings freedom from ignorance, and also from evil desire and evil disposition. As Paul expresses it, "The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Take a homely illustration. The law of floating bodies makes an object in the water free from the law of gravitation, though this latter law is all the time in force. If the believer abides in Christ he gets the benefit of the new life that belongs to Christ's kingdom. Christ is, so to speak, the Lifebelt; if we get out of communion with Christ—away from the Lifebelt—down we go; so the grand secret is to abide. The Spirit teaches us this, and makes it a reality.

I was speaking on this subject to a working-man, and to illustrate it I tied a little bit of lead to a stick and dropped it into the water; of course it went to the bottom. Then I put a piece of cork at the other end, and the thing went up and down. A great many people are living an up and down life—the cork would go up and the lead go down. I put it into a little lifebuoy, and the lead did not sink at all so long as the lifebuoy was there. The lifebuoy is Christ; the cork is the new nature; the lead is the old nature. If we are out of communion with Christ we have an up and down life, because the new nature is not of itself strong enough for the old nature. The Holy Ghost lusteth against the flesh, we read—not the new nature but the Holy Ghost; and the flesh against the Spirit; so that we need not do the things we would otherwise do if the Holy Spirit were not there. The working man to whom I was speaking got down to pray with me, and he said, "O, Lord, we thank Thee for the Lifebuoy, and we thank Thee that we can be in it, and live in it every day! But, oh, Lord, let us not forget that the lead is there all the same!" Some people think that when they are converted the lead is gone. Well, if that is so, we do not want Christ. But we soon find out that the lead is still there, and that gives the whole force to the saying of Paul, "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death."

Once more the Spirit makes us free by the power. He communicates to the will. Mere strength of human will cannot give the victory. Paul says, "To will is present with me, but how to perform I know not." It is only as we abide in Christ that we shall have victory. This is the lesson that the Christian has to learn for sanctification. First of all as sinners we learn that we cannot save ourselves. The responsibility of saving us belongs to Christ; the responsibility of trusting Him belongs to us. So as Christians the responsibility of keeping belongs to Christ; the responsibility of trusting Him belongs to us. And this in little things as well as great. It is often in the little things that we break down; we need the power of God all the day long in everything. What rich provision we have in Christ; and what grand possibilities there are in Him for daily life! Let us be ashamed of ourselves if we are not living on our resources.

SOME PAULINE PERSUASIONS

were brought before our notice by Rev. C. A. Fox, in applying the truths already set forth. The first was from 2 Tim. i. 12, "I am persuaded He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him against that day." It is the character of God that we trust in this matter—his utter trustworthiness. Having redeemed us from all iniquity He will not leave us in those sins from which He has redeemed us. Jesus saves from the power as well as the penalty of sin. Have we done our part? "That which I have committed to Him." Are we trusting Him in the very things in which we fail and come short? Do we in humble wholeheartedness believe He is able to keep? Then observe that we must not only hand over to Him all our being—the desires, the understanding, the will; as we hand over we must draw our own hands off. Here it is that even Christians fail; it is not to be "God and I," but God altogether. Remember, too, another thing (verse 13). We must "hold fast" the Word of God, the promise of Jehovah. Let us cling to it, and have it ever by us—written in our hearts, and it may be written down on paper by our own hand, and in our pocket ready for use. Another passage in Rom. iv. 21, "Being fully persuaded that what He hath promised He is able also to perform." Do you believe God is able to perform as well as to keep? Abraham was an Old Testament believer, but he was a very strong believer. I wish we were nearly up to him. We read (verse 17), "Him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead." Do we believe in such a God? Then we will go and preach to those who are dead. Is there some special part of our life that is dead and withered? Do you believe God is able to quicken it into newness of life? I do not think it worth while believing in any other God. We read again of Abraham in the following verse, that "Against hope he believed in hope." Do we nineteenth-century Christians, who think ourselves so far on, believe as Abraham did? In verse 19 we are told that "he considered not his own body," and "staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief." Shall not our faith be as strong as Abraham's?

One more passage, Rom. viii. 38, "I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, should be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Paul was not only persuaded that God was able to keep and to perform, but able to conquer. "In all things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us." This chapter begins with no condemnation, and ends with no separation; and this comes in between—no defeat. You say there are enemies on all hands. Yes, it is not an easy life; it is no mere singing of hallelujah. It is a dying daily as well. We are "killed all the day long"; but it is "for Thy sake." If we are being killed all the day long for Jesus' sake, we shall not be jealous or envious of others who have greater powers or greater gifts, or more success. We shall not be so trying and so impatient in our tempers. God grant that these persuasions may be a Divine reality to us. Then where the Spirit of the Lord is there shall be liberty.

was the subject of the afternoon gathering, when an earnestly solemn word of exhortation was given by Rev. J. S. Hill. From the story of the ointment poured forth by Mary on the feet of her Lord, he deduced the believer's privilege and responsibility to put himself definitely and entirely at God's disposal for service at home or abroad. Being specially interested in the work on the Niger, Mr. Hill pleaded for helpers for that needy part of Africa. He had been up and down the country, he said, trying to get men to go to Africa. There is no difficulty in getting any number of men of the world to go out in the service of the Royal Niger Company, but it is very difficult to get Christian men to show equal readiness in going out for their Master. Are we to come to this Convention and go away simply to consume upon ourselves that which we have received from the hands of God? There are said to be thirteen millions of people in the Niger region who speak the Ebo language; and there is only one English missionary there who knows the language. Three other missionaries have just gone out, but what is that handful among thirteen millions? In the Soudan there are sixty millions of souls dying without the Gospel! It is computed that twenty thousand people die in Africa every week who have never heard the name of Jesus Christ. Have we ever tried to enter into the yearnings and purposes of God with respect to these perishing millions?

At the close of an intensely earnest appeal for African volunteers, Mr. Hill led in prayer, and commended to God's guidance all who were desirous of offering themselves to Him for this service.

The evening speakers were Rev. W. Darlow Sergeant and Rev. Evan Hopkins. The former spoke practically on "Peace"—peace by the blood, peace in service, peace in sorrow, peace at all times, peace for the future. Mr. Hopkins gave an address on following Christ and the hindrances to be overcome.

THE MISSIONARY MEETINGS.

"Ready to do whatsoever my Lord the King shall appoint." This seemed to be the pervading thought in the addresses at the missionary meetings, on Saturday. The one thing which God commands his people to do (said Mr. EUGENE STOCK, speaking as chairman at the morning meeting), they are not ready to do. To some the doors are closed. The Lord wants everyone to be ready to go with the unquestioning obedience of an officer who recently remarked to him that he did not know where his next appointment might take him, perhaps to far distant parts. "Shall you go?" "Of course; I am under orders." Mr. Stock said nothing had given him more pleasure than to meet in India at their respective posts, two ladies, who recalling to his mind conventions at Blackheath and Guildford, told him they had been there led to consecrate themselves to foreign mission work.

Rev. J. M. EPPSTEIN (London Jews Society) pleaded the cause of Israel.

Rev. J. S. HILL gave one of his intensely earnest addresses, pleading the cause of heathendom with pathetic power. Revs. C. PHILLIPS and ISAAC OLUWOLE, his two coloured assistants, also gave earnest addresses, and at the close these three were commended by Mr. STOCK in prayer to God.

Mrs. GREAVES (Bengal) and Miss CAREY (Karachi) of the C.M.S. Zenana Society, spoke, the latter stating the need for an evangelist to come out this winter to work amongst English-speaking gentlemen in Scinde. Mr. J. MUNRO urged that the command "Go, preach the Gospel," is one not to be evaded, unless before God the conscience can be discharged of the obligation. He spoke scathingly of the apparent interest shown in mission work by attendance at meetings, and the small practical result. Rev. RUTTONJI NOWROJI (C.M.S., Aurangabad, Central India) and Col. FINCH WHITE (Continental Missions) were the concluding speakers; the latter showed a very wide open door, near home, for those unable to go further. France is crying out for something she can believe.

By invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Paynter, a large number gathered in the beautiful grounds of Stoke Hill in the afternoon, where another missionary meeting was held under the wide-spreading branches of the now well-known oak tree. There Mr. EUGENE STOCK testified to the work of individuals in promoting the cause of missions. Among the other speakers were Miss BAUMAN, a lady who went out from Guildford, who specially asked for two lady workers in a certain Indian village, and was cheered at the close of the meeting by two ladies volunteering to go out. The address of Mr. BENNETT, of the Niger, was of special interest. He first sounded a note of thanksgiving, as at the last year's Convention he had been remembered in prayer upon that lawn, and at that time he had been the last out of thirteen Europeans who went out, left there; and he was then very ill; but he had been spared and enabled to remain at his post until the spring. During the last hymn many rose to testify their willingness to go to the foreign mission field, should the way be made clear. Several had also responded in like manner at the morning meeting to this definite call to service.

Next year's Convention will be held between the first and second Sundays in June, so that it may not clash with any other gathering, as it has this year done with that at Bridge of Allan in Scotland.

MISSIONS TO SEAMEN.—Through the munificent gift of Lord Brassey, the erection has been commenced of one portion of the proposed block of buildings for the free use of sailors of all nations frequenting the port of London, which is to be built opposite to the Shipping Offices in Poplar. The Seamen's Institute part is to cost over £5000. But the Missions to Seamen Society, having paid £4000 for the site, is not at present in a position to accept the tenders for the other divisions of the block, which include the seamen's church, £2900; the gymnasium, &c., £1800; the coffee-bar, &c., £1000. The whole building would, if erected at one operation, cost, including the site, £15,100, which is much less than was originally expected. The building now begun will prove a counter-attraction to the many evils of the streets, and a place of refuge, safe companionship, and recreation, as well as of daily worship, to seafarers far from their homes. The secretary of the Society is Commander William Dawson, 11, Buckingham-street, Strand. W.C.

BRIDGE OF ALLAN CONVENTION.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

THE arrangements for this year, were very carefully planned, and this added much to the efficiency of the gathering as a means for promoting spiritual life. Visitors could map out their day with confidence, and those who could spare only an hour or two from business were never disappointed in finding exactly that for which they had travelled many miles. Large numbers thus attended the meetings from Edinburgh, Glasgow, Perth, and Stirling, returning home in the evening. Of course, the great majority of the audience was made up of those who had taken lodgings in the village for the whole week, and of the inhabitants of the district.

Hundreds of working men and women came every night from Stirling, and as these were for the most part earnest Christian workers, their presence perceptibly heightened the tone of the meetings. Sometimes they marched to the tent singing inspiriting hymns, and held evangelistic meetings in the open air for the villagers, when the programme of the day had been got through. Stirling has undoubtedly got a rich blessing from the gathering, and many of those who came from lonely Highland glens, and crowded cities, have openly testified that they have carried with them to their various fields of labour a deeper peace, a more abounding joy, and a stronger faith.

The early morning prayers were seasons of great soul refreshment. The ladies' prayer meetings, held in the hall of the museum, opposite the tent, were specially marked in this respect.

The Bible readings, which were held daily from 10.30 to 11.45 a.m., were greatly enjoyed, and at most of them the tent, which is seated for 2100, was fairly well filled. At their former meetings opportunities were afforded to the speakers of showing how scriptural are the aspirations after a higher life, which are now, happily, influencing thousands throughout the land, and how abundantly God has made provision for satisfying these. The reading on the opening day, Tuesday, was a good specimen of what was heard every day. It was given by Rev. CHARLES G. MOORE, London, who chose as his motto-text, Gal. ii. 20, "Not I, but Christ," From John xv. 5, "I am the vine, ye are the branches," he showed that branchhood is the law and method of our life. God has not given us a nature that cannot sin, but a mighty Saviour to keep us from sin. The "I" is the great supplanter of God, but Christ supplants it and restores us to fellowship with God. Our Christian life, by our self-crucifixion, is not reduced to passivity, but to receptivity. We are unceasingly receptive of the life of God, and what a full, busy, crowded life is his. This is God's cure for depression of spirits—"filled with the Spirit of God."

The other Bible readings were given by Dr. White, on the Holy Spirit as wind and fire; by Rev. C. G. Moore, on John xv. 3, 4; and by Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, on 2 Thes. ii. 1—10, "The Coming of the Lord."

At the general meetings, in the tent from 3 to 4.30, and from 7 to 9 o'clock, the attendances were always good, and the attention given to the earnest and pointed addresses very marked. The speakers were Rev. Mr. Aimsley, Cork; Dr. Elder Cumming, of Glasgow; Rev. G. Wilson, Edinburgh; Rev. F. B. Meyer, London; Professor Laidlaw, D.D., New College, Edinburgh; Rev. H. B. Macartney, Melbourne, Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, Aberdeen; and Rev. R. Leitch, Newcastle.

There were two missionary meetings, which gave the greatest satisfaction to the visitors. The first was held on the afternoon of Wednesday; the needs and claims of the heathen were dwelt upon, and also the responsibility of Christians to consecrate their lives to God's service either at home or abroad. Dr. ELDER CUMMING said a great revolution in public sentiment is needed with regard to mission work at home and abroad. For this work young men and women are needed who are in sympathy with Jesus Christ, who are willing to live for Him, and who know something about being filled with the Spirit. Rev. G. H. C. MACGREGOR, of Aberdeen, who had just returned from America, followed, his subject being—Life (John iii. 5); full life (John iv. 14); overflowing life (John vii. 37 and 38). Rev. J. HUDSON TAYLOR was the last speaker; he delivered an address which deeply enlisted the sympathy of his hearers, and impressed upon them the urgent need that existed for them all being actively employed in the Lord's work.

The second missionary meeting, which fittingly closed the Convention, was held on Saturday from ten to one o'clock, and was felt to be unique in its character. Upwards of twenty addresses of five minutes each were given by those who had been actively engaged in or directly connected with mission work. They came from almost every part of the world where Christianity has a footing, and represented various churches and societies. All exalted Christ, and spoke hopefully of his cause. It is winning everywhere, they said; what is needed to see a great advance all along the line, is that the churches at home should send forth more labourers. Mr. HUDSON TAYLOR gave the closing address.

A correspondent sends to The N.B. Daily Mail an excellent account of the Convention, and adds the following deeply interesting facts:—

In addition to this Convention there are other indications of increased spiritual life and vitality. In the Vale of Leven there has been a remarkable movement for several weeks in succession, and many of the choicest young people of the district have come out for Christ. Last winter a similar work manifested itself at Dunoon, to the strengthening of all the churches. At Bellshill the Free and U.P. Churches unite in carrying on monthly conferences, the outcome of a work of grace experienced there some time ago. There is a similar conference at Springburn, the fruit of the awakening there last December, and recently we heard of a minister in the East who had to withdraw from a communion engagement because a revival had broken out in his own congregation.

There is, however, one other indication which must not be passed over. It is well known to those who are carrying on aggressive work, that the getting hold of and keeping in touch with the churches young people from the age of 14 or 15, to 21 or 22, is one of the greatest problems which some earnest people say require solution. The revival, if there is to be one, will be certain to lay hold of this particular class. It has done so in America, and is doing so in our more remote colonies at this moment. The fact that at midsummer the large hall of the Waterloo Rooms was crammed from floor to ceiling, with an audience chiefly composed of young people of the age referred to, and that upwards of a dozen organisations entered heartily into a testimony and consecration service lasting over forty minutes, shows that the Christian Endeavour Society has come to stay in our midst, and the wave of blessing already experienced is fast speeding over Scotland. It is nearly five years since in connection with Miss Tyson's work two or three societies started; within the last eighteen months others have come into existence, and already several congregations and missions feel the thrill of a new life that is prophetic of future—and shall we say early—blessing for our land.

The fields are white unto the harvest. Where are the reapers? The churches will do wisely to organise the movement in the congregations so as to make the most of the harvest, and prevent the loss that must otherwise inevitably be sustained. Was it Hugh Makail who said, "The Covenants shall yet be the reviving of Scotland"? This new movement seems to have much of the old Covenanting spirit in it. If so, we shall certainly have a national revival.

A Bible Reading.

"A godly man."—Psalm xii. 1.

CLAPHAM PROPHETIC CONFERENCE.

The tenth annual Conference for the Study of Prophetic Truth was held last week in the Conference Hall, Clapham-road. General Sir R. Phayre, who presided at the first meeting, on Wednesday morning, opened with a few words on the importance of the subject, giving his own personal reasons for believing that the time is at hand, and that servants of Christ are called upon in these days very specially to be as men that wait for their Lord.

Canon A. R. Fausset, D.D., followed with a paper on "The Signs of the Lord's Coming and the Consummation of the Age." He devoted himself largely to showing how the way was prepared for our Lord's first advent, and to demonstrating that similar preparations are in progress now, and may be regarded as signs of his second coming. Amongst these signs were the unification of the world under the Romans, and material progress together with moral deterioration. The Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians of our Lord's days have their counterpart in the Ritualists, Rationalists, and worldly professors of these latter days. Spiritualism and revived necromancy the speaker regarded as very significant signs of the end.

THE STUDY OF PROPHECY.

Prof. R. F. Weidner, D.D., of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute, read 2 Pet. i. 16-21, and said: I wish in a very practical way to give some hints as to the study of this Book, for it is the privilege of every Christian to study for himself by the help of the blessed Spirit of God. The study of prophecy presupposes certain things, and amongst these is an acquaintance with the teaching of the Word of God. There are those who lay great stress on the historical study, but while that is very good so far as it goes, it is not really the study of the Bible. Then there are a good many who insist on a critical study, analysing, criticising, and dissecting the mere letter of the Book. But there is only one true method of studying the Bible to genuine profit, and that is to approach the Word of God in order to learn what his mind is, and what He has made known to us; to learn what is to be the rule of our faith and of our conduct. But even when we come in the right way there are different methods. One way, which is a great help, is to study the books by themselves; another is by studying a subject. That is, taking up book by book, and getting the truth in it, the special message it conveys; or following out a subject through the different books, and seeing the various aspects in which it is presented. But in all this there must be the spirit of prayer, of humility, of devout experience, so that we may become full of the Word, and live in it.

Now the question must be faced: How are we to regard this Word? There are three views, which may be described as revelation, illumination, and inspiration. Revelation is God making known to man something he did not know before. From this it is evident that while much of the Bible is revelation, much of it is not. There is history, and many other things which are not, strictly speaking, revelation. The Bible contains revelation, but that is a totally different thing from saying that the Bible contains the Word of God, in the sense that all of it is not the Word of God. We maintain that the Bible right through is the Word of God. Whatever it be, history, song, exhortation, doctrine, or prophecy, it is from first to last the Word of God, and what is written is true. Many modern writers insist much on a theory of illumination. What is that? It is that gift of God whereby He enlightens each one of us who comes devoutly to his Word. But this in no way accounts for or describes the means whereby God ensured that holy men of old should write exactly his mind and will. Doubtless they were illuminated from time to time as we are; but the inspiration under which they wrote, as they were taught of the Holy Ghost, is a wholly different thing.

Now, coming to the Bible we find doctrine and duty, history and prophecy. God has been pleased to reveal some of the future; but to understand these things aright we must know God's plan of salvation, founded in Old Testament times, manifested in Jesus Christ, and yet to be fully carried out. We want to have confidence in God that He is able to carry it out, and trust in Him that He is faithful to carry it out. Ere one enters on the deep study of prophecy he should be familiar with the leading doctrines of our faith, as the atonement and justification; he should study what Jesus Himself and the various Apostles have to say on these things. There are in the Word six great centres of truth:—about God Himself; about the person of Jesus; about the work of Jesus; about the Holy Spirit; about the Church; and about eschatology, or the doctrine of last things. Generally speaking, we ought to seek an understanding of these grand lines of truth. The last mentioned will, fully followed out, bring in the whole study of prophecy and the future.

Having dealt at some length with the work of the Holy Spirit in illuminating the devout Bible student, the speaker concluded by very briefly touching on the Apocalypse. He mentioned the three schools:—preterist, continuous historist, and futurist, avowing himself frankly as a futurist. He believed the book is not chronological, but consists from ch. iv. of a series of five great visions, panoramic views of the future, or rather of certain events in the future which it has pleased God to show unto his servants.

At subsequent meetings some of the mysteries of Scripture were made the subject of reverential study, things new and old being brought out of God's Word by Revs. J. Gossett Tanner, on "The Cherubim," and N. S. Taylor on "Apostasies." "The Second Coming of the Lord an Incentive to Service" was ably dealt with by Rev. H. Graham Thwaites, and among other speakers were: Revs. J. J. B. Coles, W. Fuller Gooch, F. A. C. Lillingston, E. Brewer, and J. Urquhart. Canon Fausset further elaborated the "Signs of the Lord's Coming and the Consummation of the Age," and Rev. H. C. Sturdy emphasized the joyous privilege of "Praying for Jesus." On the third day of the conference the Jews, in history and prophecy, occupied attention. Revs. George Ensor and G. D. Hooper were the speakers in the morning, and they made it abundantly clear that God has great and glorious purposes regarding his ancient people. The afternoon gathering had for its specific subject

THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

General Halliday occupied the chair, and read the closing verses of Obadiah. The first address was by Rev. John Wilkinson, of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews, who drew attention to Jeremiah xxx. 1-3, Exek. xxxvii. 20-28, and other Scriptures. Anticipating the objection, "How do you discern between the predictions which relate to the return from the Babylonish captivity, and those which are said to be still unfulfilled?" he pointed to Isai. xi. 11, where it is declared that "the Lord shall set his hand the second time to recover the remnant of his people ... from the four corners of the earth." Here the reference is to the present (world-wide) dispersion, and to a second (yet future) gathering. The prophets looked forward to a restoration that shall be final, and which, therefore, could not have been enacted by the return from Babylon. "I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord" (Amos ix. 15).

Recent years have seen not only a scattering of Jews from Russia, but a great gathering of them in the land which is still the Land of Promise. Since 1882 seventeen colonies have been established in Palestine, and seven of them are self-supporting; and the Turkish Government has lately made a concession under which Jews may cultivate the land with more liberty than hitherto. Mr. Wilkinson affirmed his conviction that we are on the eve of the promised restoration, and on the very threshold of the return of our blessed Lord. He was, he said, full of hope that he should escape the dishonour of the grave, and, being among those who "remain unto the coming of the Lord," would soon gaze upon Him whom he longed to see face to face. In conclusion, the speaker applied his subject, maintaining the binding character of the Apostolic order "to the Jew first," and pointing out that through converted Jews it would be comparatively easy to evangelise all the nations of the earth.

The other speaker was Rev. J. B. Barraclough, who showed that as fulfilled prophecy was rightly interpreted literally, so also that which is unfulfilled must be construed to mean what it says. "Spiritualisation" yields any meaning that may be desired to supersede the obvious and true meaning. Tyre, Sidon, Babylon, and Nineveh met their doom as plainly predicted, and the future course of Israel is no less clearly expressed. The speaker urged special prayer and effort on behalf of Israel——(1) because this is a Scripture command; (2) because it is a subject on which we have the revealed mind of Christ; and (3) because Apostolic example emphasizes the duty.

In the evening there was a communion service, presided over by Rev. W. Fuller Gooch. This was one of the best conferences ever held in connection with Mrs. Meredith's institution. The attendance was large, and from first to last the interest was well sustained. One of the speakers brought forward the need for a Bible woman in an Oriental town, and a lady present at the conference undertook to provide for the need. At each meeting the singing was led by the choir of Mr. Spurgeon's Orphanage.

AN OPEN DOOR.

Under the heading "The Holy Ghost at Work" we inserted in a recent issue some details of a striking work of grace discovered by a brother labouring in the province of Madras. The writer was Mr. Frank W. Gooch (eldest son of Pastor W. Fuller Gooch, of Norwood), who has been, since the summer of 1891, engaged in Gospel effort among the Telugus. He is working on unsectarian and evangelistic lines, and has met with much encouragement in directions quite outside ordinary paths of service. We learn from other sources of information that a cheering and hopeful outlook presents itself in connection with the new ground he is endeavouring to open up, and we have pleasure in finding space for the following extracts from another letter received from him:—

"My wife and myself are sent out and supported by one Christian family in Canada. After mastering the native dialect, we are anxious to leave the coast and go a little inland to unoccupied territory, and have chosen Anakapalle as a centre of work. We have there a constituency of some 150,000 in a radius of a few miles, and these are but seldom preached to by any missionary. We are building up no denomination but working to teach the unity of believers in Christ, and co-operating heartily with any Christian evangelical missionaries we come in contact with.

"Our friends in Canada are already very large givers to the Lord's work in many of its branches, and I want to find some church gathering or Christian family who would like to interest themselves in some direct mission work from which they could hear from time to time, and support some native workers, or Christian boys or girls in a training school or in some other way co-operate with me in this work. I have an earnest Christian native worker whom I am supporting at a cost of about £20 a year altogether. My wife wants a Bible woman as soon as the Lord will raise her up one, but He must also send the funds, for I find I cannot alone support my preacher.

"My wife's family together sent out enough to build a school-house (boarding), to train Christian children; to carry on this will require a teacher and the support of most of those who attend. Anakapalle is a large place and walled up against the truth, being full of Brahmin influence; I want, if the Lord will, to get a piece of land very near the town, if possible immediately adjoining it, because to influence them I feel I should be as much among them as possible. To do this I must be prepared to pay a (comparatively) large price and must fence it when obtained. This may cost me £100, though I hope to be able to get it for less. I want this money immediately, and the friends over the Atlantic hope before very long to be able to send some money to build.

"We believe the Lord sent us here. He has much helped and blessed us. He will not let us lack funds to do all He appoints us to do, so this letter is not meant to send the Lord's work a-begging by any means, but I have thought you might be able to place it where some would be glad to work with us financially and in prayer for God's blessing in the salvation of souls."

It is to efforts of this kind we must look for a more rapid spread of the Gospel in the vast districts of India yet unevangelised, and it is to be hoped many similar openings will present themselves on every side. Pastor W. Fuller Gooch, of Lansdowne Hall, W. Norwood, would gladly give further information concerning the work in which his son is engaged, or be a link of communication between him and any of our readers who may be interested in the facts stated.

THE CHILD PAUPERS of England and Wales exceed a quarter of a million, and constitute over one-third of the pauperism of the country.

Letters to Dorothy.—6.

Dear Dorothy,—I had a strange experience last night. I will not always hold the bright side of our work uppermost, lest some of our friends might set sail for it prepared only for sunny seas.

I hate to stumble upon an unconfided secret. We go to these poor homes so often we must learn something of their trials; yet that they, like rich folk, have their sacred sorrows, which they have a right to veil from even friendly eyes, if they can, I never forget. But to-night I went for the friend of whom I told you—the mother of my friend—and "sister Sally" to go to church with me as they had promised. She received me with downcast face.

"How dare I go? I waited till you came because I promised, but I shouldn't enjoy one minute of it if I went. Sister's husband—you don't know, and she couldn't bear to have you: she's so proud over her troubles—has gone off to an awful den of wickedness on the West Side. He was in a terrible state of drunkenness when he started, and picked up a stone to smash her head with when she followed a way, begging him not to go. He's a very quarrelsome man, and she's always afraid he may get killed in some row over there. She's got to go after him. I can't let her go alone, but I must go first and see where my husband is. If he isn't in some of the saloons round here, he's gone too. If they are together there'll surely be trouble."

I braced myself for it (now, my soul, we'll take one square look at life to-night such as some women have it), and said, "I'll go with you to find your husband." We walked around a square within a block of her home, where the feet of her young boys must pass daily; and while I stood by the door she looked into or entered eight or ten doors, which could not have terrified me more had they been the veritable "gates of hell."

"You shouldn't come with me," she protested, in pained tones; "it isn't fit for such as you. I'm used to it. This is my regular evenin' walk—and hers—only she'll be so angry with me because I told you. She wanted you to think her husband was a decent man"—and I had thought so, for when I dined with them once he had played the gentleman.

But why shouldn't I go with her? went on my inner colloquy. If she goes every night from necessity, can't I go with her just one night out of sympathy? "But for the grace of God, there goes old John Bradford."

The straying husband was not there. I could only commend her to that same grace of God which had saved me from such a life, permitted it to her, and let her go. The two must start on their perilous journey to a distant and unsafe quarter of the city to rescue at the risk of their own lives those who only made theirs a torment.

"Pray for us in your church to-night," she said, as I said "Good-bye, and God protect you." "You see now why so often we couldn't come when we promised. It isn't easy for us to be good, is it?"

I prayed for her in the quiet church, and for those like her. The beauty of the service passed over my soul, not into it, that night. I could only think of my desolate sisters; a great wave of despondency rolled over me.

The organ peals could not drown that voice. "You know now, it isn't easy for us to be good, is it?" Going with her had made it real. I could talk it over alone with God better than in the church. "How can I have faith for those people? How can I urge on their faith under circumstances where I doubt if my own would hold?" O God, tell me; and He did.

His answer was written in the book centuries ago for me to find that night.

I read the story of Hagar in the wilderness by the fountain. I saw how the heart of our compassionate Christ Himself so yearned over the desolate woman, that He took the form of an angel and came down to help her.

What first brought Him to our earth before He "was made flesh and dwelt among us," but the unvoiced cry of a desolate woman? What comfort I could carry to my women to-morrow? I could show them how He got Hagar to tell Him all about it (Gen. xvi. 7-16), then told her exactly what to do in her present perplexity, and promised future blessings. "And the angel of the Lord found her"—spoke with her (v. 8), counselled and blessed her (9-12), and she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, "Thou art a God that seeth, for she said, Have I even here looked after Him that seeth me."

And then I read the New Testament story of a woman at the well—this one so hedged in by sin and pride of sect, that no one could have helped her. So her own Saviour chose to make his first open revelation of Himself—"I that speak unto thee am He." How plain God made it, setting these companion pictures, one in the Old Testament, the other in the New, that no woman need ever say she was too wretched, too shut in, or too sinful for Christ to find her "even here,"

God does know the condition of these lives. To every baffled, tormented soul denied the usual "means of grace" He will reveal Himself. Trust Him to find the way. Henceforth this shall be my Gospel to such hearts. Edith Metcalf.

HELP FOR NORTH AFRICA.

A straight line from Fez in Morocco to Alexandria in Egypt would be just over 2000 miles long. Another from Alexandria to the north of Lake Albert Nyanza would be 2000 miles more. Thence across the continent to Bathurst at the mouth of the Gambia 3400 miles, and from there back to Fez 1800. These lines enclose an area of 5,000,000 square miles, or nearly half the continent of Africa, one and a-quarter times the size of all Europe, and 100 times the size of England. Its population it is difficult accurately to estimate, but it would probably be 40,000,000, of whom perhaps three-quarters are Mohammedans. So far as I am aware at present there is not one solitary missionary in all these regions; the inhabitants are living like their fathers in a spiritual darkness which they prefer to light. All the mission work at present being done is outside this region of spiritual darkness.

I have returned from visiting the outposts of Christian effort on the northern border land of this citadel of Satan. Even here we cannot point to any great victories won, or many captives freed from their chains of error, so are driven to the Captain of our Salvation for reinforcements of spiritual strength as well as of men and means. Who will join us in our prayers and efforts? At present the work stands as follows:—A few mission stations have been established at longer or shorter intervals across the northern edge of the continent from the Atlantic to Asia, like the skirmishers of an advancing army. The army, however, is not at present visible, and it looks rather as though the skirmishers might be left to fight the good fight of faith without much reinforcement.

I have had the joy of witnessing a few Kabyles holding fast to Christ, notwithstanding trial and persecution, and was greatly struck by the hearty welcome which Mr. Cuendet, a Swiss missionary of the N.A.M., received as compared with ten or twelve years ago when I first visited them. Then they told me, "Though you live here all your life not one of us will ever give up Mohammed, and even should your children come after you and remain all their lives not one of us would turn from Mohammed." Now they say, "Your Christian religion is good, and perhaps our children will become Christians, but we are too old to change." We believe, however, that God can change the hearts of old people as well as young, and more than that we believe the first converts are more likely to be among those of a reasonable age and upward, than among the very young.

From Fez, Morocco's northern capital, come encouraging reports of inquirers and professed converts from among the Berbers or Kabyles in the mountains around, generally known in that part as Souss. The Kabyles and Berbers impressed me on my last visit more than ever with the fact that they are much more ready, by the blessing of God, to accept the Gospel and leave Mohammed than the Arabs. In Tunis and elsewhere, where people are well read in the Koran and well up on all difficult points, they have much more reserve force of resistance to the Gospel. Here our mission has opened a dispensary, and already a number of patients are attending and being treated by Dr. Leach, while Mr. Michell and others deal with them spiritually. The latter, however, I regret to say, has been seriously ill.

The various medical missions under the charge of four medical men and other capable workers are attended by towards 1000 persons a week, or, allowing for certain times when the dispensaries are closed, from thirty to forty thousand a year. To all who come the Gospel message is proclaimed, though no doubt some of this number are the same people who attend several times; still as they return to their homes and repeat what they hear, even a larger number are reached. Itineration through the villages and towns by ladies, as well as brethren, affords opportunities for preaching the Gospel in places far removed from the stations, and is both important and encouraging. Miss Grissell and Miss Harding have lately paid a successful visit to Kairouan, the sacred city of Tunisia.

The Europeans and Jews of North Africa form separate branches of work, and the blessing God has given our brother, Mr. Patrick, among the Spaniards in Tangier makes us long for more labourers among them, as well as among the Jews, French, Italians, and Maltese, who abound along the coast, and who are sunk in the grossest ignorance.

presents a wide field for Christian effort. The members of the N.A.M. who went there a year ago are at present mainly occupied in learning the language. It is hoped before long to begin a medical mission there, and to undertake work among the millions of the Nile delta, where at present little has been attempted. The American Presbyterians have done excellent work, mainly at Cairo and further south, and the C.M.S. are working round Cairo. We are surprised that British Christians are not more interested in the evangelisation of Egypt with its wonderful history and its present British occupation. French Roman Catholics are working energetically; should British Protestants fold their arms?

Many more labourers are needed to assist in all this work. Everywhere these scattered stations need fresh workers to enable them to do what presses upon them and reach forth to those who lie beyond. Men are needed who can learn a difficult language and meet clever fanatical opponents with wisdom and spiritual power. North Africa seems a field in which there is a specially suitable sphere for Christian sisters. Are there not brethren and sisters to whom the fact that the work is markedly difficult would be an attraction? Will friends pray the Lord of the Harvest to raise up labourers suited for the work?

Those who cannot go to these dark lands can help those who do. In this Mission there are twenty workers who are supported either by individual Christians, auxiliaries, or churches, besides fourteen who support themselves. This leaves nearly forty who look to God to sustain them through the general funds of the Mission or in some other way. There are also several new workers desiring to go out this autumn. We know of no better way of increasing the interest of a church, auxiliary, or individual than undertaking to sustain a representative, beside which, it relieves the general funds of the Mission, so that it can help others more liberally, and meet the constantly growing general expenses. The missionaries correspond with those supporting them who are thus stirred to pointed and practical prayer.

Children's Convalescent Home.

The supporters of Winifred House met in annual meeting at the Inns of Court Hotel on June 6. Many readers will remember the good work done by the late Mrs. Hampson in the rescue of women. To her memory this invalid children's convalescent home is erected in Wray Crescent, Tollington Park, N. Carrying out Mrs. Hampson's idea, the Home takes poor children who are recovering from treatment in hospital, and gives them the careful and medical nursing, wholesome food, and good air, which they so much need at such a time, and which could not be afforded in their parents' one-room homes.

The cost of proper surgical appliances for inmates is necessarily a large item, but the fifty-four cases treated last year only average £10 each case, although no limit is fixed for keeping the little sufferers. The average stay was seventeen weeks, though two cases remained a year. The committee ask the benevolent who love children to maintain one inmate for £10, and, as the average stay is four months, £30 a year will maintain a cot, which the committee invite subscribers to name. Mr. W. T. Malleson, of New Bond-street, is hon. treasurer.

THE LATE MR. B. T. MARSHALL.

(Concluded.)

The work at the Soldiers' Institute, Gibraltar, was at this time at a low ebb, and there was room for a special effort to bring about a more prosperous state of things. After six months of united labour of Mr. Joseph Hannington and Mr. Marshall, the former proceeded to the East on a missionary tour, and Mr. Marshall took over the entire charge. It was hard, uphill toil, for the next twelve months, gaining the confidence of the men of the garrison and securing their attendance; but cheering results encouraged the workers. The attendance at all the meetings increased, and, best of all, some were saved. The work consisted of efforts for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the men of our army and navy, some vessels either of the Channel or Mediterranean squadrons being always at Gibraltar. In all the varied work of the Institute Mr. Marshall was ably assisted by his wife. It became needful to have a permanent helper, and the committee appointed as Mr. Marshall's assistant one of the Christian soldiers on the Rock, who bought his discharge for this purpose.

Several successful missions were held, especially for men of the fleet, one of which, in March, 1891, fell immediately after the fatal wreck of the Utopia in Gibraltar Bay. The terrible disaster being fresh in every one's mind had a solemnising influence, and many a careless heart was aroused to seek after and find salvation. At the farewell service, a large number of sailors were present from the German fleet, which was then in the harbour. Half the meeting was conducted in German for their benefit; Mr. Marshall giving them also a Gospel address in their own tongue. At the close a German sailor came forward thanking him for the blessing received, and stating that it was the first religious meeting he had been able to attend during the Commission, as they had only one chaplain for the whole fleet.

In the summer of 1891 Mr. Marshall visited England, and spent much of his well-earned holiday in addressing meetings, thereby arousing fresh interest in the soldiers and sailors at Gibraltar. During his absence the Sunday evening services were carried on by the late Major Robertson, one of the Christian officers who sympathised with and helped in the work at the Institute.

From the time of his arrival at Gibraltar, Mr. Marshall had deeply felt the need of providing wholesome attractions, and especially sleeping accommodation for sailors of our fleet when ashore, to keep them from the abounding temptations held out on the Rock. Comparatively little could be done for them at the Institute, but on Mr. Marshall's return from England, the Governor kindly granted the use of a large guard-room near by, which, when fitted up, provided comfortable sleeping quarters for about twenty-five men. Mr. Marshall ever aimed at making both this place and the Institute a real home for the men who frequented them, and he spared no efforts to attain his object, at the cost of much personal inconvenience and self-sacrifice. That the Institute has been the means of spiritual blessing to many, and that it is valued and dearly loved by the men who have used it, is apparent from many letters received from soldiers and sailors after their leaving the garrison.

In the early summer of last year Mr. Marshall was so run down in health that his doctor advised a short stay in England as the quickest and surest road to recovery. He, therefore, left the Rock in August, his wife staying behind. He fully hoped to return in a couple of months at most to resume his loved work. In a letter written to the Soldiers' Christian Association, to be opened after his leaving them, he wrote: "Don't think God is dependent on me to carry on his work." How little did writer or reader imagine that those words were so soon to be proved true. Yet so it was; within two short weeks of his departure from Gibraltar, on Aug. 19, 1892, he entered into eternal rest, and "henceforth it was his to be" (in the words of one of his favourite hymns) "safe home, safe home in Port."

For the young widow left at Gibraltar with two little children, without any warning or parting message of farewell, this utterly unexpected loss was irreparable. But how tenderly the grace of God upheld her is known to those with her at the time. The news of Mr. Marshall's sudden death called forth real mourning on the Rock. The Governor sent a special message of sympathy to Mrs. Marshall, and gave expression to the high esteem he had always had for Mr. Marshall, and to his assurance that the effect of his work would never die out on the Rock.

Services in connection with Mr. Marshall's death were held at the Institute. A subscription was set on foot amongst the men with the intention of putting in the Institute some memorial of their late loved leader and superintendent. So many other friends, however, wished to join in contributing that a much larger sum was raised than had been anticipated, and as a result £100 was presented to Mr. Marshall's widow. The remainder was devoted to hanging in the Institute library a portrait with inscription.

Mr. Marshall has been succeeded in the superintendentship of the Soldiers' Institute by Mr. William Ogilvy, who, with his wife, is diligently carrying on the work of the Lord there. The honorary secretary and treasurer of the Institute is Colonel H. S. Clarke, Essendene, The Downs, Wimbledon.

"THE GREATEST ENTERPRISE."

Under the above title there appeared an article in The Christian for April 27, which has only just caught my eye owing to pressure of claims upon my time. Its tone and suggestions are so clear and practical, and thus valuable, that I feel led to narrate a case in point.

About five years since one of the godliest men I have ever met, Rev. W. H. Miller, of Bryn Mawr, Pa., Presbyterian Church, had the claims of the foreign field so laid on his heart that he determined to resign his pastorate and "go." His congregation were completely overcome by the decision, and with tears besought him not to leave them. At last he relented, upon their promising to send him by proxy, i.e., to raise enough money to send and support a man in his place. They looked for one, and finally settled upon Dr. W. J. Wanless, of Canada, then a student of our International Medical Missionary Society; the field was also selected, it being Kohlapur, India, where the aged mother and devoted sister of young Robert Wilder were labouring. Dr. Wanless found a most fitting companion, who was a trained nurse, and they were sent out by the Presbyterian Board, and are doing grand work in India.

Not only was money enough raised, beyond their usual gifts to the Missionary Society, to support the doctor and his wife, but sufficient to support a single man besides. One was chosen, and on his way to China he too found a companion, and the Church gladly responded. When I saw the pastor some months since, I asked him how matters stood. "Why," said he, "we are now looking for a third man."

What some have done others may do, and certainly all can try to do. It is not necessary to enlarge, like the mouth of Henry Clay, "It speaks for itself." This is undoubtedly what we want more of, and God grant us to see it.

AFTER TWELVE YEARS.

Before laying down the pen, I feel led to say a little in the way of "reporting progress" to my friends in England. Many of the older readers of The Christian will remember the writer at H.M.S. Dockyard from 1870 to 1876; in Liverpool Medical Mission from 1876 to 1879, when he left for the United States. After spending a year and a-half in Philadelphia, studying and engaging in Medical Mission work, I came to New York City in March, 1881, to found a society for America on the basis of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society. In one of the issues of The Christian for August, 1881, there appeared an account of the starting of the work here, with the thoughts of a Medical Missionary College.

Since that time it has gone on growing, until no less than nine branch Medical Missions have been opened, and over 150,000 attendances given to the sick poor. In 1885 a large double house was taken for a residence and institute for students, and in 1887 a second was rented for lady students. Up to date some seventy-five have received appointments under the various mission boards, and have gone to India, China, Africa, Burmah, Siam, Ceylon, etc. Now we have reached in our history, and that of the cause of Medical Missions, and I desire the sympathy and prayers of God's people, asking for guidance and resultant success.

(1) There are only 350 medical missionaries to 1,000,000,000 sufferers in heathen lands.

(2) These people are perishing no less physically than spiritually.

(3) Not only does sympathy demand our aid, but Christ commands it, and wisdom dictates it.

(4) Experience has demonstrated the threefold value of this agency, in opening the way for the Gospel, caring for the missionary and his family, and often providing self-support of the missionary.

(5) Hundreds of young men and women are offering to "go," and are anxiously asking for the needed knowledge and help.

Is it not passing strange that the whole Christian world does not possess a single Missionary School of Medicine qualified fully to educate intending medical missionaries for their work, while there are scores, if not hundreds, of theological institutions? In asking this question, I am not overlooking the noble work in Edinburgh and London, done with hard struggling by the friends who have been doing their best even as we here in the U S.

Thirty years ago some of the medical colleges in America would educate an intending missionary free of charge, or nearly so. Up to three years since we secured for our students reduction of fees of about one-half, so that our young men could get through for 150 dols., or about £30. Now this is altered, and the various colleges demand from 530 dols. to 800 dols. for a full course.

This has led us to apply for a charter for

on the basis of some medical schools in Great Britain, where students shall not only be fully educated, but be examined and graduated by the University of the State of New York, and thus receive the highest diploma in the State.

The Regents of the University have consented to grant said charter on certain conditions. Our Board has pledged 50,000 dols., and the only thing we are now waiting for is the possession o 50,000 dols. more, when we can obtain the desired document.

Since January 1 nearly one hundred young men and women have written me desiring medical education for missionary service. All we now need is the "Golden Link" to bring the suffering millions and these noble volunteers together; and surely the Master, whose pitying eye beholds it all, will send the silver and gold by some of his servants. One million dollars is the total sum needed to erect, equip, and endow the proposed school of medicine, with hospital for one hundred patients, and dormitories for two hundred and fifty male and female students.

We want to see at least fifty go out each year, till a total of one thousand is reached, and even this will take fifty years, if the service average twenty years each.

We hope to secure the charter early in June. If we do, we shall charge 200 dols. a year (or £40) for full board, furnished room, and complete medical instruction. The entire course will embrace four sessions of nine months each.

Of the 200 dols. charged, 50 dols. is for fees of instruction. After endowment, the charge will only be 150 dols. a-year in full, which will make it as easy for a missionary to study medicine as theology, a point we much desire to attain.

I must close with the Apostolic request, "Brethren, pray for us." Yours to serve,

Geo. D. Dowkontt, M.D.

OPEN-AIR MISSION.

Dear Sir,—Among the aggressive agencies of our time is the Open-air Mission, so long identified with the noble life and efforts of the late Gawin Kirkham. The operations of the Society are simply invaluable. At races, fairs, fêtes, and all similar gatherings of the people its agents are to the front, speaking, distributing good literature, and acting in every respect as the salt amid corruption. Eternity alone will show the greatness of the results that must be perpetually accruing.

It is a marvel that so much work is done for so small a cost, but it is a greater marvel that there should be the least anxiety about finance. May I beg of your readers to consider its urgent need.

F. B. Meyer.

We most heartily commend this appeal.

African Missions Visited.—4.

BY D. A. HUNTER.

AMONG THE DUTCH.

I HAVE been for the last few days in touch with the Dutch Reformed Church, and one cannot but praise God for the many signs of real spiritual life in it; they are rather the drops, which are but the earnest of the showers to follow, than a universal spiritual quickening.

Many are descendants of the Huguenot refugees, and still bear French names. They have amongst them books and furniture brought by their forefathers to this new home over the sea, whither they had come, leaving all for Christ's sake.

The late Major Malan was one day introduced to some members of a family of his name, resident for several generations in South Africa, and was greatly struck with their resemblance in feature to his own father and grandfather.

The family records testify to the fact that after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, three families of Malans left France, two going to South Africa and the third to Switzerland.

When the French refugees arrived, the Dutch insisted on their dropping their language, and attending the Dutch Church; hence they have become almost entirely assimilated with the Dutch.

In conversation with a young Dutch missionary, who is working among the coloured people, I learned that the greatest hindrance to his work is strong drink. This is, perhaps, the most complex question to tackle in South Africa.

Many of the highly-respectable Dutch families are wine farmers, and have been since their settlement. Their forefathers followed the same calling before they crossed the seas. It is their living, and the one business they know. The custom has arisen of giving the coloured people, who are the labourers on their farms, wine several times a day. Unfortunately it seems almost impossible for a coloured man to be a moderate drinker, and so the taste acquired on the farm is indulged in the canteens to terrible excess. Wine farmers condemn the canteens, yet they themselves make brandy from the refuse of their grapes, and sell it to the canteens. It is so plentiful that a bottle can be bought for sixpence.

To realise the difficulty of the situation, one must imagine oneself in some Continental district where wine culture is a staple industry. There it is considered an honourable calling. So in Cape Colony.

STELLENBOSCH AND WELLINGTON

are two principal centres of education in the western province of Cape Colony, and in both these places one comes across very much that promises well for the future. At Stellenbosch there is a good public school for boys, the Victoria College for young men, and the Theological College of the Dutch Reformed Church. There is also the Bloemhof Seminary for young ladies, many of whom pass their matriculation and middle teachers examinations, and afterwards pass as teachers into village schools and private families all over the colony.

Connected with these institutions are such men as Rev. J. H. Neethling, Rev. Professor N. J. Hofmeyr, Dr. Marais, etc., who, combining earnest evangelicalism with broad mental culture, are influencing for Christ those with whom they come into such close and frequent contact.

Professor Hofmeyr has a large Bible-class for young ladies each Wednesday afternoon, and one for young men every Sunday morning. Those who are acquainted with his book, "The Blessed Life," can form some idea of how well qualified he is to undertake such classes.

I was asked to address a number of the young people on the Christian Endeavour movement, and did so all the more readily, because one had the opportunity of speaking to those gathered from many different districts, who, on returning to their homes, might start Endeavour Societies in their own districts.

From Stellenbosch I travelled on to Wellington, and received a hospitable reception at the home of Rev. Andrew Murray. Mr. Murray's congregation has, at his request, appointed a second minister, so that he is now set free to spend much of his time in evangelistic work, not only in Cape Colony, but also in the Orange Free State and the Transvaal.

At Wellington is found the famous Huguenot Seminary, where so many of the young ladies of the colony have received their training. At the head of it are Miss Ferguson and Miss Bliss, ladies from America, who have brought with them much of what is best in American education, and planted it with great success in African soil. One thing has impressed me as I have moved from place to place, and met ladies trained in this seminary; it is that so many of them seem to have a definite and worthy purpose in life which they are endeavouring to carry out.

Both at Stellenbosch and Wellington the foreign missionary spirit is not only kindled but burning. Some have already gone into the field, while others are now preparing for this grand work. It was a real pleasure to find a prosperous Christian Endeavour Society at Wellington. I was asked to address the young people, and as many present were pledged active C.E. members, we were able to have a regular Christian Endeavour meeting, at which many took part.

At Graaff Reinet there is also a strong C.E. Society, commenced after a Mission held there by Rev. Andrew Murray, and at Rondebosch, a suburb of Cape Town, I had the pleasure of telling some friends about this movement, who have resolved to form a society.

Will all Christian Endeavourers who read this join in prayer to God for his special blessing and guidance on these South African C.E. societies, and that the movement may spread here?

UNUSED TALENTS.

DEAR SIR,—A devoted Christian worker in Surrey has lately discovered an unused talent of which he has now begun to avail himself. It is a horse and roomy chaise, in which he drives a portable harmonium, a lady to play it, and half-a-dozen willing helpers, to the dark villages in his neighbourhood on Sundays. Open-air services are thus held with surprising ease; we send the preacher from Saturday to Monday.

How many have "unused talents" of this sort, which in these glorious days might be used for the Master! Some have lawns where they might gather audiences for Gospel services with delightful facility. A few printed invitations issued, some seats, an instrument, a preacher sent by the Open-Air Mission, and the thing is done. Those are the externals, but the issue who can tell?—Yours faithfully, FRANK COCKREM.

THE GOSPEL IN CANADA.

MR. W. R. LANE has completed two eight-day missions in Hamilton, Canada, that have been very much blessed. Lord Bennet assisted him with his musical gifts. The first of these missions was in St. John's Presbyterian Church, of which the Hon. and Rev. Reynolds Moreton is pastor in the east-end of the city; the second was in Erskine Presbyterian Church, of which Rev. J. G. Shearer is pastor, in the west-end of the city. These churches are about two and-a-half miles apart, so that the fields are quite distinct.

The services were well attended in both churches, but better in the latter, because Mr. Lane and Lord Bennet were becoming better known and the meetings were better advertised. A Canadian correspondent reports great good to have been done in stirring up Christians, in restoring backsliders, and in winning the unconverted. Mr. Lane's pointed, practical, and sometimes truly eloquent preaching, and Lord Bennet's singing, were alike highly appreciated by all who heard them.

Mr. Lane is now at work in the Dominion Capital, Ottawa, whence he goes to Montreal; after which he returns to England.

AS HE WENT, HE WAS CLEANSED.

BY REV. B. FAY MILLS.

ONE night I had invited to come to the after meeting all persons who desired to do right, but who were not as yet believers in Christ. I noticed among those who responded to this invitation a man with a pale, intelligent face, who looked as though he were suffering from great unrest. After a time I asked him if he desired to say a word, and he rose up and said: "You exactly described me in your invitation; I want to do right, but I do not believe in Christ." After that service was done, he asked me if he might speak with me.

When asked what would be the object of the conversation, he said: "I desire to get more light as to how I can lead a righteous life; but I cannot bring myself to believe in Christ." I said: "Then it is understood that, in this conversation, we shall be concerned about one thing, and that is, how you may get light as to the way in which you can live a righteous life. Will you agree, as soon as you see anything that is wrong, that you will give it up; and, as soon as you see clearly anything that is right, you will agree to do it?" He said: "That is only fair, and I will give you my hand on that." I said: "Then we will commence the conversation. What do you do that is wrong?" He said he could not see what that had to do with his finding out concerning the truth of the Bible and the divinity of Christ. I told him that that was the only way to find out any truth, and asked him if he were not conscious that there were things about his life that were morally wrong. He said yes. He finally said, in a hesitating way, that he sometimes became intoxicated. He kept liquor in his home, but never drank it in a public place. I said: "Will you give it up?" He replied: "This conversation is too personal; I wanted to talk with you about the difficulties in the way of becoming a Christian. I can point out fifteen contradictions and inconsistencies in the Gospel of Matthew"; and so he rattled on for three or four minutes.

When he had finished, I said, "Will you give up the drink?" He said, "What right have you to ask me that question?" I said, "You have already agreed to do it, and there is only one way to get right, and that is to give up what you know is wrong. If you are an honest man you will have to do what you agreed at the beginning of this conversation, and make up your mind not to drink any more." After some hesitation, he said, "Well, I will give it up." I said, "Then we will go on to the second point in the argument. What else do you do that is wrong?" He squirmed around for a few minutes, and then said that sometimes he was cross to his wife and children; and, after a discussion similar to the former one, he said he would give this up. We then went on to talk about some things that he felt he ought to do.

He had said, in the conversation, that he believed there was a God, but that he did not believe in Christ nor in the Bible. I asked him if he ever prayed. He said he had once or twice, and when asked what he said when he prayed, he replied: "I said I thought this was a pretty good kind of a world." I told him I thought that was not a very bad prayer, but that he needed to tell God that if He could reveal his will to him he was ready to do it. After some hesitation, he knelt down, in a very awkward way, and said: "I cannot say any more than this; that if God will show me what He wants me to do, I am ready to do it." I said I thought that was one of the best prayers I had ever heard, and bade him good-night.

I did not speak with him again for a week, at the close of which time he came into the inquiry meeting again, and, standing up, he said: "Something tells me that I must acknowledge Jesus Christ. For thirty-five years I have been a blasphemer. The first twenty years of my life I lived in a godless home; the last fifteen years I have been an open infidel, but for the past week I have been trying, with all my heart, for the first time in my life, to give up what I know is wrong, and to commence to do what I know I ought to do, asking God for light and help in my endeavour, and to-night I am forced, in a way that I cannot explain, to stand here and say that I believe in Jesus Christ as the Son of God." That was on Friday evening. On Sunday evening his wife came to one of the pastors, and said: "We had a great bonfire at our house to-day, and burnt up all my husband's infidel library."—New York Independent.

Y.M.C.A.

BRITISH CONFERENCE, SHEFFIELD, JUNE 13—16.

(BY A CORRESPONDENT.)

This year's Conference will be remembered by all who were privileged to take part in it as a profitable, varied, and interesting occasion. The arrangements were made by experienced hands and were fulfilled without a hitch. The Sheffield friends entertained their guests with great heartiness, and her public men, from the Mayor and Master Cutler downwards, threw their energies into the proceedings with zest and kindliness.

The Conference delegates, numbering about three hundred, were on Tuesday evening hospitably received by the Mayor and Mayoress of Sheffield in the Mappin Art Gallery, when there were the usual addresses of welcome and response.

WEDNESDAY.

After a well-attended devotional meeting and some official formalities, a paper, entitled "The Work of the Y.M.C.A.—how it may be adapted and extended so as to reach and benefit large numbers of young men," was introduced by Mr. John H. Putterill, Financial Secretary of the City of London Y.M.C.A. The paper dwelt in a lively and earnest spirit with the work at present undertaken, and closed with some valuable suggestions for further development. He urged that the time had arrived when a sustained effort should be made to reach the masses of young men at present untouched by the Association. A brisk discussion followed. While various suggestions were contributed for carrying out the proposals contained in the paper—such as sending papers and magazines, withdrawn from the reading-room, to the soldiers in the neighbouring barracks; the establishing of summer camps for young men and lads; lantern lectures, etc., a tendency was apparent in the speakers to diverge into reports of local work. Towards the close of the session, Mr. George Williams called upon Lord Kinnaird, Mr. E. J. Kennedy (Exeter Hall), and Mr. Thomas Jameson (Liverpool) for their views on the subject. The first-named speaker said that while he agreed that inside the Association there should be no class distinction, yet outside men must be reached by classes. Lord Kinnaird urged increased attention to open-air work amongst the associations with a view to making this department more effective. Mr. Kennedy (Exeter Hall) felt that one of the greatest needs of the work was well-written tracts. Mr. Jameson (Liverpool) mentioned a plan adopted in Liverpool of receiving a batch of young men from large business houses at half the usual fees.

A noon prayer meeting was held, over which Mr. W. H. Seagram presided, and at which Mr. Henry Thorne gave an address. After dinner, Mr. Emerson Bainbridge gave a short account of a recent visit to America, during which he had paid special attention to Association work.

The afternoon was devoted to the reading and consideration of a paper by Mr. George R. Austin, of Sheffield, on "The necessity and usefulness of Special Missions to Young Men and others—how to organise and carry them through." The paper contained many useful hints concerning the organisation of missions. A lively discussion ensued. The necessity of special missions was universally recognised. It was urged that they should be confined to young men, and that they should be well organised. In the end a resolution was moved by Mr. C. Thomson (Bath), and seconded by Mr. T. A. Bailey (Cork), "That the National Council be requested to appoint certain approved office-bearers, who shall be constituted the evangelists of the Young Men's Christian Association." Mr. George Williams undertook that the proposal should be well considered by the Council; the resolution was therefore not pressed.

At night a crowded mass meeting of men was held in the Albert Hall, at which it was computed that there was an attendance of 2,500. Lord Kinnaird, who presided, said he was glad to know that from the Y.M.C.A. the churches got some of their best workers. He believed there was no luxury like working for Jesus Christ, and he trusted the members of the Association would exhibit in their daily life an example of the life of Christ. Rev. T. J. Madden (Liverpool), in a spirited address, dealt with physical and intellectual attainments, but came back to his first theme, that man's highest end is to glorify God. Rev. Hugh Price Hughes followed. He blamed the Y.M.C.A. for not taking a prominent part as an Association in the battles waging against intemperance, gambling, covetousness, and social purity. Mr. Hughes did not mince his language, and, being an orator, he naturally swayed the hearts of those to whom he spoke, evoking great applause. Throughout his remarks he addressed himself more to the duty of the individual in his personal and church relations, taking part in these social struggles, than to the wisdom of the Association, as a whole, identifying itself with such questions.

THURSDAY.

Mr. C. Belk, vice-president of the Sheffield Y.M.C.A., took the chair this morning at the resumed Conference sitting. There was a large attendance. Mr. David Elder (Glasgow) read a paper on "The Y.M.C.A.: its relations to the Churches and the Community." At one time the Y.M.C.A. was regarded as a rival and antagonist to the churches. This view, he believed, had now disappeared for ever. Its true relationship was now recognised as that of an auxiliary and training school. It also was an efficient factor in bringing the several Christian communions into closer fellowship. Mr. Elder considered that, as regards the relation of the Association to the community, it should undertake pioneer work in social questions needing reform; and that a Public Action Committee to initiate such action should form part of each association. After some discussion, a second brief paper was read by Mr. S. A. Martin (Kingstown) on "The privileges and responsibilities of the membership of the Associations." The joint discussion on these two papers merged into the consideration of a proposal to memorialise Parliament in favour of the Local Veto Bill. After a somewhat warm contention, in which Mr. George Williams very happily intervened, the chairman ruled the proposal out of order.

After the noon prayer meeting, the delegates adjourned to dinner at the Cutlers' Hall, Mr. T. G. Shuttleworth presiding on behalf of the Sheffield Y.M.C.A. Committee. Adjournment was then made to the Botanical Gardens, where Mr. Emerson Bainbridge again entertained the delegates and their hosts. In the evening the Master Cutler (Mr. J. F. Atkinson) gave an "at home" in the Cutlers' Hall.

At a subsequent meeting in the banqueting hall, reports of work were given by representatives of the three kingdoms—Mr. John Wilkinson (Ireland), Mr. R. Henderson Smith (Scotland), and Mr. W. H. Mills (England). Dean Lefroy spoke of the great improvement in the condition of young men that had become apparent as the result of the efforts of the last fifty years. He drew attention to what he considered an exceedingly grave matter—the prevailing abstention of men from public worship. He pointed out some of the evils likely to result from this non-attendance, and some of the causes. He went on to speak of social questions, which should at appropriate times occupy the attention of their members, such as labour and capital, thriftless and improvident marriages, strong drink, etc. The drink question, he believed, was not to be settled by legislation, but by individual action, exemplary self-denial, education, and the promotion of a healthy tone of public thought and morality. He marvelled that the whole nation did not rise up as one man, and deal with the drink question, seeing the terrible evils it produced.

FRIDAY.

In the morning there was a communion service at the parish church, conducted by the Venerable Archdeacon Blakeney, vicar. Dean Lefroy gave an address from Ps. lxxi. 14.

The final session of the Conference was held in the Montgomery Hall. Brief papers on Association topics were contributed by various workers. At the close of each questions were put to, and answered by, the readers. This led on naturally to what is known in Association circles as "Question Drawer." Mr. W. Hind Smith presided, and replied to the various interrogatories. These included inquiries as to bagatelle, billiards, smoking, the amalgamation of Y.M.C.A.'s and Y.W.C.A.'s. To all these inquiries Mr. Smith gave an uncompromising negative.

Dinner at the Cutlers' Hall, presided over by Mr. C. Wardlow, and a visit to some of the celebrated works for which the city is world-famed, brought the Conference to a close.

The general secretaries present went en masse to Matlock, in which pleasant town they hold, during the ensuing week, a Secretarial Conference.

THE Y.M.C.A.

Mr. Thos. Moffett, of the Newcastle Y.M.C.A., has accepted the secretaryship of the Leeds Association.

Mr. Hannant, for two and a-half years secretary at Hull, has left to take up the post of general secretary of the Burton-on-Trent Association.

All the way from Cape Town we have a neat little "Handbook to the Y.M.C.A.," showing a large amount of vigorous work. Also we observe many evangelistic arrangements and Bible talks.

The York Association held successful open-air services in the Market Place during the race week. Some professed faith in Christ, and it is hoped that as a result of the preaching, and the tracts freely distributed, many more were reached.

The open-air meetings by the Kingstown Y.M.C.A. Open-air Mission have this year begun with great promise, and an earnest body of Christian workers and friends attend every Monday and Wednesday evening at the entrance to East Pier, to sing and preach the Gospel. This has been done with much acceptance, and only on one occasion has there been any real opposition.

The half-yearly conference of the South Wales District Union was held at Abergavenny on the 8th inst. under the presidency of Mr. W. A. Baker, of Newport. In the afternoon Mr. T. W. Beveridge introduced the topic, "The young men outside the churches: Can we reach them?" In the evening a public meeting was held in the lecture hall, at which addresses were delivered by Messrs. W. A. Baker, G. Rutter, W. Hind Smith, W. Pratt, and Fred C. Bennett. The proceedings throughout were hearty and helpful.

On Thursday, June 8, there was a very interesting gathering in the rooms of the Dublin Association, the chief object being to allot the prizes given by a friend for the best answers to questions on the Gospel of John, and for committing to memory the 103rd Psalm and the 8th chapter of Romans. The competition being quite a new feature in the work, aroused a great deal of interest. This new departure in Y.M.C.A. work might well be taken up elsewhere, and be a means of stirring up fresh interest in the study of the Word of God.

The work of the Bridgwater Association, which for some time past has suffered some depression, is now being revived. Messrs. G. Newton and J. Shawcross have been appointed honorary secretaries, and a social meeting recently held to introduce them was so successful as to augur well for the future career of the association. Bridgwater is peculiarly identified with the Y.M.C.A. movement. The founder, Mr. George Williams, was apprenticed in that town, and it is there that a handsome memorial building, paid for by subscriptions from all parts of the world, has been erected in his honour.

The International Y.M.C.A. Training School, Springfield, Mass., is devoted exclusively to preparing men for the general secretaryship and physical directorship of associations. In this it has been so far successful that one out of every ten secretaries and four out of every ten physical directors now employed by the associations in the United States and Canadian provinces have been students at the school, and five in France, Germany, New South Wales, and the Sandwich Islands. During the past five years the school has received the promise of over 45,000 dollars towards the purchase of land and the erection of buildings.

The National Council of Y.M.C.A.'s held their half-yearly meeting at Leeds last week. Mr. George Williams presided, and representatives attended from London and many provincial centres. Mr. W. H. Mills, secretary, presented reports showing thirty-nine new associations, and a membership increase of 3467. Over two hundred places it was stated had been visited by the travelling secretaries, and many visits in the interest of the work had also been made by the chairman, and Messrs. Haley (Wakefield), Kennedy, and MacInnes. Special reports dealing with proposed extension of the work at home and in the foreign field, were presented by Messrs. Kennedy and Macinnes, and proposals for the admission of kindred societies into fellowship, were reported by Mr. Hind-Smith. Mr. R. J. Whitwell read the report of a special committee for strengthening the representative character of the national executive, and the preliminary arrangements for the International Conference at London next year, and the issue of an appeal on the occasion for a jubilee fund of £25,000, were approved.

THE Y.W.C.A. IN SWEDEN.—Madame De Ramsey, of Wilhelmsro, Jonkoping, writes:—"Our Y.W.C.A. had its closing meeting on June 1. It was a very happy gathering. This Association was formed in 1878. Since then it has spread all over Sweden, and its periodical, edited in Stockholm, Homewards, is a success in every sense."

BRITISH SAILORS IN FRANCE.

The response to my appeal in The Christian in November last, for means to secure premises for a "Sailors' Rest" in Dunkerque, has enabled me to take the rooms which were opened on March 24 as "Sailors' Rest and Reading Rooms." The house occupies a commanding position facing the three largest docks, and opposite the dock gates, so that sailors entering the port see at once the blue board with white letters, and Bethel flag floating above, inviting them to a place of rest and security.

That they appreciate this effort for their welfare is amply proved by the fact that over 600 have visited the rooms since the opening. Notwithstanding the hundreds of drink shops that line the quays, with their myriad temptations, young sailors come up to spend their evenings at the Rest. It is pleasant to see them writing letters or enjoying the wholesome reading so plentifully provided.

We are greatly encouraged by the blessing attending the Gospel meetings. The bright, hearty singing and simple message of salvation have reached the heart of more than one young sailor, whom we have had the joy of leading to the Saviour, and who has gone back to his shipmates to witness of Him. Lack of space forbids me to tell of the grand opportunities for temperance work in this port, where thirty thousand pounds of British money is sunk annually in drink. A week never passes without some pledges being taken, men often coming for the purpose of doing so.

Funds are needed for the support and development of the work. There are many open doors we would like to enter in this land of spiritual darkness. A. Stewart Mackenzie.

ON THE CORNISH COAST.

In response to Mr. Cook's invitation I joined the new Mission steamer at Penzance on Whit-Monday for a few days' mission work. Through the good hand of God upon him, Mr. Henry Cook has succeeded, despite huge obstacles and much opposition, in building a useful steamer specially constructed for the work, and although the Good News does not seat so many as the Herald of Mercy, yet in other respects she is far and away the most suitable vessel that the Mission has yet sent forth.

After my arrival we remained six days in the dock at Penzance, where good meetings were held nightly, and many tokens of God's presence and power were received. On the morning of the 29th ult. we steamed out of harbour, and in less than two hours we had reached the Longships Lighthouse. Mr. Cook and I were soon climbing up the winding staircase, preceded and followed by three hearty lighthouse men.

After we had seen the working of the lamp we went down into the kitchen, where we conducted a short service, for which the men were most grateful, as also for a good supply of books, tracts, almanacs, Revised New Testaments, and plum cake. On signing our names in the visitors' book, we found that we made the number of visitors up to four for the year. This will show what a lonely life these men live, and one can readily imagine how much they appreciate a visit from the Mission-boat. "Come again soon; we shall always be glad for you to spend an hour with us," was the unanimous cry of not only the men at the Longships, but also at the Wolf, Rock, and Eddystone Lighthouses and Portland Lightship, which were all subsequently visited.

Amongst the many places visited on our homeward journey were Truro and St. Mawes. Interesting and inspiriting services were conducted, the ship being crowded in every part by large and attentive congregations. At the last-mentioned place an old pilot over ninety-five years of age jumped on board as nimbly as a man of fifty, and in the prayer-meeting heartily thanked God for sending the ship into St. Mawes.

Pastors, evangelists, and Christian workers needing rest and change, willing to work for a few days on either the English or French coasts, would do well to communicate with Mr. Cook, Stoke-road, Gosport.

Letters to the Editor.

"A RANSOM FOR MANY."

Dear Sir,—In the present crisis it surely behoves the saints and the faithful earnestly to contend for the Old and New Testament teaching (by type and anti-type) that our blessed Lord was our substitutional sin-offering and our representative sin-bearer.

I thank Mr. Meyer for maintaining, on p. 19 of June 8, that "Christ suffered for us, and gave his life a ransom instead of many." Our blessed Lord Himself, in plain and literal terms, spoke of having come "to give his life a ransom for many." Here our Lord distinctly refers to Himself as a substitutional sin-offering. His life was his own, never forfeited by sin. "That He might sanctify the people by his own blood, [He] suffered without the gate" (Heb. xiii., Lev. vi. 25—30).

The word "ransom," Gr. lutron, a price of redemption (Liddell and Scott), is thus used by Demosthenes and Josephus—also an atonement. But his life was given, "anti pollōn," for many. The preposition anti denotes "for, for the sake of, upon account of, in the stead of." Can, I ask, any words be used which would, or could, describe more plainly a substitutional sin-offering? Liddell and Scott give a quotation to denote worth, or value, "anti pollōn laōn esti,"—he is worth many people; hence instead of. The two passages, sacred and profane, are identical, and their meaning a substitutional ransom. But how much more, then, is Jesus worth many people!

If we wish to be partakers of his inheritance (Ephes. i. 7-14) we must ever hold by "The Atonement." No Agnosticism for us, no Unitarian nor Theosophic sophistry; fruit from the shores of the Dead Sea!

"That which is born of the flesh, is flesh," i.e. cannot see beyond its natural environment—whether "high critic" or scholar.

If the blind thus lead the blind, both fall into the ditch! for if we listen to "false apostles, deceitful workers, Satan fashioning himself into an angel of light," and thus deny our Lord's Deity, and the Atonement, it will be with us, "an end according to our works"—grace withheld because never sought.—Yours faithfully, Edwd. W. Forster.

THE BOYS' BRIGADE.

Dear Sir,—I am sorry to see in The Christian your comments on the Boys' Brigade, because I am quite sure that if you had any personal knowledge of the real work for God that the Brigade is doing you would have written very differently. I can, however, understand that it might be possible for any one in the audience at Exeter Hall on the 2nd inst. to think that we were giving undue prominence to the military side of the work, which in reality is only a subsidiary thing.

In The Christian of May 25 I find these words under the heading "To Parents and Teachers":—"Please do not talk about saving the country by saving the young men; it cannot be done. Take the boys in hand; if you wait till they are young men, you will never come within sight of them. When I was seventeen my character and habits were fixed." I think all Christians will admit that this is true, and yet while much is being done for young men what is being done for the boys? Truly we have Sunday-schools, and here and there a boys' club, but that is all. I have taught in a London Sunday-school and have superintended, but I always felt that to get a real hold of the mass of the boys something more was needed. My experience (and I think most Sunday-school workers will agree) is that boys come very regularly till they are getting on towards thirteen years of age (i.e., as long as they obey their mothers and go when they are sent), but a little later they get irregular, and a large proportion drop off in the course of the next year.

The object of the officers of the B.B. is to get hold of the boys as soon as possible after they are twelve, and keep the hold till they are seventeen, when they have to leave the Brigade. These boys want to be men; they think it is a manly thing to smoke, but do not think it manly for a man to be an out-and-out Christian. We want to show them that they can carry their religion into all they do; we try to get to know them; in our own company we have a band, a club evening for games, etc., a gymnasium, and during the summer we have cricket, swimming, and then many of the boys go to the camp at Hayling for a week. We have a large Bible-class on Sunday morning of over forty boys, and in addition on one evening of the week we have our drill. This is what you and others object to; but I can only say the boys like it; that by keeping up a certain amount of military discipline at all our meetings, whether Bible-class or gymnasium, we are able to manage things in a manner that would be perfectly impossible otherwise and it speedily produces a great change in the manners and appearance of the boys.

I never heard that if boys used "single-sticks" they want to fight with swords, and we use the model rifles simply to give additional interest to the drill, and I do not believe that a boy ever bothers himself a bit about the real object of a real rifle. I have been in command of a company (the 13th London) in connection with one of the Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe's poor districts for five years; every boy when he joins must promise to be an abstainer both from alcohol and tobacco, and not to play with or for money. Some 300 boys have passed through the ranks, and during that time one boy, who had been to sea before, has joined the navy, and one other has gone into the Marines. I do not believe that in either case the boys were in any way influenced by the drill they had in the Brigade, but I can say that both are doing well, have joined the temperance society, and are reading their Bibles, and will, I believe, be centres for good in their different spheres.

You write almost as if boys who had been to Sunday-school never went into the army, but surely a much greater proportion than two in three or four hundred Sunday-school boys do enlist. I will not take up any more of your space, but I can assure you that I should have never taken the trouble to learn the drill and give up a good deal of what little spare time I have simply to teach boys drill, much less fighting. Our real object, not our "official object," as you put it, is "the advancement of Christ's kingdom among boys, and of all that tends towards a true Christian manliness"; and I am sure that if some of our critics would take the trouble to see how the units of the Brigade work, their fears would very rapidly vanish away.—Yours very faithfully,

Herbert Lankester, M.D.

[We have received a similar letter from "A Mother of Boys." We frankly recognised, in our remarks on the B.B., that the motives of many of the workers were manifestly pure and their object good. We objected to their method. Our correspondent's letter admits our contentions. The drill, and not the influence of Christian words and example, keeps the boys right, and "the rifle adds interest to the drill." The boys may "like" this, but that proves nothing in its favour. They would "like" a great many other things. Other bad or doubtful things have been defended on similar grounds. The gist of the whole matter is here:—Rifles are made and used to kill men with; military drill is to make men efficient soldiers; the Gospel has been sent to bring war to an end; therefore the Church's business is not to teach soldiering, either directly or indirectly.—Ed.]

Soldiers and Preaching.

We understand that an important decision has been arrived at by the military authorities on the subject of officers and soldiers giving religious addresses in public. It appears that an officer in Halifax, Nova Scotia, was advertised to give a lecture on Christian Evidences in a church, at the invitation of the chaplain. The commanding officer forbade the officer to deliver his address, and one of the local papers took up the matter. An influential M.P. addressed Mr. Campbell-Bannerman on the subject, and, after some consideration, it has been decided that the liberty of an officer or soldier is not to be restricted in the matter of giving addresses, unless the individual deals with controversial topics, and then the general officer will exercise his discretion in the matter. For instance, it is obvious that in a country like Wales, with a strong Nonconformist element, it would not do for a officer to create ill-feeling by lecturing on the maintenance of an Established Church, nor would it do for an officer who held strong Protestant views to lecture publicly in a country like Malta, in which a strong Roman Catholic element prevails. Briefly stated, therefore, the authorities do not wish to restrict the liberty of such men as the late General Gordon, Sir Henry Havelock, Sir Hope Grant, etc., in religious matters, but they will not allow them to exercise their liberty if such action is likely to lead to disturbance.—The Times.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER.—For blessing on open-air meetings and house-to-house visitation at Knockholt, Sevenoaks.—That much blessing may result from the visits of the Gospel cyclists to the villages and towns (S.W.) Essex, on Saturday afternoons, to hold short Gospel meetings in the open air.—For barn meetings at Upton, Torquay, being conducted by Mr. John Elliott.—A sister, on behalf of the family, brothers and sisters, sorely suffering through circumstances over which they had no control.—PRAISE.—For great blessing at Romford on 17th inst., when several professed to find Christ.

POST CARDS.

CUPAR, FIFE.

Mr. T. W. Canning, of the Evangelisation Society, commenced the second week of a series of evangelistic meetings in Cupar, Fife, under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A., in a large tent, on Sunday, June 11. The meetings during the week were well attended, and much good has been done. Mr. Canning's addresses are full of love and power, and God is using him in Cupar for his own glory.

CANONBURY.

The Islington Auxiliary of the Open-air Mission has started an effort to reach the non-church-going masses by means of open-air meetings held from 11 till 1 on Sunday morning. A good muster of workers (supported by the Goodinge-road brass band) were present, and a most enthusiastic and practical meeting took place. One of the leading thoroughfares—Canonbury-road—has been selected for these services. Open-air workers are heartily invited to assist. A.

ALTON VILLAGE MISSION.

God has graciously blessed this work to the conversion of souls. During the last thirty years of our pastorate many young men have been raised up to become acceptable preachers and Sunday-school teachers. During the last three months nine young men have been admitted to fellowship, and others are waiting. The labours of our village helper, Miss Lownes, have been owned in the establishment of a Young Men's Bible class, also a meeting for women, at which many attend during the winter season.

GOSPEL CYCLISTS.

The visit of the "Gospel Cyclists" to Romford on Saturday evening, 17th inst., was a time of much blessing. The novelty of young men coming into the town on cycles, and holding a meeting in the Market Place, drew a large crowd, and the Word was with power Several at the close professed to have decided for Christ at the meeting. Any earnest young men willing to help in this work on Saturday afternoons should communicate at once with the secretary, Mr. A. F. Borton, Hermon Hill, Wanstead.

LAWYERS' PRAYER UNION.

The fiftieth half-yearly meeting for law clerks was held on Thursday evening, June 15, at the mission hall adjoining St. George's Church, Bloomsbury. The chair was occupied by Mr. Baron Pollock, and the speakers included Mr. Archibald, Mr. P. V. Smith, Mr. W. R. Moore, and two law clerks. Many good words of warning and encouragement were given by the chairman and speakers, all of them hard-working lawyers, who spoke from long experience of the profession, and its dangers and privileges.

GOSPEL CARAVAN.

The Gospel Caravan has been stationed during the last few days amongst the villages of Oxfordshire, including Charlton-on-Ottmoor, Ambrosden, Hidlington, Thrupp, Hampton, Poyle, and Wolvercote. The work of open-air preaching, tract distribution, and colportage has been carried on in all these places, and welcome help in the services has been rendered by young men connected with the New-road Church, Oxford (Rev. Jas. Dann's) and others. In all the villages visited much eagerness has been manifested to hear the Gospel, and great kindness received. The sales of Testaments and Bibles is most encouraging, and shows the need for the early extension of this department.

A LITTLE EFFORT

made for the extension of God's kingdom has lately, through his blessing, met with some success. A Christian worker in London proposed that a sum of money sufficient to support a "missionary substitute" abroad should be collected in small amounts from a number of friends, each subscription to be extra to what the donors were already giving to the missionary cause. Bishop Tucker wrote that for £18 two native agents could be supported in East Africa. This sum was quickly raised and sent out. Another £12 was then collected, by means of which a school was opened and a native teacher provided for the Hill Aryans in India. Thus for the small sum of £30 per annum three native workers are now labouring under tried missionaries in those distant lands.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

A respectable-looking man recently called upon Mr. Hugh Davies, chemist, Machynlleth, saying he had made up his mind if he ever came near that he would call and see him. He said he was present at the Tramps' Lodging House, two years ago, on a Sunday evening when Mr. Davies and a few Christian friends spoke words of comfort and hope. The tract which he had received proved a blessing to him, and although he was then in a sad and despairing condition, he heard something that night that started him on an upward career. The Lord had been good to him, and he is now in business for himself. He left his name and address, thanking Mr. Davies with a warm heart, and blessing the friends who interest themselves in this work of love.

TEMPERANCE NOTES.

The Ibberton, Belchalnell, and Woolland Temperance Societies' fête was held last week.

The annual report of the London City Mission states that 1867 drunkards were reclaimed by its agents last year.

The U.S.A. Consul in Belgium has reported that there are in that country 750,000 voters, of whom more than one-fourth are proprietors, managers, or agents of drinking saloons.

A conference of temperance workers has been held at St. Cuthbert's Hall, Bedford, when papers were read by Rev. A. C. Downe, Mr. Stimson, Mrs. E. Ransom, and Mr. Sutcliffe.

At the annual meeting of the Salisbury branch of the C.E.T.S., held at Sherborne, it was stated that over 100 clergy in the diocese were total abstainers, and the ordinary members numbered 20,913.

The teaching of temperance principles in day schools has obtained the approval of the Education Department. During last year it was adopted in over 300 departments of schools in Lancashire.

State School Superintendent Poland has announced that it will be hereafter a rule of the Educational Department that school teachers who use intoxicating liquor cannot teach in the public schools of New Jersey.

On Wednesday week a meeting was held in the girls' schoolroom, in connection with the C.E.T.S., at Brentwood. Flowers were brought by the members and others, and sent at the close of the meeting to the poor at All Hallows, Poplar.

It is very significant to find in the American Economist, of New York, the following sentence in a leading editorial:—"The drink curse costs us over 800,000,000dols. yearly. Errors of currency or tariff are a feather's weight beside it."

The decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of the Percy Supper Club is regarded with much satisfaction, as showing that proprietary clubs are already, even as the law stands, within reach of the law. The Morning Advertiser believes that the decision hits nine out of every ten proprietary clubs.

Under the auspices of the Liverpool Direct Veto Society, the whole of the city of Liverpool and neighbourhood is being canvassed from house to house, to ascertain the feeling of the people as a whole in reference to the bill now before the Commons. All denominations are joining in the canvass.

The annual conference in connection with the Carnarvonshire and Vale of Conway Temperance Union was held on Saturday at Rhostryfan, near Carnarvon. The morning session was presided over by Rev. D. Adams, B.A., Bethesda. Rev. Ishmael Evans, the retiring president of the Union, delivered an eloquent address dealing with the evils of intemperance and the suppression of the liquor traffic.

The open-air Sunday drinking at Cardiff, which has attracted so much notice, has been suppressed, Lord Windsor, on whose land the so-called club had on previous Sundays been run, having given notice that he would prosecute as trespassers any person found drinking on his property. Late in the afternoon a number of working men formed a club on the banks of the river, but were warned off by the police.

A united demonstration in favour of the Direct Veto Bill was held in Manchester on Saturday, under the auspices of the temperance organisations of Manchester and Salford. At each of the meetings a resolution was passed in favour of the bill. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, M.P., said in the course of his address that though the present bill might not be the best bill that could be produced, yet it was a very good one, and his advice was, let them take what they could get, and look for more.

The American Consul at Copenhagen reports to the State Department that the relation of intoxicants to poverty, immorality, and crime in Denmark is very marked, when, with a total population of 2,266,000, the consumption of intoxicating drinks per head of the population is five gallons of distilled spirits and eight gallons of lager beer. In Sweden, where Local Option exists, the quantity consumed per head of the population is only one and three-ninths of a gallon of spirits. Before the change of the law, Sweden was quite as drunken as Denmark.

A meeting was held a few days since in the boardroom of the Church of England Temperance Society, for the formation of an Army Temperance Association for England, upon similar lines to that worked with such conspicuous success by Lord Roberts in India. The Chaplain-General, who presided, stated that the Church of England Temperance Society and the National Temperance League had agreed to relinquish their distinctive work in the Army, and had combined to aid the formation of a new society. General Lord Roberts gave an interesting account of the work in India, stating that one-third of the whole Indian Army were now total abstainers.

UNIVERSITY NOTES.

OXFORD.

It is hoped that an "Oxford Camp" will be formed at Keswick during the Convention, and that it may prove of abiding blessing to the work here.

The Baptist students of the University have formed themselves into a "Baptist Guild," and are rendering valuable services to the city and country churches.

Primitive Methodism in Oxford is doing a good even though quiet work among the very poorest, and a very encouraging anniversary has just been held at the New Street Chapel.

The Home Missions of New Road Baptist Chapel are doing good work in the neighbouring village, as shown by the testimonies at the recent annual meeting, at which Mr. J. Crofton Rainey spoke.

The latest news of the Principal of Wycliffe Hall is more favourable, but the doctors order a complete rest of at least three months, and after that great caution will be necessary. Prayer is asked from many old Oxford men who are readers of The Christian.

Mansfield College annual meeting was held last week, when a very encouraging report was given of the past year's work, telling of an increasing number of students and an enlarged teaching staff, with good news of the Canning Town Settlement, and other branches of work which emanate from Mansfield.

That well-known servant of God, Canon Christopher, read a most valuable paper at Cheltenham last week, on "The Evangelical Teaching of To-day" in which he gave the testimonies of several representative Christian men, to whom he had applied for opinions. The paper is quite unique in several respects, and deserves much prayerful consideration.

The foundation-stone of the new Congregational Church at Summertown was laid on June 13th by Mr. W. Crossfield, M.P., of Liverpool, in the presence of a large and representative gathering of Oxford ministers and other Christian workers. Summertown is now such an important suburb of Oxford that a church is imperatively needed for those who worship as Congregationalists. It will be remembered that the late Rev. J. B. French was the minister of the church, and to his zeal and earnestness the prosecution of the work owes a great deal.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

At the Vale of Clwyd monthly meeting, Rev. J. Verier Jones, of Rhyl, explained the Christian Endeavour Movement, which was recommended to be adopted by every church within the district.

In connection with the visit which Dr. Clark, of Boston, is now paying to Great Britain, a reception meeting was held at Manchester. Rev. Dr. Maclaren offered prayer, and gave a cordial welcome to Dr. Clark.

At the conclusion of the sessions of the Y.P.S.C.E. at Bradford, the Methodist New Connexion representatives were entertained by Rev. T. Sowby, at Manville Chapel, and afterwards a resolution was passed requesting the Conference to adopt the "Christian Endeavour" movement as a denominational organisation.

Dr. and Mrs. F. E. Clark addressed a meeting at Carr's-lane Chapel, on Friday, under the auspices of the Birmingham and District C.E. Union. Rev. E. Abbott occupied the chair, and stated that there were twenty-three societies in Birmingham, with a membership of about 1100. Rev. George Barber, in welcoming Dr. Clark, emphasised the spiritual aspects of the movement.

After holding cottage meetings during the winter, the Wellhouse (Moravian) C.E.S. at Mirfield have begun open-air services. The first was held on Monday week, and largely attended by a class of people, chiefly colliers, who cannot be induced to enter a place of worship. Their attention was very encouraging. The service was conducted by Rev. E. R. Hasse. It is intended to be the first of a regular series during the summer and autumn.

THE VICTORIA-STREET ANTI-VIVISECTION SOCIETY.—Canon Wilberforce presided on Wednesday last over the annual meeting of this Society for the protection of animals from vivisection. The annual report, read by the secretary (Mr. B. Bryan), spoke of the vigorous prosecution of the work by every available means, and regretted that the Act of Parliament regulating vivisection still continues to act as a protection to the vivisector rather than to the animal. Resolutions were adopted affirming the moral indefensibility of experiments upon living animals, and declining to accept the claim that such experiments are necessary in the interests of scientific inquiry or the practice of the art of healing, inasmuch as their results have again and again proved to be not only unreliable, but also misleading.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Mr. JOHN J. MEEK, an evangelist to the Zulus.

We hope none of our readers will pass over the simple, graphic, powerful story of Miss Laura Grundberg. She comes commended to us by Rev. Alexander Francis, pastor of the British-American Church at St. Petersburg, as well as by a very faithful friend who has just returned from Russia. The article "Faith-work in Russia" is the substance of an address given by Miss Grundberg at the last Workers' Meeting in the Home of Industry.

The great naval disaster of last week, by which a British Admiral and nearly 400 men found a watery grave, may be said literally to have eclipsed for a time the gaiety of the nation; a state ball was postponed on receipt of the sad news. Our first thought is of the bereaved relations of those who have faced and met with sudden death in the service of their country. If they had fallen in battle their names and memory would have been held dear. A swift ending has come to their career; let us seek to make up to the wives and children for the loss of the bread-winners. We direct attention to the appeal by Miss Agnes Weston on a succeeding page.

It were bootless to moralise overmuch on the spiritual lessons of the catastrophe. A seafaring man at all times carries his life in his hands, and he has a special call to be ready for emergencies that may cut him off from life and its opportunities. This fact brings into relief the importance of all agencies for the conversion and elevation of our merchant and naval seamen. The disaster also seems to reflect heavily on the wisdom of building such unwieldy monsters of the sea. If these ships can be sent to the bottom in fifteen minutes in a calm sea, and in a peaceful manœuvre, what is likely to happen to them in the rude struggle of war? The imagination almost reels at the thought.

"The debate on the opium traffic to-morrow (Friday) evening will be one of the highest importance. The moral indefensibility and sin of the traffic are more clearly recognised by all parties than ever before, and the question of abolition will turn on the point whether the sin can be given up, even if it involve a temporary sacrifice of about £3,000,000 per annum. In these circumstances there is a call to all to take their place where they can help to the right issue of the debate. Our place is not in the House of Commons, where the decision must be reached, but on the mount of prayer, pleading with Him in whose hands are the hearts of men. Our London members are invited to a special meeting for prayer to be held on the night of the debate in the Friends' Meeting House, 52, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross. The meeting will commence at 7.30 p.m., and it is hoped that very many will endeavour to be present. We would urge our friends all over the country to seek to arrange for gatherings for prayer on that night. Even the two or three are mighty." The foregoing is from a circular issued by the Christian Union for the suppression of the opium traffic.

The daily papers briefly described a "scene" which took place at Exeter Hall last week at the meeting called to protest against legalised vice in India, and which we have reported elsewhere. We could wish to believe that the men who made it were in simple earnest, but they are said to appear at all sorts of meetings, and to behave everywhere in much the same way. They pressed as an amendment what was no amendment at all—a resolution affirming that "the social evil" is due to the poverty caused by the present relation of capital and labour, which drives women to keep themselves by vice. We can understand the violence of a man who has had a daughter or a sister ruined as the result of poverty, and we can understand his attacking the social system which almost, if not absolutely, causes the poverty. Anyhow, the "scene" may well deepen the sympathy of Christians for the poor—for poverty means dire temptation—and their determination to forward all reforms by which men and women may be able to live in virtue and honesty. Vice or starvation is apparently the only alternative of thousands. To say so is to condemn both the State and the Church.

Mrs. Josephine Butler said in Exeter Hall that we were always in danger in our work of falling below its high level of tone and motive; we need screwing up again and again. It is true. We need to be much with God, who alone can imbue us with the spirit of warm love and unselfish zeal. To remain away from Him is sure to lower the tone; we somehow lose our sensitiveness, our intenseness, and our depth of feeling. We hold by the purest motives so long as we abide in Him, but when we become less conscious of Him we also become less conscious of them; we do not emphasise them to ourselves, and when we speak to others we rather employ and enforce secondary considerations than call attention to them. We must keep the tone up.

E. Belfort Bax writes in The Daily News that "everybody who reads his law and police reports knows" that women are habitually treated more leniently by the administrators of our law than men. Now we did not know that, perhaps because we have not studied sufficiently certain columns; but we are ready to believe the testimony, for we do remember how often a sentimental feeling is raised in favour of a female prisoner if she be beautiful, or rich, or titled. Calm justice is rather rare; prejudice or prepossession is apt to mar it. There should be no sex, no rank, no wealth, no poverty, in its sight; or rather, according to the ancient legend, justice should be blind. But how long would it be borne with? It may be blind in the Statute-book, but a judge is all the better for two eyes, and keen ones, in his head.

It has been computed that as much as a million of money is spent on football in a season. How much is spent on cricket and lawn-tennis? The great matches alone, five or six of which are going on every day in various parts of the country, cost a large sum of money, and to that must be added the cost of the innumerable clubs. The same double calculation would have to be made of the tennis matches and clubs. "Good for trade—good for health," is the observation on these pastimes, and we do not deny that at least there is much truth in the statement; but for all that, the thing may have a great danger. The Athenians loved nothing so much as to tell or to hear some new thing; intellectual curiosity may be called a good thing, but intellectual restlessness is not, as Athens in due time came to prove. And this restlessness of our modern days, which robs us of quietness, which consumes time that ought to be given to higher things, which makes us superficial, which turns churches and chapels into something far different from what they used to be, will do us much harm.

The action for libel which was carried against Mr. Farquharson, M.P., is of more importance than the immediate point involved. It raises once more the question of the moral condition of our public schools. Here is a boy sent away to be out of danger, not because he has fallen into danger, and yet an evil rumour is raised about him years afterwards, and just at a critical time of his career. When he appeals to law, we are told on high authority that everybody knows what public schools are, i.e. that they are no better than they should be. If half one hears be true, not only should there be a searching reform, but parents should ask whether they will not do well to keep their children under their own roof until they are old enough to judge of good and evil, as they cannot do when they are very young. And further, instead of leaving it to corrupt boys and girls to fill their minds with forbidden things, ought they not to train them to be pure, as they train them to be honest and truthful?

Persons whose income depends upon money invested in stocks and shares have their "searchings of heart" no less than those who have to confront sinful or doubtful commercial practices. A correspondent puts this question:—

> Is it legitimate trading for me to follow the advice of my share-broker, or even my own judgment, and change my investments for the sake of the profit? Is it right to buy shares to get the dividend, and then sell out in order to buy something else for another dividend?

Though not professing an expert acquaintance with this subject, we cannot but feel convinced that such a course as our correspondent describes is incompatible with legitimate investment. In all essentials it is a system of gambling, participants in which, though they "stand to win" (from others), may one day find themselves involved in unexpected and disastrous loss.

It seems hopeless to expect some persons to grasp the true idea, and to feel the real obligation, of Christian missions. They seem to think that the Church is acting upon some notion of her own, and that she has made an egregious mistake. They point triumphantly to what they call imperfect results, or to the absence of results, and then pronounce judgment accordingly. For this reason, the speech of the Hon. George Curzon, M.P., on behalf of the "slum" districts in St. Matthew's, Westminster, was called "remarkable" by an evening paper. Among other things, he "boldly declared that his experience as a traveller had convinced him that, heroic as were missionary exertions abroad, their results did not justify the expenditure of money and enthusiasm." We have to obey our Lord, and if results are not adequate we must search out our hidden sins and faults; and what if these should be found to lie with the Christians at home who support legalised vice and the liquor traffic and the opium trade?

It is stated that in Japan, where wages are rarely more than sixpence a day, converts to the Gospel gave last year £5400 for mission purposes. An example this, calculated to stimulate those who at home have not as yet learned the privilege of giving at a sacrifice to self. Giving is a privilege quite as much as it is a duty; it is a means of grace to the soul, and brings real blessing in its train. But it must be done on principle, not by impulse, if its blessedness is to be realised. Freeness, cheerfulness, liberality, self-denial, loving regard to the claims of Christ—these are the attributes set forth in Scripture as characteristic of acceptable giving. Happy are all who have learned to regard themselves and all they have, be it little or much, as a whole burnt-offering, laid on the altar of God, and accepted of Him in and through Christ.

Dr. Pierson has said that "the greatest demand of our day is for a higher type of piety on the part of the children of God." The statement is as true, as it is called for by the laxity which prevails on the part of many as to personal consecration of heart and life to God. Salvation and holiness are too frequently looked at as separate experiences. They are really inseparable, both in the purpose of God and in all true spiritual experience. If we are not saved from sin, we are not really saved at all. "For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil;" and that destruction is assuredly effected first of all by delivering those who are born of God from his power, and from the committal of the sins which but for the salvation of Christ would prove us still his captives. A holy life is the best argument we can present for the truth of the Gospel we proclaim.

At the present time, when rationalistic speculation is in a large measure taking the place of sound Christian scholarship, it is needful to exercise care in the selection of books for presentation. An esteemed correspondent, who recently bought the first volume of the re-issue of Smith's well-known "Dictionary of the Bible," expresses great disappointment on finding that the pages reflect in a considerable degree the views of those who would re-write ancient history, and explain away Divine revelation by the uncertain standard of the higher criticism. That Professor Driver is the author of the article on Deuteronomy, is sufficient indication of the destructive trend of things in bringing up to date this well-known work of reference. Others may profit by the unpleasant experience of our correspondent.

Dr. Longstaff has told the Royal Statistical Society what some observers of the habits of other countries already knew, that the depopulation of villages is not peculiar to our own country. The country is too often very dull for the people, and they therefore make for the busy noisy town, where there is plenty to see and hear. Cheap railway travelling also makes it easy for them to gratify their wish. Then, again, the temptation of higher wages is not easy to resist, for the countryman does not know that he will have to pay more rent and heavier rates, and with five or ten shillings a week more wages he will be no better off if he has to pay it away in rent, in tram, train, or 'bus fare, in rates, in doctors' bills. Once in the city he will probably remain there, to be used up in its fierce life, as it uses up horses and cattle. This points to the need for making country life more desirable. Why should our villages not be as beautiful morally and socially as they are physically? We shall have to take to village "slumming" next.

The manner in which ancient customs are revived under new forms and in new places is very curious. The sound of the curfew strikes strangely on the ear when one is walking in a cathedral city such as Durham, and imagination at once speeds back to Norman times. But the Ontario legislature has just passed a measure which is known as a curfew bell measure, because it makes each city responsible to the Provincial Government for the welfare of its waifs and strays, and of the children of dissolute parents. One of its provisions enacts that the children in the streets after nine at night, not being in charge of proper guardians, may be removed. It is a phase of the protection of children to which we have not yet come; the idea was probably suggested by our modern S.P.C., and the nine o'clock limit by our old-world custom. Can we ever say that a thing is obsolete?

Herr Liebknecht, "the veteran leader of the Social Democratic Party" in Germany, has been interviewed by a representative of The Westminster Gazette, to whom he said that he thought the Army Bills are almost sure to pass, even should a hostile majority be returned. The effect upon his party he believed would be good, for the Bills "will aid the spread of general discontent, and will thus put a weapon into our hands of which we shall not fail to make the utmost use." They will continue to agitate against the existing military system; because in the place of it they want a national militia, of which every citizen shall be a member up to the age of forty. This would in a few years number 8,500,000 soldiers for defence, as against 4,500,000 at present; it would cost less, and it could be used only for defensive purposes. This looks very well in theory, but nations get war crazes as well as kings, and a nation of soldiers is something hideous to contemplate. Salvation for the nations will not come by Social Democracy.

"The foolishness of God" is an expression which, taken by itself, almost sounds profane; yet Paul adopts and adapts it, and makes it serve his high purposes. No wonder the ways of God, especially in redemption, appear foolishness to men; yet in their foolishness is their wisdom. To send his own Son as a man appeared foolish, for the assumed humanity concealed the Deity, yet in this revelation we best see and know God. To allow his Son to suffer and die on the cross appeared the very height of foolishness; yet only thus was the deep evil of sin and sinfulness met. The signs of the Jews and the wisdom of the Greeks could not touch conscience and give satisfaction with regard to guilt. To call poor men, rather than scholars and leaders of society, to do this work seemed foolishness; yet He made apostles out of fishermen, teachers out of renewed slaves, and kings of men out of labourers. To make the preaching of the Gospel the means of building up his Kingdom was foolishness, but inasmuch as He proceeds by love and by personal conviction, rather than by force or craft, He has made a Kingdom which owns no nationality, yet stands on every shore.

We have often drawn the attention of our readers to worldly methods resorted to in connection with the Church; but anything more flagrant and out of keeping with the spirit and teaching of Jesus Christ than the following handbill we have never met with:—

Romanism and Mariolatry are convertible terms. This has been much impressed upon us by the perusal of some of the booklets and tracts which are now in circulation in France and Switzerland. It is not of God and his Christ that the priests write and speak, but, addressing the simple-minded, they preach "the Kingdom of Mary." The "All-merciful Queen of Heaven" is represented as saying, "If you love me, console me; listen to me; follow me." The "Divine Mary," "Our Lady of Victories," is apostrophised as the Advocate, Life, and Hope of the faithful, who are urged "to give their hearts to Jesus to please Mary"! Here are some lines from one tract:—

Jesus Christ said, "Seek ye the Kingdom of God, and all other things shall be added unto you." But the Kingdom of God is the kingdom of Mary; since it is by Mary, our Mother, that we are born to the life of grace, and that we arrive at the life of glory.

Well may the correspondent who sends us these tracts say: "Let us who have the unspeakable happiness to know Him who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life, often think in prayer of the millions of darkened souls on the Continent."

GUILDFORD CONVENTION.—In reference to a remark in our report last week, which we much regret, more than one friend writes to the following effect:—"If Mr. Paynter exercised a little more self-effacement the Guildford Convention would itself be effaced altogether. As founder and president of the Conference, he has had no option but to say a few introductory words daily. I have frequently found them profitable and helpful." Others have said that the success of the Conference was largely due to the quiet and dignified attitude of the president, and the spiritual tone of his brief introductory addresses. We sincerely honour Mr. Paynter as one to be highly esteemed in love for his work's sake.

The Opium Iniquity.

In our last issue we drew attention to one of those monstrous evils which England is imposing upon the nations of the East, and referred to a second which deserves the serious attention of all Christian people. On Friday night the great question of the Opium Traffic will be introduced to the consideration of the House of Commons, and we fervently hope that every opportunity will then be given for the full and free discussion of this momentous subject.

Simultaneously with the session of the House, in which speeches and petitions will be presented against the perpetuation of this fearful traffic, another gathering will be held, in which a number of devoted souls will plead with the Almighty Ruler of the universe, whose decisions must stand irrespectively of party or Parliament, that He will graciously interpose, so that this great crime may no longer be enacted in the name of Great Britain. None can have read the touching "Life" of the late Canon Butler without being arrested by the part that prayer-meetings have played in the history of that great movement which we described last week. It is interesting to learn that members of the House were in the habit of referring the strength of the speaking and the decisiveness of the result to the influence exerted by the pleading of earnest souls with the Almighty. More was done by those women on their knees in the Westminster Hotel than was wrought by strenuous advocates on the floor of the House. More things are wrought by prayer than we sometimes think. We believe that whenever the Opium Traffic shall be abolished, it will be more largely due to the prayers of God's people than to any other cause; and we therefore urge all into whose hands these lines may come to set apart some portion of the evening of Friday, June 30, commencing at 7.30, for concerted prayer, that God would show Himself strong on the behalf of those who desire that his will should be perfectly done on earth as it is in heaven.

The story of the iniquitous Opium Traffic has been so often told in these pages that we almost hesitate to recapitulate it here and now. It is only because we believe that young and ardent hearts are constantly stepping forth to take up the causes which have engaged the interest of the earnest workers of a previous generation, that we venture to tell again some of the abominations of the traffic, in the hope that some spirits, fired with love for God, and for man, and for fatherland, will be stirred to devote the energy and influence with which they may be endowed to work in this crusade.

More than a generation has passed since England's war with China to compel that great people to accept, against their will, opium exported from India. It was in vain that the Emperor and his advisers opposed the traffic; in vain that the literati demonstrated that many evils would result; in vain that in the heart of England herself protests were raised by far-seeing Christians. Nothing could deter the British Government from forcing China to admit the opium. Reluctantly, and because she could not do otherwise, China opened some few of her ports, in the hope of restricting the sale to a limited area. But you might as well try to arrest a prairie fire. The passion for opium spread rapidly, until it has become the curse of the major portion of China; and in self-defence the Chinese Government have resorted to the growth and manufacture of opium in the Empire itself, in order to keep the business in their own hands, and in some measure to stay its ravages. Thus, by the unerring working out of that infinite justice which shows itself in the judgment of nations to-day as distinctly as it will show itself in the presence of the Great White Throne, the purposes for which England perpetrated her iniquities are being frustrated. The Indian revenue is decreasing so far as it has been obtained by the sale of Indian opium in China.

But the Nemesis of Divine judgment does not end here. The Indian officials avow that they must have the opium revenue, and they have not hesitated, therefore, to promote the sale of the drug in the last dependency that has come beneath British sway—Burmah. A thousand times better would it have been for the unhappy Burmese if they had never been annexed to the Empire of the Queen. We were almost about to say that it were better for them to be decimated by the horrors of their religious rites and tyrannical government, than to be exposed to the mercilessness of this awful plague. But now, as certainly as the British rule is spreading its influence through the country, the opium den is following.

Nor is this all: India herself is becoming decimated by the same plague. The natives there are beginning to contract an inveterate taste for the poppy, and the curse is "coming home to roost" in India where it was bred. God cannot be silent. His justice must not only pronounce but inflict its sentences. It surely will not be enough for Him to punish us through Burmah or through India; but there must be looming in the distance some other judgment, terrible as the red-handed spectre of mutiny and revolt. "Shall I not visit for these things?" We can only hope that ere the cup of England's iniquity has become full, the statutes legalising the sale of opium in our dependencies may be annulled, and the agreement with China for the importation of the drug may be torn into a thousand shreds, and that the coming time may look with amazement upon the possibility of such things having been allowed.

It is said that the Opium Traffic is necessary in order that the coffers of the Indian Government may be filled. What shall we say of the principles of government which demand that it shall be maintained at the expense of the happiness, the energy, and the very life of the subjects? To our mind it is an axiomatic certainty that acts which are morally wrong can never be politically right; and an Empire which is maintained by the bayonet or by illicit gains is doomed by the very laws of the universe to crumble into decay.

"BRIDGE OF HOPE" MISSION.

The rescue mission carried on by Miss Steer at the Bridge of Hope, Ratcliff Highway, is a monument of devotion to Christ in the service of the degraded and oppressed. Associated with this peculiarly interesting work is a preventive agency, which is calculated to stir the hearts of all who make themselves acquainted with its operations. Compassion at once deep and broad, implanted by the great Sympathiser, alone could prompt and sustain such an endeavour.

A development of the preventive work at present occupies our attention. In eight cottage Homes Miss Steer cares for about 120 little girls. Four of these, in the Chingford High-road, near Walthamstow, were opened on Wednesday last; and at once "peopled" by children who had previously been lodged at Leigh and elsewhere. Oh, the sadness of some of the life stories! Some of these little ones had been terribly wronged by brutal men; they will, it is hoped, speedily forget experiences over which their benefactors would fain throw a concealing veil. Others have been rescued from surroundings of grave moral danger, and saved just in time from careers of sin, shame, and suffering.

Two of the new Homes face the main thoroughfare, the others being a short distance away on a side road. One of the cottages is the special charge of members of Regent's Park Chapel, and is named accordingly. It was opened by Mrs. Gange, wife of the respected minister. Another cottage is designated "Hampstead," because friends living in that part of North-West London pay the rent; this was opened by Mrs. D. C. Griffith. The children sang melodies, and as they bounded about in the ample gardens, looking all health and happiness, they were, in the eyes of their good "mothers" and rescuers, veritable "buds of promise." Educational facilities are combined with training in domestic work; and among country occupations and pleasures are the care of fowls and pigs, as well as occasional excursions in a pony and trap, kindly given by a friend of the work.

The two other Homes are, "The Nest," opened by Miss Lees, and "The Cot," opened by Miss Smedmore, on behalf of Miss Mayo. The former is for cripples and invalids; and the latter for babies. All the cottages are well appointed; the dormitories are airy and bright, and the general furnishing very comfortable. As we went through the rooms, we could not but help thinking that, while likely greatly to assist Miss Steer in her beneficent work, the additional accommodation is pretty sure to involve her in much anxiety. That such an institution should ever want funds is greatly to be deplored. The Homes offer to their wronged and neglected little inmates their one life-chance; had they not been thus saved, these little girls would almost certainly have grown up to fill our hospitals, workhouses, and prisons.

A goodly number of friends attended the opening proceedings. There was afterwards a sale of needlework, hosiery, etc., made by the girls in the Refuge at Ratcliff. At the present time, Miss Steer would like to hear from such as are disposed to support her in her work for God.

ENGLISHMEN IN ODESSA.

In average years the port of Odessa is visited by from 12,000 to 14,000 English sailors, and there is an English population of about 320. There is no Protestant Church provided for these people. Colonel C. E. Stewart, C.B., whose name is known to many in connection with work in Persia, is now Her Majesty's Consul-General at Odessa, and at his instigation a fund has been started to supply the long-felt need. The English residents have subscribed, and it is believed that a considerable proportion of the sum required will be raised in Russia. It is hoped, however, that help to the extent of about £900 may be contributed from England.

The municipal authorities at Odessa are very friendly to the scheme, and have given a good site for the church. The Archdeacon of London and the Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe have promised to be present at a meeting in aid of the building fund to be held on Friday, July 21, at 5.30 p.m., in the Church-room of St. Paul's, Onslow-square, S.W. Rev. E. W. Ford, the chaplain, who has just arrived from Odessa, will give an account of the working of the chaplaincy there and in Southern Russia. Communications regarding the enterprise may be sent to Mrs. C. E. Stewart, 51, Redcliffe-square, S.W.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

IN HIM.

The sponge, as it expands in its native seas, is in the clear warm water, and the water is in it. Thus there is a double In-ness between the Lord and the soul that loves Him. He is in the believer, as the sap is in the vine, and the spirit of energetic life in the body. But, in a very deep and blessed sense, the believer is in Christ. Of each of these sides of this marvellous truth there are many illustrations in this Epistle, so specially devoted to the study of the preposition in. We are dealing now with those passages only that assure us, as believers, of being in the Beloved.

Eph. i. 3, 4, 9, 11. (1) We are in Christ, in the Father's Thought. The disclosures made to the Apostle Paul of God's hidden things—hidden from ages and generations—are perfectly overwhelming. He tells us that our connection with Christ, in the thought of God, is not a matter of yesterday or of the day before, but of eternity.

True Science is the handmaiden of Religion, and Religion is under immense obligation to her for her researches into the vastness of that material creation which reveals something at least of the greatness of God. Our views of God have expanded marvellously beyond those held a century ago by our fathers. Perhaps we can add nothing to the sublimity of their conceptions of the moral qualities of the Divine nature, but the reed placed in our hands to measure the eternity, the omniscience, the omnipresence, and the omnipotence of God is much more adequate for its stupendous work.

The foundations of the earth were not laid in a day. But, ere the æons of creation revolved in their vast cycles, before the earth or the world was formed, God chose us in Christ. He chose Christ, and all those who, down the far vista of time, should answer to the attraction of his Spirit and become one with Him in a living faith.

How startling it would be if, according to a suggestion made by another, the geologist, mining deeply into the earth, should suddenly find, amid the footprints of animals long extinct, the initials of his own name cut in the primeval rock. How came those initials there? They must have been graven by the finger of the Creator! Ah, what a rush of awe would fill the breast! But a greater marvel than this awaits us here. For we learn that our names were engraven on the breastplate of the great High Priest before the amethyst or jacinth was wrought in the laboratory of Nature, among her oldest and rarest treasures.

Is there a doubt that we shall be ultimately holy and without blemish, when the stream that would bear us thither started in eternal ages from the Father's heart? Let us at least get comfort from the thought that He who foreordained works all things after the counsel of his will.

Eph. ii. 10. But the eternal purpose does not exhaust the marvels of this revelation. "We were created in Christ Jesus." It is as if the conception of the Man Christ Jesus, the Head, and with the redeemed as his body, were an eternal thought in the mind of God. It is as if they were created in the thought and purpose of God, long ages ere they took shape in mortal form. It is as if the new creation were already accomplished in the intention of Him who calls things that are not as though they were. In his book all Christ's members were written when as yet there was none of them.

Eph. ii. 6. We were in Christ also amid the marvels of his death. In Him we paid the debt: in Him we lay in the grave, and broke from death, and sped on the heavenly track home to the bosom of God. In Him we sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on High, and sit there still. And all this when Rome was mistress of the world, and the northern nations dwelt in unexplored forests, and Britain was undiscovered.

Eph. iii. 9-11. Time is the elaboration in actual fact of the thoughts and purposes of God. Slowly the Divine conception has taken shape in the formation and education of the Church, just as of old it took shape in the making of the world. And it is a great help to us to catch a glimpse of the direction of the Divine movement. The explorer who, from a commanding headland, is able to descry the set or lie of a country, confers a lasting benefit on all who follow him; and it is one of the inestimable benefits of revelation that it removes the obscurity which drapes our mortal lives so closely, and makes all men see the dispensation of the mystery.

Eph. i. 3, 6, 7, 13. (2) In Christ the blessings of redemption are stored. All conceivable spiritual blessings needed by us in living a holy and useful life are stored in Jesus. We must therefore be in Him by a living faith to partake of them; as a child must be in the home, to participate in the provisions of the father's care. It is only they, who know the meaning of the life hidden with Christ in God, and who abide in Christ, to whom God gives the key of his granary, and says, Go in and take what you will.

How can mortal man exhaust the wonderful gifts of our Father's grace? But they are all freely be stowed in the Beloved, in whom we also stand accepted. Who can estimate the meaning of redemption, which begins with the forgiveness of our trespasses, and ends in the heart of the sapphire throne? But it is to be found only in Him and through his blood. What do we not owe to the sealing of the Spirit, by which our softened hearts get the impress of the Saviour's beloved face, and are kept safe until He comes to claim us? But the sealing is only possible to those who are in Him. All things are ours when we are in Him.

Eph. i. 1; iii. 17. (3) Christ as the sphere of daily life and experience. It is the intention of God that we, who believe, should ever live in Christ Jesus, as the very element and atmosphere of our life; never travelling beyond the golden limits established by his Love, or Life, or Light; in Him as the root in the soil, or as the foundation in the rock. Always in his Love, because never permitting in speech or act what is inconsistent with it. Always in his Life, because ordering our activities by the law of his being. Always in his Light, because saturated by his bright Purity, and illumined by his gentle Wisdom. Oh, to be always one of the faithful in Christ Jesus!

Eph. ii. 12, iv. 21, v. 20, vi. 10. Then it would be easy at any moment to have access with boldness into the presence of God, confident that what we asked was according to his mind to give. How could we doubt as to the answers to our prayers when our abiding union with the Son had brought us into living sympathy with the Father's will in our requests (John xv. 7, 1 John iii. 22)? Then we should sit at his feet, and be taught in Him, even as truth is in Jesus, learning the secret of putting away the old man and putting on the new. Then it would not be so hard always to give thanks for all things in his name. An artesian well, fed from Heaven's deep joy, would then make perennial gladness in our hearts. Then we should never lack strength, our slender supply being fed from his Almightiness, on which we could draw perpetually. Spirit of God, Divine Anointing which we have received of Him, teach us concerning all things, and especially how to abide in Jesus (1 John ii. 27).

Eph. i. 10. (4) In Christ is the centre of unity. It is the evident purpose of God to finish as He began. He began by choosing us in Christ. He will end by summing up all things in Him, both the things in the heavens and the things upon the earth. All the landscape focuses in the eye, all creation finds its apex in man, and all the story of the ages shall be consummated in our Lord, the Divine man.

Eph. ii. 13, 15, 21; iii. 6. That unification is now in progress. The sheep are gathering up the mountain-sides to stand together as one flock, beneath the care of the one Shepherd. Those who were far off are being made nigh. Those who were at enmity are being reconciled, because the middle wall has been broken down. Those who were strangers and foreigners are recognising each other as fellow-members, fellow-partakers of the promise, and fellow-heirs. Amid the many churches, the one Church, which Jesus purchased with his blood, is being formed. From the ruins of many structures the one Temple is being built. All who are one with Christ are one with each other. To be in Him is to belong to the great company of the redeemed, and to know that you are one with them in a Unity which shall ere long obliterate the harsh discord of sin, and bring order and beauty into the universe of God.

GENOA HARBOUR MISSION.

The twentieth report of the Genoa Harbour Mission, issued by Rev. Donald Miller, conveys the good news that the beautiful "Rest" opened last year is now free of debt. The "Shipping Federation of the United Kingdom" gave what was needed to complete the £5500 the building cost. They and the other generous friends of this Mission will rejoice that nearly 12,000 men found their way to the Rest during the last year. Work among seamen now is very different from what it was in the days of sailing vessels, or even in the first and more prosperous days of steam. The happy-go-lucky character of "Jack" is a feature of the past, and the spirit of discontent and unbelief that reigns on shore is now only too plainly seen afloat. If only these poor men could see that, hard as is their lot, it is enviable compared to that of many of the struggling poor at home, their £3 15s. a month might, with God's blessing, give them some degree of comfort, instead of being to them a source of continued irritation, producing real gangrene of heart and soul If more were rich in faith, a happier future would come not only to missions but to our dear country.

The new note in this report is the extension of the work to sailors of other Continental nations. A sort of polyglot has been engaged to preach to Norwegians, Swedes, Germans, and Dutch sailors, and the ground floor of the "Rest" is specially set apart for them. This means a great increase of annual expenditure to be met by those who have this work really at heart. Foreign sailors are very different from British; they do not wish to be amused, and the very stolidity which prevents their going about to seek amusement prevents them also going on shore, even to Divine service.

IMPRESS UPON YOUR CHILDREN from early infancy that actions have results, and that they cannot escape consequences, even by being sorry, when they have acted wrongly.—Selected.

THE CHILDREN'S TABERNACLE held its seventh anniversary at Upton Chapel on Sunday week, when Rev. P. Howard gave a special address to the children. This mission is carried on in one of the most needy parts of London, and the poor children in the neighbourhood are being trained to shun the evil that surrounds them, and many of them have already given abundant signs that the labours of the friends have not been in vain. The superintendent is A. Watson, 53, Carron-road, Kennington, S.E.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

BY SIR S. ARTHUR BLACKWOOD, K.C.B.

XVI.

THE SEVENTH SEAL—THE GOLDEN ALTAR.

THE last of the seals is now opened by the Lamb, and the contents of the scroll of mystery are seen to consist, after a preliminary and most important vision, of what is known as the seven trumpets. As successive trumpet-blasts are sounded by the angels to whom the duty is entrusted, fresh manifestations of what is to come to pass are presented to the prophet's view in a series of what we have ventured to call "tableaux vivants."

Before we turn to behold those prophetic pictures we ought briefly to touch upon a principle which obtains throughout the Apocalypse, and of which a very striking illustration occurs at this point. It is the principle of what Elliott aptly calls "allusive contrast"; namely, the method by which prevailing errors, or particular events, are indicated, not specifically or directly, but by the exhibition in strong relief of their direct opposites. It was in this way that the rise and spread of the error of baptismal regeneration in the Church was denoted by the vision in chapter vii. of the separation of God's true servants from the professing multitude by the process of sealing with the seal of the living God; and again, that instead of the worldly glory and satisfaction of the Christians of the days immediately succeeding the downfall of Paganism, there was to come the great, the age-long tribulation,—a time of terrible and weary conflict with the powers of evil, and through which, to a greater or less extent, all the blood-washed, palm-bearing multitude round the throne must pass.

In the present instance the truth taught was that of the sufficient, the all-prevailing value of the High Priestly intercession of Christ, to secure the acceptance "of the prayers of all saints"; the error with which this truth was contrasted, and which was thereby condemned, was that of the intercession of saints, the introduction of many mediators, and the virtue ascribed to human merit.

Again, be it remembered, we have to do with symbols. The angel, the golden altar, the golden censer, the much incense, are all symbols, the last three borrowed from the temple worship of Israel, —the scene of vision being now transferred to the Temple precincts, and thus denoting that it was with a question affecting the worship of God that the revelation was concerned.

What, then, were the circumstances which made this figurative scene necessary? Was there anything in the future history of Christendom, which was foreseen by God as calling for so distinct and emphatic a bringing forward of the unspeakable value of the mediatorial office of our Lord Jesus Christ in heaven?

Alas! indeed there was. Ere the fourth century closed, a Christ-renouncing idolatry had permeated the visible Church. It is thus described by Dean Waddington in his "History of the Church": "Enthusiasm respecting the martyrs had easily passed into superstition. Those who had sealed a Christian's faith by a martyr's death were exalted (it was thought) above the condition of men, and enthroned among superior beings...Superstition gave birth to credulity...Hence the stupid veneration of bones and relics. It was inculcated that prayer was never so efficacious as when offered at the tomb of some saint."

Turning again to Gibbon, how do we find him depicting the public worship of the time? "If," says he, "in the beginning of the fifth century Tertullian or Lactantius had been suddenly raised from the dead to assist at the festival of some popular saint or martyr, they would have gazed with astonishment and indignation at the profane spectacle which had succeeded to the pure and spiritual worship of a Christian congregation. As soon as the doors of the church were thrown open they must have been offended by the smoke of the incense, the perfumes of flowers, and the glare of lamps and tapers, which diffused at noonday a gaudy, superfluous, and in their opinion, a sacrilegious light. If they approached the balustrade of the altar they made their way through the prostrate crowd, consisting for the most part of strangers and pilgrims, who resorted to the city on the vigil of the feast, and who already felt the strong intoxication of fanaticism, and perhaps of wine. Their devout kisses were imprinted on the walls and pavement of the sacred edifice; and their fervent prayers were directed (whatever the language of their church) to the bones, the blood, or the ashes of the saints, which were usually concealed by a linen or silken veil from the eyes of the vulgar. They frequented the tombs of the martyrs in hope of obtaining from their powerful intercession every sort of spiritual, but more especially of temporal, blessings...The walls were hung round with symbols of the favours received —eyes and hands and feet of gold and silver; and edifying pictures, which could not long escape the abuse of indiscreet or idolatrous devotions, represented the image, the attributes, and the miracles of the tutelar saint."

Such is the graphic sketch of the famous historian, given in a chapter to which he prefixes the title "Destruction of Paganism, Introduction of the Worship of Saints and Relics among Christians." The merits of dead men had largely obscured and replaced the merit of the living Saviour. So widespread and notorious had the practices just described become that even the Pagan Eunapius exclaimed in A.D. 396: "These are the gods the earth nowadays brings forth—these, the intercessors with the gods—men called martyrs, before whose bones and skulls, pickled and salted, the monks kneel and lie prostrate, covered with filth and dust." And in A.D. 400, the Manichæan Faustus said: "You have but exchanged the old idols for martyrs, and offer to the latter the same prayers as once to the former."

Here was the doctrine of demons, or spirits of the dead, predicted by Paul in 1 Tim. iv. 1, in full operation. Other mediators than Christ were trusted in; and, concurrently with this, the same, or nearly the same power, was soon attributed to the priestly functionaries of the martyrium, or church built over the tombs of the martyrs. They were indeed not seldom called "mediators" by the Greek Fathers of the latter half of the fourth century. Thus had Nicolaitanism advanced. The Church herself, through the agency of her teachers and leaders, had, as predicted by our Lord, by Paul, Peter, Jude, and John, introduced the leaven, the mystery of iniquity, into the professing body. A separate caste had arisen, interposing themselves, as invested with priestly powers, between Christ and men: the "laity" were subdued by those who were beginning to "lord it over God's heritage" (or real "clergy"). The Church was amalgamated with the world. In the words of Coleridge, "The pastors of the Church had gradually changed the life and light of the Gospel into the very superstitions they were commissioned to disperse, and thus

PAGANISED CHRISTIANITY IN ORDER TO CHRISTEN PAGANISM."

The way was clear for the great Anti-Christ, whose appearance was expected by the spiritually-minded as soon as the Roman Empire (the "letting" power of 2 Thess. ii. 6-8) should fall—an event now imminent.

What then could more emphatically, though at the same time mysteriously, point to the prevailing and tremendous evil of the times—what could show more clearly to those who had eyes to see, the light in which God beheld these things, and the anger aroused in his mind thereby, than such a vision as was now presented to the Apostle; a vision wherein, by the striking contrast of the truth and efficacy of the intercession of the Great High Priest, the sin of Christendom in seeking and using other mediators was depicted in broadest colours?

For it was the presentation to God, and the acceptance by Him of "the prayers of all saints" through the hands of the One only Mediator who perfumes these prayers with much incense that were therein exhibited. "And the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hand."

The imagery of the Jewish Temple worship is here freely employed. The golden altar, the cloud of fragrant odour from the inimitable frankincense, the golden censer (used according to tradition by the High Priest alone on the Day of Atonement), and the Priestly Personage (represented by an angel who, as a symbolic character, is invested for the purposes of the vision with the functions of the Great Angel of the Covenant) officiating, were all familiar to the Seer, and could hardly fail to bring to his mind, as "shadows of the good things (that were) to come," the glorious realities which had been introduced by the anti-typical Aaron. How beautifully was the truth set forth which contrasted so strikingly with the anti-Christian errors of the times. The whole picture spake of Christ—one finished work instead of the works of supererogation of departed saints—one glorious Mediator and Intercessor instead of the innumerable mediators on whom Christendom was depending —His perfect merit "for a sweet-smelling savour unto God" instead of the so-called merits of the canonised dead, their bones and relics—the all-prevailing value thereof to secure acceptance of the supplications of his people (in themselves unworthy), since they were enveloped in, or hidden by, its odorous perfume—so that their "prayer (was) set forth as incense, and the lifting up of (their) hands as the evening sacrifice." Christ the Golden Altar, Christ the Sacrifice, Christ the Golden Censer, Christ the much Incense, Christ the sole and mighty Advocate. All spake of Him, for "in his Temple every whit of it uttereth his glory." Such were the blessed and comforting verities for which the earliest Protestants, Augustin, Vigilantius, and others, nobly contended against the Christ-dishonouring and soul-destroying errors which, as we have seen, had spread throughout the professedly Christian Empire. Was it possible for pictorial representations to exhibit more clearly, more emphatically, the truth of God; and thus, by contrast, the lies whereby, as history tells us, the souls of multitudes were being deceived? And how exactly the vision corresponds in its chronological aspect to the very times to which the preceding visions of the seals have brought us.

But while that mediatorial work of "the Minister of the true sanctuary" secured acceptance for the worship of the true Israel, far different was the manifestation of Divine anger with the apostasy which was rejecting both the Priest and the Propitiation. Fire from the inverted censer, the frequent symbol and instrument in days of old of the wrath of God, falls upon the earth, and instantly premonitory symptoms of the tempests about to burst over the doomed Empire are witnessed. "And there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." The calm or "silence" in the firmamental heaven, which had been for about the space of half-an-hour (measured according to the length of the day—the Lord's Day in which the Revelation was vouchsafed), now came to an end. The suspended storm was about to break forth, or, again in the words of Gibbon, "the formidable tempest of the barbarians of Germany seemed ready to burst." The seventy years of tranquillity that had endured from the reign of Constantine to the death of Theodosius had now elapsed. He died January 17, A.D. 395, and "before the winter had ended," writes the historian, "the Gothic nation was in arms." The rumblings of the thunder are heard, the sky is darkened, the lightnings flash, and the earth is moved. "The fourth century," to quote again the words of Hallam, "set in storms."

HE LEADETH US.

"He will be our Guide even unto death." (Ps. xlviii. 14.)

He leadeth us,
Nor always by the way that we would choose,
Nor by the means, nor at the time,
Yet by a way we dare not stop to lose.
"Forth by the right way"—There He leadeth us.

He leadeth us.
Though sometimes when 'tis dark, we cannot see
His presence near; nor even feel
His hand clasp ours, so numb and cold are we
With frost of no-faith—Yet He leadeth us.

He leadeth us,
Despite that we desert Him oft in pride,
In mad attempt to walk alone,
Till, stumbling sore, we fall low at his side,
Who ne'er forsaketh:—Still He leadeth us.

He leadeth us.
Tho' oft "by ways we know not," strange and wild,
Thro' valleys deep, up mountains steep,
On which He seems to dally like a child:
No meaning given—But He leadeth us.

He leadeth us
Yet not thro' desert always up the steep;
But oft in pastures green, and sweet
With flowers of love, by waters still and deep,
Of peace most perfect—There He leadeth us.

He leadeth us
Until earth's shadows swiftly one by one
Dissolve amid his glorious light of love,
Until the music of his blest "Well done"
Thrills all our being,—So He leadeth us.

GLASGOW EVANGELISATION.

In a speech at the opening of the Catharine Mary Fresh Air Home for city children at Dunoon on Saturday last, Lord Overtoun said:—

We are met here to-day to aid in the launch of a vessel called the "Catharine Mary Home," a vessel that has been gifted by loving hands moved by a loving heart in order to try and make brighter the condition of many of the bairns of Glasgow, and the waifs and strays of Glasgow who have little sunshine in their lives. The work that is undertaken in connection with this and other Fresh Air Homes is one of the branches, as you know, of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association, that took its beginning so far back as 1874 during the first memorable visit of our friend Mr. Moody. Any of you who have looked or may look at the report about to be issued by this Association, will see how from small beginnings it has grown to be an Association carrying on a very great work. It affords what is of the greatest value, a united platform on which ministers, laymen, men, women and children of all the Churches, but holding the one faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, may work together for the benefit of their fellow men and women. The board consists of forty-two members, partly clerical and partly lay, subdivided into a large number of sub-committees, by whom practically the work is done.

We have several departments of the work. There is that which we call the direct work of evangelisation, which has many departments, beginning with the daily noon prayer-meeting in Glasgow, to which we hope a greater number than in the past will yet come. We have three halls scattered through the town—the Tent Hall, in Saltmarket, in the far east of Bridgeton, the Bethany Hall, and nearer the centre of the city the Mizpah Hall, where the work of Gospel Temperance is very specially carried on. There are a great number of children's services connected with this work, in which our brother, Mr. MacKeith, and many of his fellow helpers have done a great deal of blessed work. The work of has of late happily come very much to the front, and those of you who have recently read the particulars of the life and the early work of Lady Henry Somerset, and what a wonderful power and vigour she has thrown into this work, will feel that this department of the service of Jesus Christ is really only in its beginnings. I think we may hopefully and expectantly look forward to the time when the Christian Church itself will take a greater grip of the work which is to roll out of the way one of the greatest stumbling blocks against the winning of men, women, and children for Jesus Christ.

In connection with this direct Gospel work I think our Association is getting and spending something like £2000 a year, and I can assure you that it is well spent. The greater part of the work, almost the whole of it, is done by entirely voluntary workers, and the expense arises chiefly in the rents of halls, in lighting, cleaning, and looking after these, and in advertising, the providing of Gospel leaflets and hymn books, and other similar expenses.

Then we have the second department, which we term which has in view the lifting up socially as well as spiritually of the people who come under our influence. When the work first began in 1874 some of our workers went out to Glasgow Green to find those who had been sleeping on the grass all night, in order that they might preach Christ to them. They brought them in hungry and cold and wet; but it seemed like mockery to preach the Gospel to people in need of food and warmth, so they began by giving them breakfast. That work has been so much blessed that it has been continued, and now there are 1000 to 1400 who get breakfast in the early morning in the Tent Hall and hear the Gospel.

In the Tent Hall also at two o'clock there is a similar work done for the children. Any of you who have not seen that work should go down and see it, and take there any of your friends who may come to Glasgow. I can assure you that it is one of the brightest and best sights of the city. When you hear Mr. MacKeith teaching the children, and holding up to them Jesus Christ, I am sure you will come away with the conviction that a work for eternity as well as for the time is being done there.

There is also the work of the Day Refuges, where during last year 593 children who came there from their poor and miserable homes were sent to the Board schools, and also got their meals from the Refuges, had family worship, and were greatly helped.

There is, too, the work at Saltcoats, where we have a Children's Home, at which nearly eighty orphan children are taken and trained, chiefly for domestic service, and are sent out to trades where in after years they may be both happy and useful. Among these ameliorative agencies, there is also the work carried on under the Fresh Air Committee. That began by sending a very small number of children, who came from the grimiest and most dismal parts of our city, into the fresh air and sunshine of the country for a fortnight. That work was found to be so admirable, and to do so much good for the children, physically, morally, and socially, that it has gradually grown, and now there are something like 5000 to 6000 children in the year being sent out of the city slums to spend a fortnight in the invigorating air of the country.

Last of all, there is our new

at the head of which is Mr. John Anderson, who used to be of Ardrossan. The work he is undertaking is of the most valuable description. In the home, temporary as yet, and situated in Blythswood-square, there are thirteen young men under training for Christian work, and there are classes which we expected would have been attended by somewhere about fifty, sixty, or seventy, but to which there come a regular attendance of 500 to 600 people, who are anxious to be better trained and drilled in the Bible, and to get that instruction for evangelistic work which Mr. Anderson is so well qualified to impart.

While we have all these ameliorative agencies, I am anxious that we should bear in mind that there is one great motive power at the back of all, without which none of them would be worth anything; and that is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. While we cannot look slightingly on any social agencies that take in hand to lift the fallen and help the helpless, we must ever remember that those who are down in the depths of sin and misery are in too deep a pit to be reached by any rope except the Gospel; and if we are ever to reach them and get them up, it must be through the saving grace of Jesus Christ made known in the Gospel, as we sing that—

"Only Jesus can do helpless sinners good."

There are many in the slums, though, who cannot come under the influences of the Gospel. There are others who will not come, and the only way we can benefit them is by going to where they are. There are many who are cold and hungry and weary and sad. If we try to do anything in the way of feeding them and helping them, there are always a great many people who stand on a platform of propriety, and at once raise a cry that we are pauperising them, and encouraging them in ways of laziness and sin. I suppose there were people in danger of being pauperised, if you so call it, when our Lord Jesus Christ was here, yet He did not disdain to feed them with the bread that perisheth; and though He sometimes sadly said it was because of the loaves with which they were filled that they followed Him, He never turned them away, but ever went about seeking to do them good. When we see classes like that at our free breakfast, many, perhaps, coming for the warm tea and slice of bread and sweet music, but who in receiving these gifts many a time receive the best gifts they can possibly get, we cannot but remember that it must be in keeping with the Lord's wish; for we remember how He says that we should deal out bread to the hungry and needy and and if we do that, our light will rise in obscurity and we shall be like a watered garden.

One of the things we have to deplore in all our cities, and especially in our great cities, is the gulf between the well-to-do West-end and the poor and needy East-end. We feel that in this work, connected with the Fresh Air movement, there is a bridge made over that chasm, and in this way many of those who are better off in a worldly point of view stretch out a loving hand to those who are not so well off. If we can win some of those poor and needy ones by means of a little kindness, why should we not do it? and if sometimes we fail, as we must do, why not try again, and succeed?

What we have to do is to try and hold out to them the hand of Christian love. There are many who have not the slightest idea in theory or in fact of what tender Christian love is. We have to teach them what fatherly love is; for many of those bairns do not know anything of it in their squalid homes. How can they bow their knees, and say, "Our Father in heaven," if they have no idea what fatherly love is? How can they understand the promise, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you," if they never knew anything of the tenderness and gentleness of a mother's love? Is that not a blessed work to engage in? When we come to those who have grown old in the slums, we find that in spite of all our efforts there are many of them and with their hearts dragged down and fixed down by the sad surroundings to which they have been subjected for years. What can we do, after trying our best among those older ones, but turn to the children—those young lives that are so susceptible to loving influences; to those young hearts which yet have no heavenly impressions made upon them? We well call those efforts to rescue children from the power of strong drink "Bands of Hope." Can there be anything more hopeful than the effort made by such workers to rescue those little ones, and teach them those sweet hymns of salvation which tell of Jesus Christ? We should rescue the lambs as well as the sheep, and if those young tender lives can be brought under the influence of a Saviour's love, remember we are not only the means of saving their souls, but of saving their lives also.

What we are trying to do in connection with this work is to reach those children whose surroundings are of the most discouraging description, and, I think I may say, degrading character. In many of their homes—though, happily, there are some bright exceptions—there are squalor and starvation, and the sights that meet the eye everywhere are those of misery and sadness; the sounds that reach the ear are too often those of language that must ever pollute those young minds, of obscene talk, coarse jests, ribald oaths, and continued quarrels and wrangling; and the scents are of the most insanitary kind, of airless and damp dwellings where too often young life is crushed out. Instead of that we seek by these agencies to bring them to the surroundings of cleanliness, bright, green earth clothed with flowers, beautiful mountains rearing their heads to heaven, and to that sea which laps the shore with such sweet sound. We bring them where they may hear the sound of the birds, the humming of the bees, and the lowing of the cows; and instead of the unhealthy scents which reach them, there is the sweet scent of the sea air, of the flowers, of the new-mown hay, and of the pine woods among which they can wander. Are those not sufficient contrasts to make us feel that in bringing the bairns out of the one set of surroundings into the other, we are doing Christ-like work?

The Bible tells us that faith without works is dead, and that any FAITH IS KNOWN BY ITS FRUITS.

When we look on this Fresh Air movement as one of the fruits of the Christian life, does it not prove that in helping these poor children the love of Jesus Christ is no unpractical thing? I do not need to remind you that it is always need and the direst need that must attract those who love the Lord Jesus; and in seeking out the cases that are to be helped by this blessed scheme, we seek out and find those who are unable to provide such help and enjoyments for themselves. The report will tell you that the cases are all most carefully investigated, and that last year the average earnings of all the families from which the children came to the shelter of those homes were not over 16s. 4d. a week. So that it is not from the well-to-do homes that these children come, but from the homes that could not supply this enjoyment to them.

What a wonderful possibility that is which is brought under the notice of those children of a bright and happy life never dreamt of before—a home life full of comfort instead of misery—and all associated with Jesus Christ and his Gospel. This must ever tend to make Jesus Christ attractive to them. How many there are of those bairns whose hearts are more starved than their bodies, though those bodies are starved indeed. Many Christian people in our cities are not interested in work like this, because they do not know about it, or they have not taken pains to know about it. Possibly you and I never told them about it. One of our objects should be to make up our minds to tell people about this good work being done in the name of Jesus Christ,

When we look into the miseries of the slums we are tempted to turn away and say, "This is too terrible; what can I do?" I will tell you what you can do. If we cannot do it ourselves, we can help those who, like Mr. MacKeith and his fellow workers, are labouring at the work so successfully, and so cheer the hearts of those voluntary labourers who are plodding steadily, week after week, to rescue and to bless those poor bairns of the slums.

We try to make the most we can of the children for the fortnight. In the first place we try to give them the happiness of home—to them something quite new—such as good food, open air. We do not provide fresh air, God does that, but we help them to get as much of it as possible. We try as much as possible to give them as near as possible twelve hours' sleep and twelve hours' play. We have regular hours for meals and exercise. The children get plenty of playing and wading, if they choose to do so, and bathing under proper regulations. Then we teach them the blessedness and the happiness of that which I fear is falling too much out of our Scottish cottar's life, I mean

THE HABIT OF FAMILY WORSHIP.

Once there was scarcely a Scottish home from which praise to God and the sound of prayer did not ascend. I am afraid we cannot say that now, but do not you think that this instrumentality may be the means of introducing once more this desirable habit? We try day by day to put into the memory, and thus into the heart of every one of those children, a text of God's Word, so that they may learn it and know it. Then we find out there is a wonderful power of singing in those bairns, and they learn those sweet hymns which tell of Jesus' love; they get them impressed on their hearts, and carry them to homes where there was little music formerly, but where now there is sweet singing wedded to words about Jesus Christ and his love. Do you not therefore see how the impressions of love, and of the highest truths are made on these young hearts; how they learn of Jesus Christ; how they learn to know the Bible; how they are taught habits of obedience and discipline that must do them good in after life; how they find that there is such a thing as people to take care of them, friends and not foes, and learn that not only those people but God too loves them?

We see the fruits of this work in the gratitude with which they go away back to their homes, and also by the subscriptions they send, made up of pennies they get to spend, and part of their wages whenever they are able to earn them. When we think that every fortnight during the summer, 800 children are coming under those influences, I do not wonder that we are met here to-day to wish God speed to such a beneficent institution. We have homes like this at present for only one-third of the children, and are forced to board out the rest with cottars of the right kind to benefit the bairns.

The matron in charge, day by day, hour by hour, influences those for good under her care. To every one of the Homes there comes down for the Sunday a friend who is known as who takes the responsibility on the Sunday both of helping the children and of teaching them, giving thus complete rest to the matron. I do not know what we can say to those who undertake the great labour which this work involves, to Mr. MacKeith and the committee and the willing workers who engage in all kinds of labour, foundry boys, children's dinner, teaching the Pilgrim's Progress, evangelistic meetings, weary workers' rest, girls' rescue home, and the fresh-air work. They are all doing a great work which very few have any idea of till they see the work for themselves; and all this urged by love of Jesus Christ, many a time without praise of men, but not without praise of God, not by fits and starts, but by steady plodding—week in, week out. I think we ought more and more to pray for and sympathise with our brethren. When the leafy month of June comes we all begin more or less to think of holiday, and of getting away from town, and enjoying a little rest and change; and so many turn their backs on the city, with all its sins and sorrows. When we get back again in a month or two, we find the grimy slums there the same as before, but I am afraid that while we are away we do not often think of those who are left behind. May we learn to think more of the city's sins and sorrows which Jesus Christ came to take away.

FAITH WORK IN RUSSIA.

BY MISS LAURA GRUNDBERG.

WHEN the Lord brought me to Russia I did not know Him, but He was pleased to reveal Himself to me there, and afterwards to use me in his service. Both Miss Wennberg and myself began to distribute tracts and Gospels in the streets. When that was stopped I wished to go to China as a missionary, and spoke with Rev. J. Kilburn about it, who said that I should go. But the next day he told me, "No, you shall not go; your work is here in Russia." This was a blow.

I began to think how I could reach the families, and give them the Word of God. A Russian lady went with me, as I could not speak the language, and so we visited the different lodgings. This work was difficult, but very blessed. The only thing the people could not understand was that they got the Scriptures without money. One day we came to an old woman, who was so surprised that at first she did not say anything, but at last exclaimed: "Oh, God, how good Thou art to think of me to-day, and to give me thy Word." She then told me that it was her birthday. What better gift could we give her on such a day? Another woman thought we had come from Jerusalem, and that we were some kind of saints, and would not believe us when we told her that we lived in St. Petersburg.

This work lasted for about a year. Then the Lord sent me down to Esthonia, where I worked seven years, in the summer only, holding meetings on Sundays, to the great delight of the people, and the great displeasure of the Lutheran pastors. This went on till the Russian police were stationed there, when they wanted to arrest me one Sunday, but the Lord prevented me from going, so that when the police came to the meeting I was not there.

He then opened another way for me, to the great wonder of all the Christians. I asked permission to visit the barracks, to distribute the Gospel to the Russian workmen. This was granted in St. Petersburg and elsewhere, but it lasted only for about a year. All this time the Lord was preparing me for something else—always protecting me so that I should not get in contact with the police. At one meeting where I was, twelve police officers came, seizing the Bibles and books; the people they could not arrest, as they were too many, but they took names and addresses. When my turn came they only looked at me, and let me pass, leaving me my Bible.

About this time a lady came to St. Petersburg, with Royal introductions to the Empress, which opened every way to her. She had such privileges which none before her and none after her ever has had. She began a Home of Correction, which was continued only for about eight months, when it was closed by the authorities. When this was told us, we offered ourselves to the Lord, who most graciously accepted us, and we began without money, without permission, and without any human help, at the beginning—a Home of Prevention. The Lord sent us one girl, and when she told us her story we could only praise God that He had watched over her and placed her under our care. Very soon several girls found a home with us, the Lord all the while protecting us, so that we could carry on this work four years without permission.

At the end of these years a Baptist preacher was sent from Esthonia to St. Petersburg, to preach the Gospel. He was full of the Holy Spirit. The last days of his stay in Russia, a fear of something took hold of his soul, and in this state of mind he left us. Two weeks after his departure, I went down to Esthonia, to the place where he had come from, and the first words that met me were that he had got lost at sea, leaving four little children uncared for, the mother, too, being dead. The Lord told me to take care of these orphans, wherefore I immediately wrote home to ask Miss Wennberg to try to find homes for these children. She got two adopted; the other two we kept. I and the children whom the Lord had given me arrived in St. Petersburg on a Monday, and on Tuesday a French lady called to ask if we could find a family who would adopt two little children. We had been praying God for a "Baby Home" for about three months time, and now He was going to give us this great joy.

We took these children, and soon it was spread about that we took in children; we had about nine little ones, but no beds, and no clothes, and no doctor. Dr. Sellheim came and offered us his services, and he and his wife have been kind friends all the time. As for beds, we had to do the best we could. We prepared clothes-baskets, and tied the legs of easy chairs together, and made beds in that way. We had not to wait long before God saw to our needs, and the first means He used were our English friends. Rev. Mr. Francis had heard about our work, and at one of the week evening services he spoke about it. The day following we had beds sent us, and the ladies formed a sewing circle, so that clothes were provided too.

The blessings of God have been so many and great, that at present we have not room enough for all the clothes we have got. Children were sent us, every day almost, and at last we had twenty-one children, and no permission. The authorities heard about it, and of course paid us a visit,—not in a very friendly way. They were so sorry for the children, who had fallen into such bad hands as ours! We asked for permission, which was not granted, but we were ordered to close the Home within a week. This we did not do, however, because we did not believe that it was the Lord's will. When He gave us the 91st Psalm, in answer to our prayers, we knew that we were safe, and received more children instead. God's ways are not our ways, and little I knew where He would lead me, until I found myself face to face with one of the Grand Duchesses, who was so exceedingly kind that I altogether forgot before whom I stood. She took up my case, most kindly promising to do what she could. On the day of the Emperor's birthday, the permission to keep a "private home" was brought us by the same policeman who first visited us; he now congratulated the children that they had fallen into such good hands as ours!

Our Home was too small, so we began to ask God for another house. The children asked for a house with a garden around. Four years we have continued in prayer. Two years ago I was led to ask God whether He would give us this house, or if I should stop to pray. When I opened my Bible, these words were given, "Furthermore I tell thee, that the Lord will build thee an house." Now we knew what the Lord was going to do, and prayed two years more. This year, on March 1, we moved into our new God-given home. He gave us two houses instead of one, and a park instead of a garden.

We had also been asking for a "cow," the children asking for a "big cow." One morning a note was handed to me with these words: "To-morrow a cow will be brought; the Lord has provided the money. To Him be all the praise." When the cow was brought she turned out to be, as the children had asked, "a big cow." The day I left Russia, a goat was sent us; for this we had not prayed.

I must tell you how I came to England. That is as wonderful as all that the Lord has done. One day, the children asked me if I was going away soon, and if I was going for good. I told them I was not going at all. A week before I left St. Petersburg Dr. Sellheim asked me the same question, and while he yet spoke a lady came to ask me the same. Then I said, "As soon as the Lord sends the money I will go." The following Saturday money was sent to me to go to England. So I am here, knowing that the Lord will do far more than ever I am able to ask or think. What I ask you, dear friends, is to praise Him for the past, and to pray for the Baby Home in St. Petersburg, not only while I am here, but also when I am gone.

PARMITER-STREET SUNDAY SCHOOL AND MISSION.—The report of this mission shows that there are upwards of 400 scholars on the books, although unfortunately there is a lack of teachers. There is a large lending library of 200 volumes, and a branch of the Scripture Union with over 250 members. An earnest appeal is made on behalf of the soup kitchen, which during the winter supplies nearly 100 quarts of soup every week, and also on behalf of the benevolent society, which seeks to aid the sick poor. With regard to the Protestant lectures, which caused some little stir last winter, the committee "earnestly hope that they roused more than passing interest, have done something to stem the increase of error, and have impressed on the minds of those who heard them the great need there is at the present time for us to stand firm to our Protestant principles." Copies of the report may be obtained of the hon. sec., Mr. G. W. L. Barraclough, 11, King Edward-road, South Hackney.

PROTESTANT SCHOOLS IN MADEIRA.

Observing in The Christian Mr. Hunter's account of his visit to Madeira, and his notice of some of the Protestant schools there, I have thought it might be interesting to have a little additional information, specially regarding the work done for Christ by Portuguese Christian teachers among the young people of that beautiful island.

Last month, when voyaging from South Africa to England, I had the opportunity of spending several hours on shore, where I saw and learned all I could about the Portuguese Protestants and their schools. In connection with the Scotch Church there is a small congregation of native Christians.

In the schools there are gathered not only the children belonging to the Protestant Christian families, but also many children from Roman Catholic families. Indeed, the bulk of the scholars has always been drawn from the latter, and often under bitter persecution. In every case the Word of God is carefully taught, and by this means Bible truths are not only communicated to these children, but are also through them conveyed to the homes and families from which they come.

I heard of the good work which is being done at San Roque, a suburb of Funchal, by Señor Gomez and his wife, both veteran witnesses for the Gospel. I had the privilege of visiting the school conducted by Señora Teixeira (long and well known as Christina). Although it was not the best time for seeing the school, there were seventeen children in attendance, a number much below the average. Whatever attention was given to other subjects, it was abundantly plain that instruction in Bible truth held the foremost place. It was gratifying, and even touching, to see the zeal of the teacher meeting with an eager response on the part of her pupils.

The school just named, and that at San Roque, have been in existence for about fourteen years. Another school in Funchal has been taught for a like period by Señora Julia Alvarez, a long-tried and faithful Christian. One or two others have been opened more recently. What I was able to see of this work made it easy to believe what I heard concerning the great blessing which has attended the clear Evangelical teaching of these earnest and faithful Portuguese Christians.

The Madeirese Protestants are, for the most part, very poor, and for the maintenance of these schools funds have been provided by private friends in England and Scotland. Indeed, but for such help these schools would soon have to be closed.

A JOURNEY IN CENTRAL CHINA.

Dear Sir,—I write to tell you something of a journey I have made in company with Mr. Sparham, of this Mission. I do not think I can do better than throw it into the form of a diary.

Friday, April 28.—Left Hankow at mid-day, and walked in a hot sun to Tsieh-king-ho. Hired a boat to take us to Shih-t'eu-pu. The aspect of things has changed wonderfully these last six weeks. You can see fields of bearded barley glinting in the sunlight everywhere; and there are plenty of flowers out, including anemones an inch or more across, and lovely little vetches. The ponds, too, are studded with golden cups.

Saturday, April 29.—Awoke to find ourselves at Shih-t'eu-pu. Walked some eight li or so to our chapel at Yuen-kia-hang. Visited a number of the villages round about, in all of which we found converts. And though we did not succeed in selling many books, yet we trust the little talks were not altogether in vain. At night clouds gathered and broke in heavy rain, which disturbed us before morning by coming in through the roof of our sleeping apartment. We had to wake our obliging coolie up, and get our bedding put out of reach of water-spouts.

Sunday, April 30.—A wet, cold day, raining nearly all the time. But our service in the morning was fairly well attended. And we gladly joined with our native brethren afterwards in remembering the Lord's death. In the afternoon we had a short Bible reading. The chapel is a little building situated on high ground, where four important roads meet. The immediate vicinity is tolerably free from houses, giving it an air of a Sabbatic calm that is very refreshing.

Monday, May 1.—Promises to be a finer day. Set off for Hwang-pi with our original attendants. There was Mr. Yen, the good brother in charge at H., and Mr. Ku, a friend who desires to be baptized, and our coolie. Mr. Ku was an opium-smoker and a fortune-teller. The former habit he abandoned some time ago, and now he has summoned up courage to bring his fortune-telling books to Mr. Foster and renounced all claim to them, for he wishes to be a Christian. If this man turns out as well as I hope, I shall count it no small honour to have been carried "pickaback" by him across a big swamp and a river that intercepted us on our way to H. At one point in our journey we were stopped by a smart shower just as we got to a little village. A Christian woman called us into her cottage where perhaps some 50,000 silkworms were being fed. It gave Mr. Sparham an opportunity of talking to an interesting little crowd of heathen, and Mr. Kee was not slow to detect the hand of Providence in the matter. Hang-pi is a walled city about the size of my own (Hiao-kan). Our premises there are rather unsatisfactory as compared with those at Yuen-kia-hang. But we were only too thankful to have bread to eat and bedding to lie on, and envied no man after our long day's march.

Tuesday, May 2.—Before starting our book-selling, we were invited by Mr. Ngai, a tax-gatherer, to go and preach in his house. I am an infant in Chinese as yet, "waiting for my tongue to be cut," so I left the preaching to Mr. Sparham, in whose hands it is safe. We did a good morning's work on the streets. Our calendars especially sold well, and we netted over 800 "cash." In the afternoon we went about eight li into the country to see Mr. Ku's house. It was a charming walk, the scenery reminding us in many ways of our beloved homeland. The house in question lies at the foot of a spur of the Hwang-pi hills, called Kan-leu-shan, i.e. the Hill of Sweet Dew. A woman was overheard giving an eloquent testimony to Mr. Ku's character. "That is a good man," she said. A little above the house is a piece of ground that this good man proposes to present to the mission for the benefit of the cause. If we get this land it is highly probable that we shall set up a small sanctuary there. The view from Kan-leu-shan is beautiful and extensive. They say you can see Hankow, more than eighty li away. I confess I did not see it, but I saw a panorama of hills to the north that is worthy of comparison with anything you have in England or Wales.

This same evening we walked a few li on our way homewards, Mr. Ku still journeying with us. We put up for the night at a native inn in a village called Wu-li-kang, which means "Black Mud Ditch"—not at all a bad name for it, I can assure you.

Wednesday, May 3.—Up early; glorious weather. Walked thirty li, to a place called Söh-k'eu. On every side of us, in every pond, green frogs were croaking in harmonious concert. From Söh-k'eu we slipped down in a small boat towards the Great River, then, exchanging for a larger one, got back to Hankow about three o'clock in the afternoon.

An excellent work is being done in the whole district traversed by us, and we look for your sympathy and your prayers. Do not forget to pray for Mr. Ku. G. S. Walton, M.B.

CHILDREN'S SCRIPTURE UNION.—July 2, S., Matt. ii. 13-23; 3, iii. 1-17; 4, iv. 1-11; 5, iv. 12-25; 6, v. 1-16; 7, v. 17-32; 8, v. 33-48.

A FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY has been formed in connection with the Southend branch of the Children's Scripture Union. Its object is to make known the Gospel to the children of foreign lands. Particulars may be had from Mr. J. Waters Coldicott, 2, Belmont-villas, Southend-on-Sea.

BARBADOS.—A few Christians in Bridgetown, Barbados, West Indies, are anxious to start a Soldiers' and Sailors' Home. There is much need of such an institution. There are about 600 soldiers in the garrison, and blue-jackets and sailors from various ports are continually coming here.

DEWS OF EVEN.

By M. S. Haycraft.

Softly to the meadow gliding
Come the dews of twilight hour,
When the shadow veil is hiding
Hill and glen and forest flower.

Soon the wild flowers would grow weary,
Fainting, thirsting, far and wide;
Soon would meadow ways grow dreary,
Were the silver dews denied.

When the peaceful day is ending
And the golden sunbeams fade,
Then the kindly drops descending,
Gem the mountain and the glade.

We, like little dews of blessing,
All around may joy impart;
Every life may be possessing Comfort for some other heart.

We'll be gentle, kind, and tender;
We'll be willing, useful, bright;
Little children help can render,
Like the quiet dews of night.

LIVERPOOL SHELTERING HOME.

The young people trained to industrious habits in the Sheltering Home all winter have now found good situations in good families, with better wages than they could have obtained in England. The change already seen in their appearance is marvellous. The voyage has improved their health, and some have the extra advantage of a summer's sojourn with their employers at the seaside until September 1, when they will return to the town residence and the schools, etc.

The wee ones have been happily adopted, and will be lovingly cared for, educated, and brought on to lead useful lives, acting like little sunrays in the homes that have become theirs.

The following incidents, showing the interest and love still cherished for their friends in the old land, are calculated to encourage young people desirous of succeeding in life, and also ourselves who have been enabled to assist them in the first instance. A poor lad, after four years in one situation, was about to change, getting the promise of higher wages. The question of the intending employer to the late master and mistress was, "Are his clothes all in good order? Has he a good quantity, for of course he must have outgrown what the Training Home started him with?" The reply was, "Well, he is a lad that is more devoted to his widowed mother than he is to his own person. Almost all his wages go back to England to her, and but little of them are spent on himself."

A girl called on me last evening. She really might have expended all her earnings upon herself. There were things she required, and other girls would have had them, and let the poor unemployed eighteen-year-old brother in Liverpool starve on. But brave, self-denying Esther said, "You know my elder sister with her little family is struggling very hard to keep my poor brother alive till I get something saved up to send towards getting him out here where there is no lack of employment and good pay. I wish to bank this five-dollar bill towards his passage out."

Is it not work worth your doing, to help such children and young people to rise? to be transplanted out of the misery of the over-crowded city, and given a chance to thrive in better and purer surroundings? All are not successes, but we have to thank God that very many are. Now that the two parties are placed, their good teacher is about to visit them in their new homes and give them the smile and word of encouragement to persevere now as they have begun. Louisa Birt.

AS I APPROVE OF A CHILD that has something of the old man in him, so I am no less pleased with an old man that has something of the child.—Cicero.

PROTESTANTISM IN GERMANY shows steady increase, notwithstanding the numbers in which members of the Reformed Church emigrate to the antipodes and America. In 1867 there were 24,291,000 Protestants in the Empire, and 14,564,000 Roman Catholics. In 1891, when the last census was taken, there were 31,026,810 Protestants and 17,671,921 Roman Catholics. In Alsace-Lorraine the Protestants are increasing in numbers, while the Roman Catholics are decreasing.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, JULY 2.—JOB III.

Birthdays are generally regarded with feelings of thankfulness and rejoicing. With Job its memory brought nothing but regret. He wished that it might be claimed by darkness and forgotten, that it might be regarded as a day of ill-omen, that no stars might look out upon its night. Better, he says, it would have been to have been buried amongst the dead as an untimely birth, or as an infant that dies on the day in which it is born.

His imagery of the grave, where prisoners hear not the voice of the taskmaster and the servant is free from his master, where the wicked trouble not and the weary rest, is full of pathos and despair. We can never experience all his anguish, because we are so much surer of the Father's hand, and of the compensations that await us beyond death. We have learnt that this light affliction, which is but for a moment, is working out a weight of glory with which it is not worthy to be compared. The further the comet passes into the darkness the longer and closer it will stand to the sun. It is through much tribulation that the saints enter the kingdom. The feet of Incarnate Love are arrested, that sorrow and pain may work out his plan.

The thing which he had feared befell Job, but that is no cause why we should think it inevitable that our fears should become facts. Trust, and do not be afraid. God hath prepared some better thing for us.

Eliphaz opens the first cycle of talk. In times of sorrow it is helpful to be reminded of words which we ourselves have spoken in former days, and it is legitimate to compare our behaviour under trial with that to which we have exhorted others. But how much easier it is to tell others how to bear trouble than to bear it ourselves.

His friend might have suggested comfort to Job from a retrospect of the past; but instead of this, he directs his thought to his present calamities, and suggests there must have been some failure in his moral life, which had been the procuring cause of his misery. We have learnt better than this, we know that trouble is not always the harvest which we have prepared for ourselves by sowing the seeds of wrongdoing, but that it comes to glorify God, and to afford an opportunity for the education of the soul. In that exquisite paragraph (12, etc.) which describes a dream, the shadowy indistinctness of the apparition is marvellously portrayed, and the announcement which succeeds the silence (17) is very sublime. Mortal man is not more just than God or more pure than his Maker. In Job's case there was the suggestion that though he might not be aware of special sin, yet he must have been guilty of it, or he would lay God under the charge of injustice in inflicting so much sorrow on him. As of old, so now the justice and purity of God are our stronghold. Because He is faithful and just towards our Saviour Jesus we may claim forgiveness and have strong consolation.

There is still the suggestion in the speech of Eliphaz that Job had in some way got wrong with God, and that this was the cause of his suffering. He is disposed to class his suffering friend with the foolish and the silly (2 R.V.). He advises him to seek unto God (8). This is always good advice, whether we are conscious of wrong-doing or not. Commit your cause to God, oh suffering soul. He cannot be indifferent to your cry.

In the description of God which follows, there are sentences which are full of hope. Water of life for thirsty souls (10); blessedness for the humble and meek; the frustrator of pride and vainglory; help for the poor and needy; happiness even for the chastened. Verse 17 reappears in Heb. xii. 5. No sorrow which befalls a child of God can be regarded as punishment, because our stripes were exhausted by the sufferings of our Lord: it is rather chastisement, i.e., love is behind it all: love so tender and thoughtful, to which mistake is impossible.

Let us consider the closing verses of this chapter in the light of the Gospel (18-27). They describe the career of the good man, for whom some might even be prepared to die. They anticipate Psalm xci. And the experience of the saints witnesses to their literal truth. With one voice, the holy ones of all ages affirm, "Lo this, we have searched it, so it is." Whatever be our special need, let us claim its antidote.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 5.—JOB VI.

Job tries to justify the strong expressions he had made use of by describing the sharpness and bitterness of his pain. As the animals only cry aloud when they are ill at ease from hunger, so his cryings were justified by his anguish. There is no prohibition in the Word of God against strong cryings and tears. Sometimes nature, rent to breaking, must utter itself. Jesus wept. But, ah, how great is the difference between the expressions of bitter but resigned sorrow, and those of murmuring and rebellion. The one is the godly sorrow that needs not to be repented of, the other worketh death.

Often, with Job, we prefer to be cut right off (9) than to linger in anguish. Better, we say, pain, however bitter, that shall end the strife, than the torture of slow fire. We think that our strength can never last out (12). But at such times let us lift up our hearts to the Holy Ghost, the Comforter. He will teach the blessedness of leaving God to arrange just how long the tribulation should last, and how hot the furnace should be made. He will reveal the great refiner sitting patiently beside the crucible, so careful not to lose one atom of the gold.

Then Job compares his friends to brooks which pour forth their floods in the winter, but dry up in the summer when they are needed most (15, etc.). He protests his innocence, which they refuse to believe. What a contrast to the love of Jesus, unaffected by drought or frost, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

THURSDAY, JULY 6.—JOB VII.

As the farm-labourer counts the hours to sundown, so does the sufferer long for death. The night, that brings rest to other men, is full of tossings to and fro. The days, that succeed so quickly to each other, are spent without hope. And before the eye of the patriarch there seemed no possible alleviation. No hope of the beatific vision, no vision of the fountains ever flowing to which the shepherd leads his flock. Whatever knowledge of these was possessed at that time seemed to have become dim and obscure under the heavy visitation of his sorrow. What could be more despairing than the cry of the sufferer who, with all his physical anguish, was unable to understand the dealings of God, "I loathe my life, I waste away. Let me alone, for my days are as a breath" (16)? "What is man?" (17). Thrice in the Bible this question is asked. Indeed, it is wonderful that God takes note of us. Yet He has magnified us to sit beside his Son. He has set his heart on us. He visits us every moment in his tender solicitude. In another sense than that in which Job used the word, He is the watcher of men, watching his own as a shepherd tends his flock, or a mother bends over her babe.

FRIDAY, JULY 7.—JOB VIII.

Bildad pursues the same line of thought in a somewhat stronger strain. Job's justification of himself and protestations of innocence appear to him like a reflection on God's character. "What," he cries, "do you mean to infer that God can pervert judgment by making an innocent man suffer? Rather than believe that, I prefer to think that you are yourself less good than we thought." It was cruel philosophy. How little these men realised the great gains of sorrow.

We may, however, all bear these exhortations in mind. Let us seek diligently unto God, and make our supplication to the Almighty, and let us be warned by the examples of those that forget God. They wither, and become as the wilted leaves of a plant. They are swept away as a spider's web. They are rooted up from the earth, and others take their place. But how permanent and blessed is the lot of the righteous, of those who are accepted in Christ, and live for Him. God will not cast them away, and He will, after they have suffered a while, fill their mouths with laughter, and their lips with shouting, and clothe their enemies with shame.

SATURDAY, JULY 8.—JOB IX.

In his answer to Bildad, Job seems disposed to admit that there is certainly sin in him, but he hesitates to admit that he is guilty of some hidden sin, on account of which these calamities have been brought upon him. He says that there must always be a great disparity between the holiness of God and the weakness and evil of man. "How can man be just with God? He cannot answer Him one of a thousand."

The description of the greatness of God is very magnificent. That He can remove mountains if He will, that the heavens are his tent, and the waves his pathway, that He does great things past finding out, and without number; that his goings are involved in mystery—these are well-known items in the imagery of Scripture, as well as in the experience of God's people.

From these thoughts of the greatness of God, the sufferer returns to his weary complaining. Thus do our thoughts sway to and fro. It is well not to live in them, but in God, in our will and devotion to Him, and in His love to us.

Job desired a daysman that he might justify himself. Such a daysman was Moses; but the issue of that dispensation was that "God looked for judgment, but behold appression; for righteousness, but behold a cry."

Snow water will not make us clean, but the blood of the Lamb that was slain will. And there is a daysman, an umpire, a mediator, who can lay his hands on both, because though very God He was made flesh—"the man Christ Jesus."

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

JULY 9.

Paul at Philippi. Acts xvi. 19—34.

Golden Text, verse 31.

In many respects the conversion of the jailor is one of the most extraordinary in the New Testament. Very wisely, God has put it side by side with that of Lydia, that it may be manifest that there may be the greatest diversity of experience among those who are truly saved. No man may make his conversion a pattern for everybody else. This is the story with which this lesson deals.

The Circumstances Leading to it.—These help to give to the conversion its remarkable character. Tell briefly the whole story: A woman possessed with a spirit of Python (16, R.V. margin), doubtless a real case of demon-possession; her cries after the apostles (17), which were either forced from her, as the legion of demons were forced to bear witness to Christ (Mar. v. 7), or were intended by the demon to discredit the apostles' testimony; the power of the name of Jesus displayed in the deliverance of the poor girl (18); and the bitter persecution to which this led, prompted by her master's loss of gain. Many a time since then has the Gospel provoked bitter opposition because it has interfered with unjust gains. The arrest and trial follow. The apostles are violently drawn to the market-place, where the magistrates sat, as in the Forum at Rome (19). It was difficult to make a true charge against them, for if they were Jews they were not prohibited from practising their Jewish religion. The charge meant that they were causing political disturbance by an attempt to introduce customs which the people as Romans could not adopt. It was false; but that did not matter so long as it served its purpose. The mob was roused; the magistrates, after rending off the apostles' clothes, subjected them to the fearful torture of the Roman scourge. The memory of this treatment remained with the apostle (2 Cor. xi. 25; 1 Thess. iii. 1).

Then they are delivered over to their future convert (23, 24). It is towards this the providence of God has been working. But what a callous, unfeeling, inhuman man he appears. He showed every disposition to aggravate the sufferings of his prisoners; thrust them into "the inner prison," a deep, damp, pestilential place, without either air or light. The stocks were an added punishment. "This instrument was a heavy piece of wood with holes into which the feet were placed in such a manner that they were widely distended; hence it was also an implement of torture." A man who could treat these two men so did not seem a likely subject for conversion. By what strange means God brings about his purposes of grace!

The Conversion Itself (25-34).—Three things are in it. (1) Conviction. This was brought about by many things—the prayers and praises of the apostles (25). If the jailor heard them as the other prisoners did, it must have been a strange sound to him, and have made a deep impression upon him. The prison had become their temple, and the stocks their pulpit. The earthquake (26) was God's answer to their prayers and praises. Men who could know Him in such circumstances were honoured by Him in return. The despair of the jailor (27) was not owing to his sense of sin, but rather to his dread of the punishment which would fall upon him for the escape of his prisoners. But the word of the apostle arrested him (28). It was an unusual thing for prisoners not to escape if they had the chance, and still more for prisoners who had been treated as Paul and Silas had, to show any concern for their cruel keeper. What he had heard concerning these men came back to his memory, and with it, the thought of his cruel treatment of them. He saw his guilt, and knew his need of the salvation they taught, hence his humble, urgent appeal (29, 30). Their question was the most solemn and important the soul can ask. Conversion begins with the conviction which prompts this question.

(2) Faith (31, 32). The answer is very simple, and puts faith in the chief place. To stop short of faith is to be lost. Terrible conviction, such as the jailor experienced, is vain if it does not lead to faith. Yet faith requires instruction. We must know in order to believe; hence the apostle explained to him and to his house what Jesus had done, and what reason there was for trusting Him (32). Happy was this man, for he not only believed himself, but witnessed in one night the conversion of "all his house."

(3) Evidence. This was seen in his baptism (33), in which he and all his house confessed themselves disciples and followers of Jesus. His joy (34). A saved man must be joyous; and to the jailor it must have been all the greater after the despair from which he had been delivered. His conduct (33, 34). He was as tender now as he was cruel before. Salvation makes an immediate change in the character.

Iniquity Framed by Law.

Passive acquiescence in the evil doings of the time is bad enough; but positive and deliberate connivance at the maintenance of these evils is a thousandfold worse. It is this foul crime of which the Indian army authorities have been found guilty. Deeming themselves wiser than the great Apostle to the Gentiles, they have, with brazen shamefacedness, made provision for the flesh that our Indian soldiers may fulfil the lust thereof. Perhaps the blackest feature of this whole black business is the fact that these official procurations and regulations have been going on when everybody thought they had been sent into the limbo of a discreditable and discredited past.

To strengthen the case against these servants of the Queen, who are thus framing iniquity by law, a meeting was held in Exeter Hall last week, under the auspices of the British Committee for the Abolition of State Regulation of Vice in India and throughout the British dominions. Notwithstanding the season of the year there was a considerable muster of friends, and the mental temperature of the assembly frequently indicated fever heat. A sympathetic chairman was found in Sir William Wedderburn, M.P., who laid down three fundamental principles which, he urged, should not be forgotten. The first was that a nation, acting collectively, should never do anything of which an individual would be ashamed. A nation, moreover, should have the highest standard and the noblest aspirations of which the community is capable. Wherever the State undertakes to regulate evil, the State becomes a partaker of the evil. Another great principle is that the Indian administration must be obedient and subordinate to the will of the British people; events have shown them grossly disobedient to the mandate of the people, expressed in a resolution of the popular House. The third principle laid down was that this system of regulated vice involves a great moral wrong to the righteous dignity of womanhood; all the more that those women who are being wronged belong to another and less enlightened race.

An outline of the history of the Purity crusade from the days of the agitation for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts onward, having been given by Professor Stuart, M.P., a resolution was moved by Mr. Walter M'Laren, M.P., calling for the immediate abolition of the regulations in India that have recently come to light, through the self-sacrificing exertions of Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell. In supporting the resolution Mr. M'Laren went over again of official arrangements whereby so many Indian women are first of all inveigled into a sinful life, and maintained and forcibly retained in that life in order that the evil passions of our soldiery might be gratified. Details have already appeared in our pages, and we hesitate again to soil them with a record of such heartless infamy. All the points of official procuration, registration, supervision, remuneration, examination, and retention, were laid bare, to the accompaniment of cries of "Shame!" from a horror-stricken and enraged audience. In a speech marked by great, but by no means too great, vehemence of language, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes drove home the resolution, and demanded condign punishment for those who had so basely betrayed their trust and set at nought the command of the British Parliament. Mr. Hughes was extremely severe in his criticism of the action, or rather inaction, of Lord Roberts, as Commander-in-Chief of the Indian forces. One must accept his disclaimer of any personal knowledge of these evil deeds on the part of his subordinates; but such ignorance on his part is unpardonable in his position. In the course of his rousing speech, Mr. Hughes paid an eloquent tribute to the services rendered in this crusade by "that heroic Quaker, Mr. Alfred Dyer," whose words on an Exeter Hall platform a year ago re-echoed through India, and modified to some extent at any rate the action of the military authorities. A pathetic, womanly speech followed from Miss Conybeare, calling for the voice of woman to be heard effectively on this subject, and then the resolution was passed by acclamation.

A second resolution, expressing determination to combat all forms of regulated vice, was proposed by Rev. J. P. Gledstone. If there is a contemptible being on the face of the earth, he exclaimed, it is the seducer of trusting womanhood; but still more contemptible and devilish is the man or woman who plays the part of procurer. It is horrible beyond all expression that the Indian military authorities, representing a professedly Christian people, should act as touts throughout that Empire in order to secure women and young girls for our boy soldiery. Mr. Gledstone said that, when he heard of it, his whole nature boiled with rage and shame! The entire system is one that breeds lying and fraud. Those who are thus defaming our national character will have to reckon with the people of this country. Above the authority of the House of Commons, is that of the English nation; whatever the House of Commons does or does not do, this agitation will be carried right into the midst of the people again; and there is no doubt as to what the verdict of the British people will be.

made the closing speech. She looked pale and weary, but she spoke with decision and even with fire. She said: I observe with pleasure on this platform two native gentlemen of India, and their presence induces me to say what I am about to say. I wish in their presence to express the profound sympathy of the women of England for the native women of India. I wish to tell them, and I hope through them to tell their fellow citizens, what we women—at least a large, strong group of us—feel concerning the women of India. They are our sisters. We love them with all our hearts. We have received their messages. We have heard their cry for help. Two American ladies who have come to us lately from India, have told us that again and again these poor women, with whom they talked, when they asked, "What shall we do for you?" replied, "Pray for us to God that He will help you to help us out of this slavery and this horrible life of sin." No day passes in which I do not bow my knees to my God and Father in heaven—their God and mine; their Saviour and mine—imploring Him that He may deliver them from this horrible slavery, and that when this has been accomplished, by the power of his grace our hearts may be hereafter knit together as one heart, in the love of God, of purity, of true liberty, and of truth.

I sometimes hear—I have heard even to-night—expressions which I cannot endorse, in speaking of these poor ignorant heathen women. I do not like to use these expressions. Someone said that these regulations were disgusting and horrible even to heathen women. I have not been in India, but I know from long correspondence and intercourse with India, and from people who know India, that the Indian women are a gentle and womanly race, and that they are naturally a modest race of women. They hate and loathe the criminality into which they are urged and pressed by our English Government; and I would speak of them with the deepest respect and the greatest tenderness.

One parting word. In a great body of singers you know that sometimes the whole choir will drop and begin unconsciously to sing flat. The director will tell them, "You have fallen below the key-note considerably." The key-note has to be struck again and the choir has to come up to it. In any great question we need continually to strike the key-note: to go back and be baptized in first principles. Do not imagine, even you Christian people, that you thoroughly know and feel this question as you ought to, or that you are thoroughly strong to meet every circumstance and every difficulty in the future, unless and until you have faced that question and grappled with it alone in your chamber with God, with the full light of heaven raining down upon it. It is only in that way that we can see it rightly, and can strike the great key-note of our principles again and again. You must go to God, the highest of all; you must contrast the injustice of such regulations with the Divine justice; you must look at their cruelty and want of mercy in the light of the pity and mercy of Jesus Christ. Then you will see how far below the key-note our whole action has fallen.

This is especially the case when we come to deal with the practical difficulties of the case, and the practical solution of the question. People will say: "If you do this worse things will happen—most awful crimes." They have been saying this for twenty-five years. But remember that the things that are prophesied frequently never happen at all. If they do, God gives more light, and shows us our way right through them. Do you believe in your principles? Do you believe in the principle we have announced to-night? If you do, trust yourselves to it entirely. Strike out into it as the swimmer strikes out upon the broad ocean which he knows will bear him up. Then eternal truth will lead you through every labyrinth and difficult path, to the goal to which you mean to go.

Some confusion and excitement were occasioned by the attempt of two professed "Socialists" to submit an amendment involving the discussion of the relations between capital and labour. This was pronounced by the chairman to be irrelevant, and the meeting backed up his decision. Ultimately the chief disturber had to be forcibly removed.

PRINCESS MARY VILLAGE HOMES.

COMMEMORATION DAY AT ADDLESTONE.

There was much disappointment in the pretty Surrey village of Addlestone on Wednesday last week when it was known that Princess May would not be able to grace with her presence Commemoration Day of the Village Homes. The Homes are named after her mother the Duchess of Teck, who, with her now popular daughter, has taken a very warm interest in this part of Mrs. Meredith's work. Both Duchess and Princess have often visited the Homes; and as the approaching nuptials of the latter have given her a place in the mind and mouth of every loyal subject, she would have been doubly welcome. But even a royal princess is not ubiquitous, and failing her the visitors had to be satisfied with the presence and sympathetic speech of three live lords. The day was fine; the Homes were gay with flags; the children looked their best, and all as merry as the proverbial marriage bells.

The special proceedings of the day began with a service of praise in the chapel, when an address was given to the children. Then came an inspection of the cottages, the laundry, etc., where everything was in apple-pie order. The laundry work was of the finest order, and a considerable item in the revenue of the Homes is the amount received in this department from neighbouring customers.

In the afternoon there was a full attendance in Shaftesbury House for the speech-making and the prize-distribution. A number of the girls were present and sang sweetly some of their hymns. One of the staunchest friends of the Homes, Lord Rookwood, did the honours of the chair, and in the most homely, hearty way described the gratifying progress of the work. While regretting the absence of the noble patroness and her daughter, he told, better than he could have done in their presence, of all the personal interest they had shown in this Christlike endeavour to rescue children from positions of peril, and train them for an honest, useful, and happy future. As to the financial position of the institution, his Lordship said it was nearly self-supporting, but its usefulness could be largely extended if the outside help were greater. Lord Meath spoke in the same line of advocacy; as also did Lord Henniker. A new trustee, Mr. Dudley Ryder, added a few words of commendation, and then his fair young wife gracefully presented the prizes awarded to those girls who had shown proficiency in the various branches of education and practical training, as well as for specially good conduct. It was stated that on the following day there would be a reunion of "old girls," when twenty-six of these would receive prizes for retaining their situations for periods of one to ten years. The great bulk of the girls, it may be mentioned, go out into domestic service.

Some of them are emigrated when favourable opportunities occur, and this feature was well dealt with by Mrs. Meredith herself, whose short address closed the formal speaking of the day. She read some bits from the newly-published report; one characteristic letter from a married young woman in Texas, telling of her daily domestic experiences, and her love for the old Home where she was trained and taught to love the Bible, afforded much interesting entertainment. Mrs. Meredith had a fresh little project to divulge—one in which she stated Princess May is much interested. It was a proposal to secure a seaside Home for the ailing girls. The Princess has agreed that the Home should bear her name, and Mrs. Meredith appealed to the friends of the work to give or collect a sufficient amount to provide this aid to the work of the Homes. Her aims are not ambitious, but she is desirous of getting such a comfortable and adequately-sized house by the seaside as will accommodate those children that need recovery of health and physical tone.

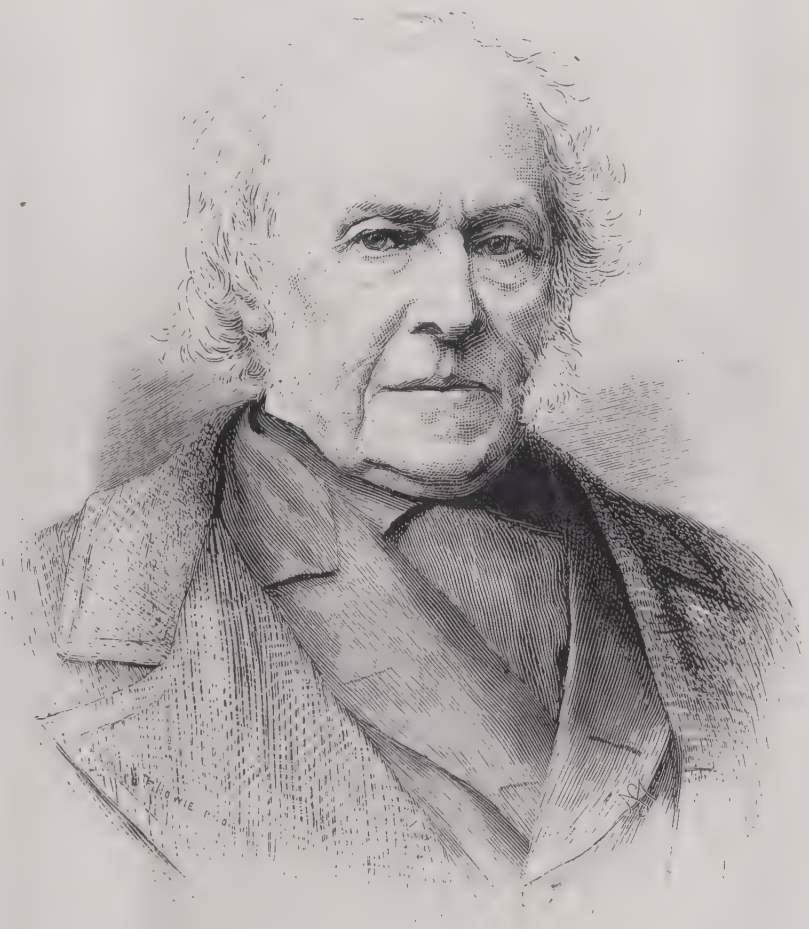
The Late Rev. John James Bonar, D.D.,

of Greenock.

THE subject of this sketch always shrank from speaking of himself, and took effectual precautions that none should possess the means of infringing the reserve which he had maintained. Yet his life is worthy of commemoration, for it was in many respects unique. It was a life spent chiefly among one people; a life of unswerving allegiance to the Church of his fathers, a life of activity and power, a life of wonderful freedom from the worry of ambition or envy. It was a long life, a life of almost unbroken health, a life ending in the quiet sleep of a weary labourer whose toil is over. It was a life, moreover, so intimately associated by affection, principle, and co-operation with the life of his brothers, Horatius and Andrew, that none who knew the three can think of them apart.

John James Bonar was born in Edinburgh, on March 25th, 1803, and was older than Horatius or Andrew. His father, James Bonar, Solicitor-at-Law to the Excise, was a scholar, a scientist, and a critic, who "walked with God." His eldest brother, James, a man of original character and sterling worth, filled a parent's place from the time of his father's death. His mother's childlike faith, gentleness of spirit, and overflowing kindliness, won the esteem and affection of all around her.

Dr. Bonar's thorough training at the High School of Edinburgh opened to him the realm of classical learning; his training at the University kindled an enthusiasm for those philosophical and theological pursuits in which he delighted till the very evening of his days, and introduced him to a group of like-minded friends.



The church of Dr. Bonar's youth was Lady Glenorchy's Chapel, founded by the friend of Lady Huntingdon for the promotion of evangelical preaching, but connected with the Church of Scotland. To the preaching of Thomas Snell Jones, educated at Trevecca, and afterwards minister of Lady Glenorchy's Chapel, the brothers owed their earlier impressions. By the appeals of Robert Gordon (the High Church, Edinburgh) Dr. Bonar was awakened, we believe, to a sense of guilt and apprehension of Divine mercy deeper than he had experienced before. From the philippics of Andrew Thomson (St. George's, Edinburgh) against sin of every kind and in every rank, he caught a trumpet-tone which frequently rang through his discourses. Under the spell of Edward Irving's voice, in 1828, he received an impulse to the study of prophetic truth which never exhausted itself; he imbibed a prophet-like spirit, and acquired a prophet-like style, which often displayed themselves in his utterances.

On September 30, 1819, his father wrote:—"My son John expressed to-day his wish to become a minister—a determination with which I am well pleased, provided only I shall find it to be from motives of real love to God, and desire to be useful to others in their immortal concerns." On August 20, 1835, this "son John" was ordained Minister of St. Andrew's Parish, Greenock, and commenced a pastorate on which he was to lavish thought and energy and means, for more than half a century. In 1843 he joined the Free Church of Scotland. In 1875 his beloved wife was called home. In 1881 a handsome church, reared by his people, was opened for public worship by the three brothers, Dr. Bonar preaching on "Christ as a Prophet," Dr. Horatius on "Christ as a Priest," Dr. Andrew on "Christ as a King." In 1883 he received the degree of Doctor in Divinity from the University of Edinburgh. In 1885 his jubilee was celebrated with the customary congratulations, and by the presentation of his portrait, the painting of Sir George Reid, P.R.S.A. On Sunday, February 12, 1888, he addressed his flock for the last time, and his text was: "I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on Me should not abide in darkness." Thereafter he was laid aside for two or three months by sharp illness, but he rallied wonderfully, regaining health and spirits, and evincing his peace and joy by unfailing cheerfulness and beautifully unselfish consideration for others. At last a brief and painless failure of strength announced that his summons had come, and on the evening of Tuesday, July 7, 1891, his breathing gently ceased. The following Monday a multitude of mourners accompanied their ancient friend to the grave. The day was one of those days when creation is a prophecy of coming glory; and, as we laid him down, and sang—

Saint after saint on earth
Has lived, and loved, and died;
And, as they left us, one by one,
We laid them side by side:
We laid them down to sleep,
But not in hope forlorn!
We laid them but to slumber there
Till the last glorious morn.
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

we thought no more of death, but of that hour "when Christ who is our life shall appear."

On the same day, a year after, Dr. Andrew Bonar stood again beside his brother's grave, and listened to the hymn which had been sung at his burial. Now he is gone, and the brothers who were so closely united on earth, are re-united in the presence of their Saviour.

(From a Photograph by Mr. J. Howie, 3, Princes-street, Edinburgh.)

Dr. John Bonar's theology was evangelical, to employ a term convenient if inadequate. His views were definite, and varied little during the course of his life. But he was the slave of no system. With him theology was another name for truth, and truth was another name for life. He was a Calvinist, because he had seen for himself the majesty and righteousness of God. He was an Augustinian, because he had learned for himself the impotence of man and the efficacy of Divine grace. He was a Lutheran, because he had discovered for himself the source of spiritual life in justification by faith. He was a student of prophecy, because he rejoiced in a personal Saviour, and in the prospect of His reign. His habitual question was, "What does the Word of God say to me?" and thus he was peculiarly sensitive to the danger of handling the Bible with reckless touch. He welcomed every well-attested fact or opinion, however novel; but he mistrusted the motives, the methods, and consequently the results, of not a little current criticism; and he evermore remembered that the final Arbiter of our critical controversies is He who talked of Moses and the Prophets as He journeyed to Emmaus.

If Dr. Bonar's life was sustained by his theology, and if his theology was the expression of his life, his preaching was the proclamation of his theology. But it was more. He did not convey his message in elementary forms of thought and speech. He summoned all his resources of acquirement, of intellect, of poetic fire, to aid him in the composition and delivery of his sermons. He did not clothe his message in forms of thought and speech appropriate to literature. He constrained his resources to observe the conditions imposed by the art of preaching. He was a Preacher. He sometimes commented on a book of Scripture: discussing its phraseology, tracing the sequence of its thought, illustrating its lessons. He sometimes delineated a character or an event, with more, possibly, of picturesque brilliancy than of dramatic insight. But he was most impressive when he expounded some important truth; unfolding its nature, its relations to other truths, philosophical or spiritual, its bearings on the Christian life; intrepidly asserting its claims on heart and conscience; tenderly pleading for submission to its demands; dwelling with unfeigned delight on the things which God has prepared for them that incline their ear and come unto Him.

Dr. Bonar published little—partly because of his dislike to publicity; partly because of his aversion from the task of preparing material for the Press; partly because he supposed that the conscientious discharge of ministerial duties was incompatible with the attainment of excellence in writing sufficient to satisfy himself and his readers. But we cannot refrain from mentioning in connection with this a memoir edited by him, entitled, "A Hidden One Brought to Light," and praised by Spurgeon in these words:—"This is a dear, delicious little book, for spiritual people. When we were at Mentone we had this simple little diary of a poor servant read to us piece by piece, and it brought tears to our eyes to hear it. Our very heart seemed to be unveiled as we read the experience of Elizabeth Gow. Quiet, humble young believer, this is the book for you! It is infinitely superior to Legh Richmond's 'Dairyman's Daughter.'"

In visitation Dr. Bonar was at home. He trod the streets and climbed the stairs of Greenock with marvellous alacrity and perseverance. A sunny countenance and a happy manner were his passport; and a sympathetic heart made it easy for him to "rejoice with them that rejoice, and weep with them that weep." While, on the other hand, the suffering and perplexed instinctively felt that here was one who would bring them a message of heavenly advice or comfort. The young especially he claimed as his friends, and they recognized him as theirs: he mingled with kindly zest in the talk and the sports of children; he was a tolerant and sagacious counsellor of youth.

There are few things more difficult than to gauge a man's influence as distinguished from his work. It was plain that Dr. Bonar could not live in Greenock so long as he did, could not devote himself so faithfully to his own work as he did, could not mingle so genially in benevolent and religious efforts beyond the limits of his church as he did, without exerting a potent influence upon his townsmen. And of this there was ample evidence during his lifetime. But not till he had passed away, not till the spell of his influence had been dissolved by death, was it manifest how powerful and how salutary had been its effects.

We have no room to speak of the part which Dr. Bonar took in public affairs, nor to refer to many other things. But we have said enough to show what manner of man Dr. Bonar was; we have said perhaps too much, when we remember how earnestly he deprecated any laudation of himself; when we know that, were he standing at our side, he would write across each column, "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, was this grace given." James Bonar.

THE STOCKWELL ORPHANAGE.

"Founders' Day" at the Stockwell Orphanage was celebrated on Wednesday week (the late C. H. Spurgeon's birthday). Had the great preacher been alive he would have accorded the honour of founding the Orphanage to the late Mrs. Hillyard, the widow of a clergyman, who wrote in 1866 to Mr. Spurgeon requesting him to take care of £20,000 which she desired to be put in trust "for the maintenance of orphan boys with a special view of their godly education, in the hope that by Divine grace they might become missionaries in future years." Mr. Spurgeon was naturally taken by surprise at the receipt of such a letter, and for a time was doubtful as to whether it was genuine. He was advised by a friend to call at the address given, and on doing so he saw the lady, and explained that he had called respecting the £200 which she had wished to place at his disposal. Mrs. Hillyard remarked, "Did I write £200? I meant £20,000." The result of the interview was that the securities were forthcoming, and the next year the Boys' Orphanage was inaugurated. With reference to the girls' side of the institution, the same generous benefactress was a prime mover in its establishment. In February, 1879, when a sum of £6000 was presented to the pastor in commemoration of the twenty-fifth year of his public ministry, Mr. Spurgeon said he had a few days before received £50 towards a Girls' Orphanage, but, whilst acknowledging with gratitude the gift, he said he was not feeling very well, and the times were not very hopeful, so he would rather not begin any new work just then. He, however, proposed to keep the £50 in case they were able to build a Girls' Orphanage; if not, it would be handed over for the boys' institution. The lady in question replied, "You are right in your judgment, but take the £50 as the first brick, for many more bricks will surely be added." Mr. Spurgeon therefore said, under the circumstances, he would propose that £50 from the testimonial be placed alongside the other gift, so that they might found the Girls' Orphanage together. The Stockwell Orphanage, thus erected and conducted on the separate home system—several of the cottages being the gifts of individual friends or as representing organisations—has been the means of affording food, clothing, and education to nearly 2000 orphans, who have been selected irrespective of class, sect, or locality.

At last week's festival, notwithstanding some heavy showers, the throng of visitors was well-nigh as great as ever; and as usual the grounds were prettily decorated, and were illuminated in the evening. In money matters the year has been a memorable one. "The fears of some have been disappointed, and the brightest hopes of others have been fully realised." The report states that while the work generally has been well maintained, there have been "evident tokens of the Divine blessing." The memorial fund has reached a total of £9647, of which £3367 will go to the Stockwell Orphanage. The memorial hall to be erected in memory of the late president, has been designed by Mr. James Cubitt, and will cost £4000, while the interior monumental design in three panels will be the work of Mr. George Tinworth. The centre will represent Mr. Spurgeon preaching, while on the one side the pastor will be seen with his students, and on the other side he will be seen surrounded by orphans. The year's income was £16,120, the expenditure £13,675, a sum of £2568 being transferred to the endowment fund. The number of orphans received during the year was eighty-two, making 1668 from the commencement, over a thousand of these coming from London. The catholicity of the Orphanage is seen by the orphans being taken from all religious sections. Thus the Church of England supplied 640, while 445 were of Baptist parentage, 175 Congregational, 146 Wesleyan, and 29 Presbyterian.

Mr. Horace B. Marshall presided at the afternoon meeting. Dr. Spurgeon referred to the prosperity of the year, and showed that the average cost of each child per annum was £27. He also explained that there was no alteration in the management of the Institution. It was seven years since the late C. H. Spurgeon had attended one of their business meetings, so that things had been conducted since his death much as they had been before; but none the less his loss was more felt than ever.

The Chairman referred to the fact that the majority of those who left the Orphanage had turned out well; and he could bear testimony to those who had entered his own warehouse. He urged all to do whatever they could to strengthen the hands of the managers of the Institution.

Dr. Monro Gibson spoke of orphans being God's children. That was the first time he had been at the Orphanage anniversary, but while it was to him a somewhat sorrowful occasion, it was realised that though Spurgeon was dead, he was yet speaking, and in some respects he seemed to be speaking more powerfully when dead than when alive.

Rev. F. B. Meyer said that when so many were disposed to forsake the old paths, he was glad to be with those who kept to them. Nothing short of Evangelical preaching could have brought that Orphanage into existence; and nothing short of that could maintain it. Addresses were also given by Revs. Reid Howatt, Charles Spurgeon, and Thos. Evans.

The chief interest of the festival centred in the laying of foundation-stones for "The C. H. Spurgeon Memorial Hall." The first stone was laid by Rev. John Spurgeon (the venerable father of the late C. H. Spurgeon), who was warmly greeted as he came forward to declare the stone "well and truly laid." He made a reminiscent speech, in which he referred to some interesting incidents of his earlier life. He told his auditors that "Charlie was always a very good boy." He then expressed his sense of privilege at being called on to lay that stone in remembrance of "my dear son, whom God raised up to do so great a work." Mr. T. H. Olney next relaid a stone which was originally placed in the schoolhouse by his father, the late Mr. Thos. Olney, who was at the time senior deacon at the Metropolitan Tabernacle. The third stone was placed in position by Rev. Charles Spurgeon (on behalf of Mrs. Spurgeon, who was unable to be present at the ceremony), and the fourth by Dr. Pierson, who said it was not perhaps inappropriate that America should be represented on that occasion, seeing that the late Mr. Spurgeon had as many zealous and enthusiastic friends and admirers across the sea as he had in Great Britain. The late pastor and founder of the Orphanage in his characteristics reminded him of the properties of the stone, inasmuch as Charles Haddon Spurgeon was built square, solid, and substantial; but his work was likely to be found more enduring than the stone which was being laid in that foundation. Dr. James A. Spurgeon, as president, also laid a foundation-stone for the new Memorial Hall.

The evening meeting had Alderman Cory, of Cardiff, for chairman, and addresses were given by Revs. G. F. Gould, M.A., William Cuff, Dr. Spurgeon, Dr. Pierson, and others.

MADAME TEL SONO.—To avoid any misunderstanding regarding the withdrawal of Mr. Trotter as temporary treasurer for the above fund, he requests us to state that he only did so as he was abroad, and he now commends the work to all interested in Japan. Some £140 is still required for the building fund, and £150 for furnishing the schools. Madame Tel Sono's address is 19, Pelham-place, S.W.

The Mildmay Conference.

OPENING MEETING.

This historic gathering shows no decadence in ttendance or interest. At eleven o'clock on Tuesday orning, when the public Conference opened, there as not a vacant seat in the great hall, which has en the scene of so many of these united assemlies of Christian people, who come literally from he four corners of the earth. The morning was ull and betokened more rain; but the clouds olled partially away, and the Conference opened in air weather.

Sir S. A. Blackwood was in his wonted place in he chair, apparently quite recovered from his ecent serious illness. When the clock had chimed he hour the crowded congregation bowed reverently silent petition, and there was sung as usual Mr. ennefather's beautiful invocation :—

Jesus, stand among us
In thy risen power;
Let this time of worship
Be a hallowed hour.

Another hymn was sung; the congregation read he 97th Psalm; and Rev. W. H. Barlow, vicar of slington led in the opening prayer, which was eeply earnest and comprehensive, embracing etitions for individual, social, and national bless-g. Special reference was made to the loss of the ictoria, and prayer offered for the survivors, and or the bereaved relatives of the lost.

n his introductory words, referred to his own thankulness in being able to be present, and also made ouching illusion to the inexpressible loss caused by he departure of the late Mrs. Pennefather. Dr. urns Thomson, too, who lived and laboured in onnection with Mildmay, has gone. Being deurred from any lengthened address, Sir Arthur ad portions of Leviticus ix., finding in its opening erses "a full Christ for empty sinners and empty ints." "Aaron's sons presented the blood" (verse 9); is not this our privilege to-day as Christians? Aaron lifted up his hands and blessed them"; eautiful type of our ascending Lord, who stands mong us to-day in his risen power. Other suggesve typical lessons for present-day living were found n this Old Testament narrative. The recent dying xperiences of a friend and earnest Christian orker were mentioned—how he had a wondrous iew of sin and of self as he approached the conines of the spirit world, and stood in the light of od. There was no direct reference by the chairan to the special subject of the Conference this ear—the second advent of our Lord.

In introducing Dr. A. T. Pierson, the chairman aid it was his last address in this country at is time, and he was leaving London that afternoon. change had been made (he added) in the order of he speaking. There was to be but one "selected peaker," so as to leave more room for varied stimony and free utterance. After a brief prayer or constraining, sustaining, and restraining grace, roceeded with his address, which turned out to be remarkable one in the comprehensiveness of its cope. He had remained a few days in the country, s said, in order to be at the Conference. In disssing such a subject as the Kingdom of God, our nited experience helps us little, and we must depend n a careful and comprehensive study of the word f God. Explaining briefly the two methods of cripture study known as the deductive and inducve, he said there were difficulties in both. What, e may ask, first of all, is a kingdom? It is a olm ruled by a sovereign, and it has a marked lation to the periods of governments. The peaker entered on a somewhat minute definition s to the different meanings of the three senses in hich the word "world" is used in Scripture, as epresenting the material universe, the Church, nd the ages of time. The æons or ages are as a tructure built up by God in symmetrical order, to e one day headed up in Christ, as a building is eaded up in a dome or spire. There are five such ages" mentioned in Ephesians—iii. 5; i. 21; . 1; iii. 21; ii. 7. These ages, embracing times ast, present, and to come, he regarded as five eriods having to do with different aspects of the ingdom of God.

Confining himself first to "the present age," hich began with the advent of the Holy Ghost, r. Pierson said it is spoken of in Scripture as an vil age, and only an evil age. It is the age of the ut-gathering of the body of Christ from all nations. The Church is not synonymous with the Kingdom. This is also the age of the Gentiles, and of the work of the Holy Ghost. The Spirit is never represented as an incarnated Person. He appeared in varied expressive forms, e.g., dove, fire, and wind. This is the age of the invisibility of the Kingdom, which is not to be confounded with the external and the visible Church. The superficial union of the Church and State does not enter into the idea of the true kingdom; there is no such thing and can be no such thing in this age as a "Christian nation" or a "Christian world." Another point to be noted is the individuality of the kingdom, so far as it exists now. During this present evil age iniquity is and always will be triumphant. Christ has not assumed the throne, and Satan has usurped it. The saints are in bonds of restriction, and the Church is in the wilderness; but Satan is unbound. In Matt. xiii. there are the seven parables, which represent the unfolding of the kingdom, and which all refer to the present age—the pressing of souls into the kingdom, the temporary exclusion of the Jews, &c.

The coming age is the age of the Son, as the present is the age of the Spirit. Christ will then resume and complete his reign, and the words of Joel will be fully realised in the outpouring of the Spirit on all flesh. A feature of this coming age is to be visibility, extensity (one flock and one shepherd), and the salvation of all Israel. It will be the collective age, and the age of completion, when all shall be headed up in Christ. It is to be the period of conquest and the sword. Satan will be bound, and his kingdom will be destroyed. The saints now bound will be unbound, and there will be judgments more or less destructive.

Ten words indicate the whole sweep of the future. They are—Return, Revelation, Refreshing, Restitution, Restoration, Regeneration, Reception, Resurrection, Redemption, Recompense. They may be thus divided into five pairs :—

Return and Revelation—Having to do with Jesus Christ Himself (Luke xix. 12; Rev. i. 13).
Refreshing and Restitution—Respecting the Spirit and his work (Acts iii. 19; iii. 21).
Restoration and Regeneration—Relating to Israel and this world (Acts i. 6).
Reception and Resurrection—Telling of the living and sleeping saints (Rev. xxv.; Luke xiv. 14).
Redemption and Recompense—The final release of the saints from every corruption, the reward of the servants of God, and the recompense of the evil one (Eph. iv. 30; 2 Thess. i. 6; Rev. xxii. 12).

There seems to be an age beyond the coming age—represented by a word which means "for ever and ever." This appears to be the age of the Father's kingdom. The leading text is 1 Cor. xv. 24 onwards, "When He shall have delivered up the kingdom to the Father, . . . and hath put all enemies under his feet," etc. Here is the close of the mediatorial reign of the Son, and the giving of the sceptre back to the Father. Towards this age all other ages move. As Christ says in his prayer, "Our Father who art in heaven, . . . thy kingdom come, thy will be done, as in heaven so on earth." There shall be universal sway and undisputed obedience here as there. This looks even beyond the millennial age. During the present or the next age no such final triumph is represented. It must, therefore, pertain to a period beyond. It will be also a period of the final glory of the saints "in the Kingdom of the Father." The work of the Spirit and of the Son shall have been complete, and God will be all in all.

All illustrations are of course inadequate; but let us suppose a world-wide empire, with the King, and Prince Royal and Princess Royal as only children. To a revolted province there goes first the Prince, who is insulted and rejected; and then the Princess, who fulfils her secret mission. Suddenly the Prince Royal reappears, and all enemies still unsubdued are destroyed, and the reins of power are surrendered into the hand of the King. God shall dwell in the midst of a perfected and glorified humanity.

After a season of prayer, silent and oral, the latter led by Lord Radstock, specific requests were read by Colonel Morton; including the persecuted and the persecutors in Russia, and those who labour in the Gospel there; for the Armenian prisoners now under sentence of death; that Romish aggression may be stayed, and that such blasphemous mockery as the dedicating of England to the "Mother of God" may be overruled to the hastening of Christ's coming and kingdom.

MILDMAY AND ITS WORK.

The gathering dispersed without any further addresses; but the chairman, before the singing of the last hymn, made the following statement :—

Mildmay does not advertise or beg, but its wants are very great, in order to the carrying on of its work. Because it does not advertise or beg it is perhaps overlooked by many who delight to help forward the Lord's work in other ways. I should like to mention, for the information of the gathering, that at the present moment there is a deficit of £3500 in meeting the current expenses. You may not know that connected with the centre here there are maintained two hospitals, three medical missions, twenty missions in and about London, a Training Home for forty ladies for foreign work, an Orphanage, a probation Home, two Convalescent Homes, an Invalid Home. Forty buildings are occupied in the various works connected with Mildmay. Besides that, there are the necessary expenses of the Conference Hall and its services all the year round.

I mention these facts for your consideration. A steward said to Colonel Morton this morning that when no appeal or statement of this kind was made from the platform about one in fifty gave in the retiring collection; when the facts were mentioned, one in five gave. That is an important statement, which I should like to leave also with you. May God incline your hearts towards this service.

THE LOST LAMB.

Miss Blundell, of Andernos, Gironde, France, writes :—A paragraph in a recent issue of The Christian, referring to Tennyson and the myriads of solar systems, brought to my mind the following passage of a sermon on "The Good Shepherd," preached by Cennick, at St. Gennis, in Cornwall, in 1744 :—

Our Saviour, in a certain parable, saith, A shepherd who had an hundred sheep and lost one, left the ninety and nine in the Wilderness, and went out to seek that he had lost, and did not end his search, or give up his care and return till he found it, and then he laid it upon his shoulders and brought it home rejoicing. Afterwards he acquainted all his friends and neighbours of it, namely, that he had found the sheep that he had lost, and was more glad about that one than of all the rest that went not astray.

This He spake of himself, for He is that good shepherd who kept his Father's innumerable flocks, and when the devil, like a roaring lion, had seized one, namely, the human race—which, however great in our eyes, to him must be only like one lamb out of an hundred, and less, since all the nations of the earth to him are like a drop of the bucket. He did not think, "Tush! it is only one lamb, it is but one world, I can make me many with a word speaking," nor did He slight his loss and let it pass unheeded, as if it was far better for ten thousand worlds to perish than that He should venture his life and undergo pain and danger. No. He arose from his everlasting throne willingly, and so infinitely He valued us, so faithful was He to his Father's flock, and so tender and loving to us that were lost, that He left all the worlds above, parted as it were with the ninety and nine, and came a far journey of thirty years and upwards, and when He had found us, we were in the mouth of the lion and the jaws of the bear, torn, and polluted, and spoiled, and not worth his notice.

Yet He attacked the enemy, and in righteousness made war; He wrestled till his sweat was like great drops of blood falling down to the ground. Nor did He give over till He had no whole part, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, but was bruised and sore smitten in body and soul. Nor yet did He yield till, in his last dying pangs, He caught the bear, Death, as it were, by the beard and slew him; and as He poured out his own soul. He trod with such violence on the lion and the dragon that had deceived the nations so long that he gave up his prey, and our Shepherd cried out for joy, "It is finished!" and immediately took a part of his spoil (the soul of one of the thieves) with Him into Paradise, and bid all his angels and saints rejoice with Him, "for now," saith He, "I have found that which I had lost."

Yea, He rejoiced more, and there was more joy in the Holy Ghost and among the angels of God over this redemption, this saving his lost sheep, than over all the rest of his vast eternal creation beside. All the heavens, from that time to this, ring with it. "Now is come salvation." Thus has He merited that great name among the churches, "The Good Shepherd" that "giveth his life for his sheep."

LYNCH LAW IN THE SOUTH.—3.

With such increasing lawlessness, encouraged by officials and unchecked by pulpit or press, it is no wonder that 1892 should have exceeded all other years of the past decade in the territory it covered and in its record of murder by mobs. There were 241 persons lynched in the United States last year, when the burnings in Arkansas and Alabama took place. These two States, with Tennessee and Louisiana, share the odium of the largest list of lynched for last year. Thirty-five of these were murdered in the West and North, the remainder in the South; 161 were negroes, eighty were white.

Only one-fourth of the negroes lynched last year were charged with rape; several had committed no crime whatever. A coloured man, named Hastings, was accused of murdering a white man at Jonesville, Louisiana, last November, and not only did the mob hang him, but his sixteen-year-old son and fourteen-year-old daughter were hanged also and their bodies shot full of holes. A coloured man, near Paris, Texas, bought a horse of John Ashley (a white man), and the horse kept breaking into his old pasture. Ashley thereupon locked him in the stable and refused to give him up to his owner. In a quarrel which ensued, Ashley pulled out his pistol and shot the negro dead. His negro housekeeper was the only witness to the deed, and she was visited one night shortly after by a mob, beaten, then hung up and let down, and told to leave the neighbourhood. She crawled away, more dead than alive, to her brother's house. Next day he and two friends took her to the town of Paris, lodged complaint with the sheriff, and gave the names of her assailants, whose voices she recognised. A few nights after the mob went to the house of these three men, took them out, and hung them all on the same limb. The weight of the first two bodies hanged had swung the branch so low that the third man's feet still touched the ground. To make him swing clear his legs were bent back from the knee and tied to his thighs with ropes. This was in September last. A few days after the burning of Henry Smith, which took place in February last, five months after the above crime, the mob found his stepson, Will Butler, and lynched him. The press despatches said it was because "Butler made himself notorious during the search for his father, by pretending to know Smith's whereabouts, which he would not reveal." An eighteen-year-old negro youth was hanged in Tullahoma, Tennessee, for the crime of being "drunk and saucy to white people."

The brutal lynching of three negroes in Memphis on March 9 gave me my first personal object-lesson as to the cruelty of mobs, and the connivance of the best citizens with such lawlessness, and showed me that the progressive spirit of the leading cities of the New South has made no progress on this line. These negroes were energetic, self-respecting young business men, who invested their money in trade, and built up a flourishing grocery business among their own people. The president of the company was one of the oldest letter-carriers in the city, and a personal friend of mine. He and his associates stood high in the community, with never an ill word against their characters, until the fatal day they fired on white men in defending themselves and property. Although none of the white men were killed, it was as great a crime in the eyes of white men to fire with that intent. From the moment of the shooting on their premises until they were murdered three days after, they were "desperadoes," "roughs who kept a low dive," and were denied opportunity for defence and refused bail. A white grocer named Barrett had kept a store in this locality, which was a thickly populated negro suburb of the city, before the advent of the "People's Grocery." The people mostly gave their trade to these young coloured men, and Barrett's business declined accordingly. After picking a number of quarrels with them, he came into their store and struck one of these young men with his pistol one day. McDowell was much the larger and stronger man, so he took Barrett's pistol from him, knocked him down, and gave him a good thrashing. Barrett then vowed he was coming on Saturday night to "clear out the whole store." Knowing how anxious he was to do so, these young men consulted a lawyer, who told them they would be justified in defending themselves, as they were a mile beyond the city limits and police protection. They accordingly armed several of their friends for the threatened attack, and concealed themselves in the back room of the store. At midnight they saw Barrett and a number of white men enter the back door of the premises, and, remembering the threat, fired into the crowd. Three men were wounded, and afterwards turned out to be officers in citizen's dress, who claimed to be hunting a man for whom they had a warrant, and who could have been arrested by any one of them.

When these coloured men realised their mistake, they gave up their firearms and submitted to arrest, confident they could prove their innocence of intent to fire on officers of the law. But the daily papers fanned the flames of passion, and declared it would go hard with the negroes if the wounded officers died. On Tuesday following the same papers announced that the officers were all out of danger, and would recover; but the very next night the mob went to the gaol, took out these young men, and horribly shot them to death for the crime of defending themselves and property. The Appeal Avalanche went to press at three o'clock on the morning of the 9th, and contained a two-column account of this lynching, which took place between the hours of two and three, yet the coroner's jury said it was done "by unknown parties." A mob of 100 men and boys were armed by order of the Criminal Court Judge, and sent out to the "People's Grocery" the day after the lynching, to prevent the coloured people from gathering there. They took possession of the grocery, smoked the cigars, and drank the wines in stock, broke open the cash drawer, and helped themselves to its contents. The creditors closed the place and sold, in less than two weeks after the lynching, a grocery stock worth £100 for less than an eighth of its cost. It was bought by that same Barrett who is running his grocery to-day in the same place without rivalry or competition. He has kept his word, and by aid from the authorities, "cleared out" the "People's Grocery Company" root and branch.

I was at that time editor and part owner of the Memphis Free Speech. From that date I began to investigate lynchings, protest against them, and urge our people to leave a city whose laws would not protect them. They did so, to the detriment of all business interests. In two months over 6000 had left the city. It was decided to get rid of my paper which kept up the agitation. In the issue of May 21, excuse for so doing was found in the ollowing editorial:—

"Eight negroes lynched since last issue of the Free Speech. One at Little Rock, Arkansas, last Saturday morning, where the citizens broke (?) into the penitentiary and got their man; three near Anniston, Alabama; one near New Orleans, and three near Clarksville, Georgia—the three last for killing a white man, and five on the same racket—the new alarm about outraging white women. The same programme of hanging, then shooting bullets into the lifeless bodies, was carried out to the letter. Nobody in this section of country believes the old threadbare lie that negro men outrage white women. If Southern white men are not careful they will overreach themselves, and public sentiment will have a reaction; a conclusion will then be reached which will be very damaging to the moral reputation of their women."

There were two inflammatory editorials in the morning and evening papers of May 25, commenting on this editorial, and advising the lynching of the writer. A meeting was held the same evening in the Cotton Exchange Building. The Daily Commercial, speaking of it two days after, said: "It was not an assemblage of hoodlums or irresponsible fire-eaters, but solid, substantial business men, who knew exactly what they were doing."

A committee was sent to the office of the Free Speech, and they ran the business manager out of the city and suspended the paper. I was already absent on business, and both of us were warned not to return, on pain of instant death.

These things go on where all the machinery of law and power for its enforcement are in the hands of those who foster lynching. The judges, juries, and other civil authorities are all white men. There is no chance for the escape of a negro criminal from the penalty of his crimes.

Geo. W. Cable, author of several books on the negro question—a Southern white man, who lives out of the South because of the intolerance of his section—says that out of 1200 convicts in the Georgia State prison, only twenty-two are serving as low a term as one year, while one half that number are serving sentences of ten years each. This for mere fisticuffing. For simple stealing, without violence or breaking in, some of them were serving sentences of twenty, fifteen, fourteen, twelve and ten years each. Ninety per cent. of these are negroes. The Southern States lease out these convicts to companies which build railways, dig mines, and farm large plantations, and pay the State a handsome revenue for their labour. The treatment of these convicts is such that Mr. Cable says ten years is the utmost length of time a convict can be expected to remain alive in one of these prisons. He also says: "A large majority of all these for simple stealing have been virtually condemned to be worked and misused to death." Men and woman are herded together like cattle in the filthiest quarters, and chained together while at work.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean printed an interview with a young coloured woman who was sent to the convict farm in Mississippi for six months for fighting. The costs, etc., lengthened the time to eighteen months. During her imprisonment she had two children, but lost the first one from premature confinement, caused by being tied up by the thumbs, and punished for failure to do a full day's work. She and other women testified that they were forced to criminal intimacy with the guards and cooks to get food to eat. The details of vice, cruelty, and exposure thus fostered by the States whose treasuries are thus enriched, exceed anything reported from Siberia. They are practised for the most part upon negroes who are poor, ignorant, and friendless, and have no way of making their sufferings known.

A little black girl, named Mildred Brown, aged thirteen years, was legally hanged by South Carolina last October, and a fifteen-year-old boy is to be hanged by the same State this present month. Alabama hanged a ten-year-old boy last year also.

This is not all, but enough has been taken from their own newspaper reports to show there is no lack of zeal nor opportunity for the punishment by law of all criminals. All that the Afro-American race asks is that a fair trial shall be given those who are charged with crime, and punished only when proven guilty by a jury of their peers at due process of law. Knowing something of the situation, will Christianity join with us in stirring up public sentiment which shall give the Afro-American an equal chance in the race of life with other human beings?

THE SERVANTS' MISSION.

The report of this good work shows the steady continuance of the various branches. Mr. Goodchild writes:—"The 26th year did not pass without trial, but we had much to cheer us and to call forth praise to God. The many letters telling of good received and the stirring testimonies given at the meetings, were of a cheering nature. In October a Mission was held by Frank Brewster, who, twenty years before, was born again while with us. Afternoon and evening, day after day, the glad tidings streamed from his lips. Not a few thank God for the burning words he spoke. Over 15,000 books and tracts were given away during the year, chiefly to coachmen and footmen at Her Majesty's Drawing Rooms, at balls, evening parties, and political receptions. On these occasions many interesting conversations took place with the men. About 250 indoor and 50 outdoor meetings were held. The members of our Christian Servants' Association were also active in their different localities. About 200 different men passed through the Men's Home, and about the same number of women through the Women's." The superintendent is Mr. James Goodchild, whose address is 14, Sloane-terrace, S.W.

SINAI AND SION.

"God chose Mount Sion whence the Gospel was to be sounded forth, as the Law had been from Mount Sinai."

Sinai speaks in voice of thunder,—
This, O people, is for you,
These the Mighty One's commandments,
These are what you have to do—
Lightnings flashing, upward dashing,
Through the throng that stood in awe,
Moses, God-appointed leader,
Brought the tablets of the Law.

Sion whispers, Grace hath done it,
O my people, all for you,
Grace forestalled your lost condition,
Nought there is for you to do—
Grace is streaming like a river
O'er a parched and barren sod,
Come, rejoice in healing waters,
From the blood-sprent throne of God.

Letters to Dorothy.—7.

My Dear Dorothy,—When my little partner and I—did I tell you I had one now? a beautiful one, who fits in exactly. It seems to make more plain the reason why the disciples were sent out by twos—opposite always in disposition, too, if you study it. Peter had his Andrew, John his James, and I my smiling May to brighten this dull November nature.

We go together, and, if need be, go our different ways, and return to talk it over. Working develops us and helps the work, and then we have the "two agreed as touching anything" when we ask of our Heavenly Father.

Well, as I started to say, when my little partner and I, about once a fortnight, or oftener, are tired and discouraged—which, of course, we never should be—one of us says to the other, "Art thou weary, art thou languid? Let's go to see our oasis." We always come back with smiling faces. Dark indeed would be the cloud her sunny self could not dispel.

"Our oasis" is a beloved old German lady whom we found in one of the first explorations of our parish. All she needs is the halo to make her a saint, if saints could have very round faces and wear "'specs."

Ministering to the saints is not the least pleasant part of our work. There are sure to be some hidden away in our miserable street, but such a one as ours is rare. She greets us with a face like the rising sun for good cheer. Her quaint English makes us smile into the cups of fragrant coffee she gives us. Her golden pound-cake is delicious—like herself.

Her old soldier of a husband adores her. From our window on Sunday mornings we love to see the dear old lovers coming along arm-in-arm to church.

'Twas her birthday to-day. "Father is so foolish, I told him so," she said in a fond protesting voice as she showed his gift, a beautiful carved hand-mirror.

Her great heart overflows with sympathy for our work. No one can excel her as a counsellor, for she is wise with that "wisdom which is from above."

When "we know as we are known," how many of the joyous surprises of our work may be recognised as her answered prayers, for she says she prays every morning that God may guide our every footstep. She says she cannot pray "before people," her English is so poor—but such prayers! She has talked with God so many years that her prayers rise upward on glad strong wings as the lark soars.

Prayer! Such work as ours is blessed for the revelation it brings of the value of prayer. Not only do we rejoice in the unasked prayers of our German saint, but whenever in our little community of souls there is an invalid or one shut in by the care of small children, we beseech them, "Pray for us; you can do that. Join with us in prayer for these people around you, for whose spiritual life we so greatly care. We gather to-night in a cottage prayer-meeting across the way to pray for one another. You cannot come, but pray for us while we pray for you."

We love those for whom we have learned to pray. When once they have promised that, the bond between us is assured.

Somebody in the second floor rear talked mean about you. "Pray for a gentle heart of forgiveness toward her. Pray that God may give her some blessing," we plead. Next week when we call on the second floor rear, she is very likely to say: "Mrs. B. has been mad at me, but to-day I was so surprised; she brought my little sick girl a bowl of soup." "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of." And so all our hearts are "bound by gold chains about the feet of God."

Do we covet only sympathy and a prayer from poor homes? No, indeed, the horizon widens. There is a wealthy friend on the avenue who has grown spiritually weak through a life of too much ease. She listens eagerly to accounts of our work.

"Rich people," as Professor Graham Taylor said to us one morning, "are only common people with more things." Her heart like any other aches to reach beyond itself. Some of these "things" are just what one of my friends in the alley needs. Two and two make four you see, isn't it beautiful? Only some one must add them. My "poorie" is made happy in receiving, she blessed in giving, and I thrice blessed in doing the little sum in addition. Best of all, when with the gift she is won to breathe a prayer for the receiver. As frail a link as that has sometimes bound a soul anew to a neglected Saviour.

When the husband of one of "my women," a man whose limited life has greatly embittered him, said to me one day: "Why do you talk religion just to poor folks; don't these rich sinners up on the avenues need it too?" 'twas good to be able to tell him that I had spent the evening before in serious talk with such "a rich man" as the Saviour once met and loved, warning him that the love of money could stifle his soul's life and urging him to "lay up treasures in Heaven," that he might be "rich toward God"; and another evening writing a letter to another rich friend, who had said he would willingly exchange all he had for so firm a faith as mine in the Bible and the Divinity of Christ, trying to show him with what gentle sympathy our Saviour met that honest doubter, Thomas, and asking him to give up thinking and arguing about it, and to fall on his knees praying, "God, my Father, reveal to me whether the Bible is thy Word, that I may believe it, and Jesus Christ thy Son, that I may follow Him."

One hand upon society life, where can be found those generous hearts only waiting for guidance towards a need, withering ones still capable of refreshing and expansion through the wholesome tonic of work for others, famished ones with souls actually starving for the "Bread of Life:" the other hand firmly grasping the hands of dear people who lack all things, though many of them "rich in faith," and one's eyes looking steadfastly up into the blessed face of Him who, "for our sakes, though He was rich yet became poor"—wouldn't this be the ideal life, Dorothy?

Surely one must "covet earnestly the best gifts" that there may be more to give. Undreamed-of aspirations for character, countless new outreachings of the soul belong with such an ideal of life.

To whom can we go but to the "Giver of every good and perfect gift"? "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." "Out of him shall flow waters of living water," bubbling up, overflowing, making green and beautiful all the space just around one's own life.

We may talk about the Christian's dependence upon God. We may believe it and teach it, but we learn it in its depths. We live it to the uttermost only when a work utterly beyond our powers is given into our hands.

The very necessity of keeping one's own life pure before we can help others would drive us to the Fountain (Ps. li. 13). "Then will I teach transgressors thy ways." Sound the deeps of David's "then" in the 51st Psalm.

With our own needs and the needs of our people must we not tarry long at the Master's feet?

"Give us this day our daily bread" means more since "us" has come to include them—our dear people.

MISSIONERS IN CANADA.

MONTREAL.*

Never certainly did a band of Christian ministers cross the Atlantic with more exalted aim, and never did the Spirit divine more truly authenticate a Christian mission, than that of the Keswick brethren in Canada. Their advent in Montreal was unheralded. Vague rumours were abroad that they were preachers of a perfection absolute, a state sinless, an experience transcendental. These rumours intimidated some of the more conservative ministers, but from the very hour when they opened their commission prejudice disappeared, and the higher and more spiritual element of all the churches was attracted and advantaged by their teaching and influence.

The profound and spiritual expositions of Brooke, the sweet and scholarly address of Macgregor, full of a tenderness that reminded of McCheyne, the manly, vigorous, practical, and powerful utterances of Inwood, will long live in the memory of all who heard them.

Their teachings were to many minds a revelation of the blessed possibility of living the Christ life. These brethren never traversed a standard of one of the churches, never passed beyond the clause in the Anglican service which prays that God would cleanse the thoughts of the heart by the inspiration of his Spirit, that we may perfectly love and worthily magnify his holy name.

Ministers, Anglican and so-called Dissenters, with a goodly company from most of the churches, attested the great spiritual benefit received, which would make life to them more blessed and influential for good. Imperishable memories of mingled mercy and high resolve have followed their labours in this most Catholic city of the Continent. As the brethren have travelled west the influence of their gatherings has become wider and more potential. In Toronto, Guelph, Stratford, and Hamilton they have been the ministers of unbounded blessing, which, we believe, will abide. Earnestly is it desired that consecrated brethren from the Keswick Convention may ever and anon come over in like manner to help in this Dominion, which holds empire in a great future.

Thousands of devout hearts will follow these brethren beloved with their prayers, and cherish the hope of yet once again seeing their faces in our land.

* Some weeks ago we gave an account of the visit of these brethren to Montreal from the pen of an esteemed correspondent. Our readers will, however, be glad to read this report by the Principal of the Wesleyan College.

HAMILTON.

Three weeks of special services conducted by different English workers have been held during the month of May, in the city of Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, which have resulted in blessing to the Lord's people, as well as in the salvation of many souls.

From May 7 to 11, Revs. H. Brook, C. Inwood, and G. H. C. Macgregor conducted a series of meetings for "the deepening of spiritual life" among Christians. The path of separation, consecration, and confidence in the Lord to keep his people from the power of sin was clearly defined. Many have been blessed during these meetings, and a hope expressed that at some future date there may be more such gatherings.

After these brethren left Mr. W. R. Lane (who was soon joined by Lord Bennet) began special evangelistic meetings in St. John's Presbyterian church, as also some Bible readings in the Y.M.C.A. rooms. From each of these efforts, in spite of the rain the first few days, very much blessing has been granted of the Lord, and many souls gathered in, and the people of God lifted up. One very pleasing feature in the work has been the number of young persons who have come out on the Lord's side, and have since been received into the fellowship of the Church.

We promise a very warm welcome for Mr. W. R. Lane should he ever return to these parts; he came wholly a stranger, but has made his way with the people, and has left many warm friends behind who will be ready to receive him if he should come this way again. Canada needs some well-taught evangelists who are free from denominationalism, men who can open the Word; this our brother was able to do very intelligently and acceptably.

In Ottawa he was even more blessed, as we hear of great gatherings, but the season of the year was against him; the autumn and winter are the times for Canada.

Rescue Work in Portsmouth.

Mrs. Colebrook has completed thirty years' work for the reclamation in Portsmouth of those erring women who are the usual accompaniment of a garrison and naval town. Her health having been now brought so low, with but little prospect of recovery or regaining sufficient power to conduct the work, her daughter, Miss Colebrook, has lately been appointed superintendent, and there is every hope of the work being carried on with its wonted efficiency. During the past thirty years nearly 3300 women have entered the Home, and a large proportion of these have been hopefully dealt with and placed in positions of safety and honest service. The work in this Home has not merely been that of moral reclamation, but many have had their hearts touched by Divine grace, and have turned out bright and useful Christians. Between forty and fifty inmates can be accommodated in the institution, the chief industry being the laundry.

The total expenditure of the Home and temperance restaurant adjoining the main building for the last year was £1391, while the income was £1213. About £3 daily is required for the general working. The committee are sorry to say there is now a debt of £350 on the general fund, which they earnestly desire to pay off immediately. The hon. treasurer is Mr. P. H. Goodman, The Ferns, Kingston-crescent, Portsmouth.

African Missions Visited.—5.

BY D. A. HUNTER.

LOVEDALE.

Few missionary institutions in Africa are better known or have had a more far-reaching influence than Lovedale, where I am writing these lines. It has come so far within the bounds of civilisation, that one can now travel to within forty miles of it by train; but these forty miles in the mail coach—a two-wheeled Cape-cart, drawn by four horses at a fast trot over rough roads—must be a revelation to any traveller who has only accustomed himself to Pullman cars and luxurious carriages with rubber tyres, easy cushions, and well-tempered springs.

Lovedale is situated about 650 miles north-east of Cape Town, and about forty miles west of King William's Town. It derives its name from an eminent member of the Glasgow Missionary Society, Dr. Love, who was one of the founders of that society, and also the first secretary of the London Missionary Society. The commencement of a Mission, in the erection of a primitive church and missionary's house, was attempted in 1824, in what was then independent Kaffraria, on a site a few miles east of the present one, and now known as Old Lovedale. This station was destroyed in the war of 1835, and it was not until after three changes that the site now occupied by Lovedale was finally determined.

The need of a place and means for educating missionaries' children, and young native men who might be trained as teachers, became so apparent, that the home directors sanctioned the formation of the institute, which was opened on July 21, 1841, by Rev. Wm. Govan, who began work with eleven natives and nine Europeans. At first the natives thought they should be paid for sending their children to school, and three times the work of the institution was interrupted by war; but, despite all difficulties, it has gone on and prospered, until the small beginning has become a great thing.

Several of the principles on which Lovedale is conducted are worthy of note. Only those who have lived where there are both white and coloured people can fully realise the strong feeling there is amongst the former against having any social intercourse with the latter. One might specify India, Ceylon, the West Indies, and the Southern States of North America. The same feeling is strongly developed in South Africa, but at Lovedale this unchristian spirit is combatted. Europeans and natives sit side by side in class; they have a common dining-hall, but separate tables; they meet together in athletic contests, and thus acquire mutual respect and sympathy.

A second principle is the unsectarian attitude of Lovedale. "We did not come to Africa to make Presbyterians, but to make Christians," say the missionaries. "Christianity" and "the Christian Church" are the terms used. Dr. Stewart abolished free scholarships, to which Presbyterians had a preferential claim, and introduced one uniform fee for all natives of whatever church. This put all denominations on the same level. Hence it is that one finds in Lovedale students from missions connected with almost all the great branches of the Protestant Church, and the London Missionary Society supports one of the theological professors who assist in the training of a native ministry for the various denominations.

Amidst the educational work, one rejoices to find ever kept to the forefront what we all need to learn, viz., that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." The aim is to bring each boy and girl into personal contact with Jesus Christ, as their individual Saviour, and fit them, by education and training, to become missionaries, ministers, evangelists, teachers, and artisans among their own people and among those farther in the interior where the Gospel has not yet reached.

I have mentioned the training of artisans, and cannot pass over the industrial departments of Lovedale without a brief notice. When a native is converted he reads in his Bible, "If a man will not work, neither shall he eat." Hitherto his wife or wives have worked for their lord, and it is hard for the African to buckle to regular manual labour. This is a difficulty that the missionary must meet, and it is being met to a great measure in Lovedale. Carpentry is taught, and tables, desks, school forms, clothes boxes, etc., have been made, besides a great part of the new building and alteration being done by the apprentices. A wagon-making and blacksmith department are in full swing, and printing and bookbinding comprise another department.

The twenty pupils with whom Lovedale began in 1841 have increased to between seven and eight hundred. Grandchildren of its first pupils are now themselves pupils, and for those who desire to go into individual cases, let me recommend a perusal of "Lovedale: Past and Present," a volume containing a brief record of two thousand who have passed through this grand institution.

SALVATION ARMY IN FRANCE.

BY CATHERINE BOOTH-CLIBBORN.

THE PRODIGAL BARON.

There is a young man, son of a French baron, who has run through two or three ordinary fortunes. Truly a prodigal son, having spent his substance in every kind of dissipation and sin. He now owes 80,000 fr., which, however, the fortune coming to him at his father's death will cover many times over.

His life is a horrible romance, with his card-playing at Monte Carlo and his fast living. Tens of thousands of francs his parents have paid down at different times, when the son has promised reformation; but they soon learned that at Cannes, Nice, in the United States or Canada, he was again leading the same life. They gave him up as incorrigible, and closed the door upon him.

Often, in his native town, lounging in an open carriage, with a disreputable companion at his side, has he passed his father's carriage, and made horrible grimaces at his parents. At last he drove up to our Rue Auber hall, accompanied by a young woman. He entered our meeting for a joke; but soon the efforts to make-believe became impossible. The following evening he was again present, this time alone. He sat and listened as a soul only listens when it discovers that it has made shipwreck of all. Late in the evening angels rejoiced over that prodigal boy, once "lost" and "dead," now "found" and "alive."

The next day he paid the fare of the girl home to her father's house in Lyons, left the hotel where he had been staying, and told us he was willing to do anything to start a new life. This is several months ago, and he has lived at our headquarters ever since, always willing and happy to serve. All can bear witness to the perfect purity and honesty of his life since the light of heaven fell on his "road to Damascus." His whole and sole desire is to make known his Saviour to this lost France.

When I was in his native town five weeks ago, according to the son's earnest desire I went to his parents to carry the good news of his conversion. On arriving at the door my secretary was stopped by a gentleman, who said, looking at her uniform, "Oh! what have you to do in such a house as that? My poor child, you will have a fine reception!"

But no sooner had we rung than the outer door was opened, and we were shown straight into a luxuriously-furnished reception room. The Baroness quickly arrived, followed by her young married daughter, both elegantly dressed. I at once announced the object of my visit, but, far from being rejoiced at the news, the mother remained silent and stiff; still I persevered, and then the Baroness began to tell me of his bad conduct. I listened for some time, and replied: "I well understand the intense pain that his conduct must have caused you, but allow me to remind you that all this took place when he was a 'Saul'; now, since his conversion, a great change has taken place with the young man. I personally, and those who are constantly with him, can bear testimony to this fact, and this change is owing to the love and grace of God in his heart."

Still the mother remained cold, and I continued: "This is a most important time in your son's career, and so much depends on us, you, and his family to encourage him when taking these first steps in his new life."

I could see that her heart knew nothing of this Divine love and power. Still I pleaded on, and then knelt down to pray with them. But both mother and daughter remained obdurate, cold, and unbelieving, so hard is it for formalists to believe in such transformations. However, I left her to God, determined to mother the poor boy as best I could.

His gratitude is most touching, and he has written frequently to his parents, but they have never answered a single line. The other day he told me that he never felt so encouraged and so moved in his life as when the Commissioner took him into his office and told him he was going to help him, and kissed him, adding that he loved him. The tears came to his eyes, and he replied: "Never before had I felt such a strong affection for anyone. Oh, that did me more good than words can express. For years no one had embraced me with a real affection. I have no recollection of a loving embrace from my father or mother; and when the Commissioner embraced me I felt I was in a family of love, and had found a father, and that was more to me than all else."

We have every reason to believe that he will make a real soul-winner.

FIELD LANE INSTITUTIONS.

The fifty-first annual meeting of Field-lane Ragged Schools and Refuges was held on Wednesday week, at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly. Earl Compton, M.P., presided. During the afternoon the children of the industrial school sang several songs, and the boys' school band played at intervals.

Mr. Peregrine Platt read a summary of the report, stating that the problem before them was how to help the innocent sufferer without indirectly relieving those of whose vices he is the victim, how to conduct a great benevolent organisation so that it shall succour the needy without pauperising them, and how to adapt the modes of operation to the ever-varying forms in which human distress presents itself. The committee have felt that to attempt to deal effectually with the poor without recognising their spiritual needs would be to undertake a hopeless task. They therefore attach great value to the ragged church service, which gathers every Sunday morning a congregation averaging between 500 and 600 of the most destitute of the London poor, who would certainly not be induced to attend any ordinary place of worship. The Sunday and week evening services have also been continued for the poor of the neighbourhood. The Bible ragged schools have been attended by about 400 children on Sunday, and 300 on Friday, and the youths' free night school was well attended during the six winter months, for the golden age has not yet arrived when the ragged child has become extinct. The sewing school for poor girls has been in full operation, being attended by some 250 girls who are taught to mend and make their articles of clothing, and are trained in neatness and sobriety of dress and character. Nearly 1100 garments were made in the school during the year. The meeting for mothers on Monday afternoons has been most encouraging, and forms a compact mission service. It is attended by about 400 women. The male and female refuges have sheltered 525 persons during the year, and have assisted 139 men and women to make a fresh start in life.

The Boys' and Girls' Industrial Schools have met with the greatest success during the year, and the results have been most satisfactory. The children are trained for useful employment, but above all they are influenced for their highest spiritual necessities, and a great many boys and girls have given evidence of possessing Christian principles and newness of life. The schools contain 220 children. The boys' school was enlarged during the year to accommodate 140 boys. The other departments of work touched upon were the servants' home, maternity society, crèche, penny bank, Band of Hope, clothing club, distribution of food, relief of distress, children's dinners. The work tells its own tale and pleads its own cause. For upwards of half a century this Institution has stood in the thick of the conflict against ignorance and vice. It has multiplied its operations, it has varied its methods, it has enlarged its buildings, it has expanded its sphere of labour, but it has never changed its front. What it was in the early days of Lord Shaftesbury it is now. It rests on the same Evangelical basis, it teaches the same simple Gospel, it works among the same squalid poverty, and the committee very earnestly appeal for support to carry on the work in the future, as in the past, with energy and determination.

The cash statement was presented by the secretary, and addresses setting forth the claims of the institution were delivered by Mr. F. A. Bevan, Revs. Dr. MacEwan, Dr. J. Hiles Hitchens, and A. B. Boyd-Carpenter.

IN THE CONSTRUCTION of church buildings, the school-room should be of the first importance. If the Church forgets the young, the young will forget the Church.—William Watson.

THE ARMENIAN PRISONERS.

SINCE our last issue the friends in this country of the condemned Armenians have been very busy, endeavouring to lay and mature plans whereby these prisoners, and especially Professors Thoumaian and Kayayan, of Anatolia College, should be released from the effects of so unjust and monstrous a sentence. A number of City gentlemen were called together on Thursday afternoon at 47, New Broad-street, by Dr. Evans Darby, of the Peace Society, who has for some time taken a lively interest in these Armenian brethren. At the meeting, which was presided over by Mr. Albert Spicer, M.P., it was resolved to wait without delay on Lord Rosebery, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and a small deputation proceeded to the Foreign Office. Lord Rosebery was absent, but the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, Sir E. Grey, received one of the deputation, and informed him that the Government were fully alive to the importance of the situation, and were only waiting the report of their Turkish Vice-Consul, who attended the trial, before taking decided action.

Meantime, Sir Richard Temple, M.P., who has shown an active interest in the matter, had resolved to move the adjournment of the House of Commons that evening, in order to draw attention to the outrage on freedom and justice, and it was understood that the Government would favour his motion. A statement by the Under-Secretary, in answer to a question, appeared to satisfy Sir Richard, however, that all was being done that could officially be done at the moment, and he did not interpose with his motion for adjournment.

Another meeting of the City friends, who had formed themselves into a committee, was held on Friday, when it was resolved that, despite the assurances of the Foreign Office, there should be no slackening of effort to arouse public opinion as to the urgency of the danger to the condemned men; another meeting, which should more adequately represent the various Christian Churches and missionary societies, was fixed for Monday afternoon. This meeting was accordingly held at 47, New Broad-street, last Monday, when there was a considerable attendance of brethren connected with different religious bodies, besides a number of Armenians.

In the absence of Mr. Spicer, the chair was taken by Mr. R. C. Morgan. Prayer having been offered, Dr. Darby recapitulated the course of proceedings in connection with previous meetings, and explained how under the Berlin and San Stefano Treaties Great Britain had a right to interpose in the internal affairs of Turkey under circumstances like the present. He gave a late item of news which had just reached him, to the effect that no practical result had come from the representations of various Ambassadors to the Porte.

Mr. A. J. ARNOLD, of the Evangelical Alliance, having mentioned the steps taken by that Society towards securing the freedom of the accused professors, Dr. HERRICK, Principal of Anatolia College, gave an address that greatly interested the meeting. He expressed gratitude at the interest and sympathy shown by British friends on behalf of these condemned prisoners, two of whom were his colleagues on the staff of the College. He declared that the American missionaries in the East, and especially the authorities of the College, had not ceased to do all that was possible in seeking to move the Turkish, American, British and German Governments to action, for the release of those of the prisoners of whose innocence of any political crime they were positively assured. He had cherished the hope up to a week ago that the Turkish authorities would acquit the two professors, whose innocence he had emphatically asserted to all Governments concerned. Besides those condemned to death there were others sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment—a worse fate even than death itself. Among these was one of their pastors, and decided action ought to be taken with respect to them. If it were found that any of the prisoners had really been criminally guilty, they could not in their case interpose; but he strongly urged that the unconditional acquittal of those professors and others whom they knew to be innocent should be demanded as an act of justice; while they might also ask, as a matter of imperial clemency and of wise policy, the free pardon of any political offenders.

Dr. Herrick was followed by Rev. Mr. DWIGHT, American missionary at Constantinople, who detailed the steps that had been taken there in the matter, and also joined strongly in vindicating the two professors from charges of complicity in sedition or any other political offence. He spoke of the calm demeanour and speech of these men under such very trying circumstances, and said they were true Christian men, trusting to their God for support and comfort in this hour of their tribulation. He said that after the sentence of condemnation they had again been put in chains, and were probably now in that condition. As one gleam of encouragement, he said that there was no likelihood of any overt action being taken by the authorities before the hearing of the appeal by the Court of Cassation, and subsequent consideration by the chief of the Mohammedan Church and the Sultan, so that immediate peril to life need not be feared.

After considerable conversation it was resolved that the committee formed should be designated the "Armenian Christian Defence Committee." Mr. Albert Spicer, M.P., was elected president, Mr. R. C. Morgan, treasurer, and Dr. Evans Darby, secretary, having associated with him Rev. H. J. Heath. A deputation of members of Parliament and other influential representatives of the Christian Churches to the Foreign Secretary was agreed upon, and a subcommittee was also appointed to convene and organise a public meeting at some early date, with the view of further informing, arousing, and eliciting public opinion as to the necessity for urgent and effective intervention on the part of the British and American Governments.

Will our readers be instant in prayer that these endangered lives may be spared, and that present events may be for the furtherance of freedom and Gospel light in these Eastern lands? Donations towards the inevitable and necessary expenses of these proceedings will be welcomed by the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN.

THE SUFFERING STUNDISTS.

THE following, penned by one who is exceptionally well informed, will call forth sympathy and fervent prayer for these feeble and persecuted brethren in Christ:—

Concerning our brethren under pressure and in bonds, there is no change for the better, but it seems as if the authorities who persecute were more than ever determined to extinguish what they so readily call "sectarians." At St. Petersburg some of our friends are closely watched, the priests coming in late in the evening to discuss dogmatical Church questions, also they preach in their churches even naming before their audiences those who have left the "Orthodox Church," and trying to excite the people against them. Two of my friends in Moscow have been placed under close supervision, the priests as well as the police visiting them whenever they like—they are forbidden to leave the place. From various parts I hear of fresh cases of persecution, and in some prisons (Moscow, Charkoff) I found brethren in chains, amongst criminals, numbered with the transgressors, and bearing the mark of criminals, waiting to be sent either to Siberia or the Caucasus. It seems to me worse and worse, and that every interference from other nations is stoutly resisted by the Government. Those brethren whom I have had the privilege of meeting in prisons and in chains were full of joy, and they counted it a great honour to bear persecution for the Gospel's sake. Their only hope is in God, and I believe our only hope for them is in Him who sitteth over the water floods.

The united prayers of the Church of God should be called out to rescue our suffering brethren and sisters, and to obtain for them from God the liberty which is refused to them by short-sighted men. I have no doubt but that great blessing will be the fruit of this time of persecution, although it also is a sifting time, and many, who are not firmly grounded on the Rock, may fall away. In the Baltic Provinces the suicidal policy of persecuting Lutherans continues, and in the public papers one can read statements by the authorities naming the Lutheran pastors who have been judged and punished. I do not think it just any longer to withhold from the criticism of the civilised world the cruel treatment by the Russian Empire of her subjects who seek to follow the dictates of the Word or God and of their consciences. There is at the present time greater liberty of conscience in heathen China and Africa than in Russia.

THE ARABIAN MISSION.

REV. JAMES CANTINE, of the American Mission at Busrah, writes:—"A few weeks ago a young man left his friends and employment at Baghdad and came here, hoping that where he was not so well known there would be less difficulties in the way of his meeting the missionaries and studying the Bible. He has been to our house several times. We have read and prayed together, and he has professed to believe in the Son of God. But he found a cross to carry here as well as in Baghdad. All his books were thrown into the river, and he himself threatened and closely watched, so that it is almost impossible for him to see us. Another converted Moslem has been here for a few weeks expecting to help in our Bible work, but ill-health has necessitated his withdrawal.

"During the past quarter the missionaries have been kept in full health and strength. The season has been cold, and, with our open houses, at times too cold for comfort. During the month of February the average daily maximum was 60·6 deg., the minimum 46·8 deg., with occasional frosts. The reserve of vigour laid up in the cool season will soon be needed for the summer's heat and depression. Our new house is making slow progress towards completion. According to the contract it should be ready for use about the middle of July, but this date will doubtless be exceeded by the builders.

"The resident English doctor has resigned his position as consular physician, and will leave for India. Medical work is the one phase of mission effort that is accepted on all sides without question, and we are constantly being asked when our 'doctor' is coming out. It is the question we ourselves would ask of our friends and the friends of missions at home, hoping and praying that some one whom Christ has healed may come over and help tell of the Great Physician. Now and again we have had Moslem young men come to us for instruction in English, but until we have the countenance of a public school such work will always be of an uncertain character. A good school in Busrah we ultimately hope to see, but the Government opposition is pronounced, and hard to overcome. We have lately gained one victory in the restoration to us of a box of Hebrew New Testaments which had been unjustly detained by the local authorities.

"Our Sunday morning service in Arabic has been regularly held, though with a varying attendance. At these and also on other occasions the large organ brought out from America has proved to be a great help and attraction. The magic lantern has also been used with interest to the people and profit as well. Our English work has been carried on as usual. Sunday services have always been held wherever the opportunity offered, and an occasional meeting for prayer and Bible study on a week-day evening has been well attended. These services have all been held on board some vessel in the harbour, and until our house is completed we shall be compelled to forego the advantages of a definite and regular place for Divine worship, and accept the kind offers made to us by the captains of the various steamers stopping here. Papers and tracts are always taken on board, and Bibles and Testaments are offered to all who will pay the nominal price asked. To one steamer a library of twenty-six volumes was loaned, and if we had the books much good might be done in this way. Suitable literature, either magazines or books, sent to us by mail, will be thankfully acknowledged and used for these purposes."

Major-General Haig, of Redhill, Surrey, is a British correspondent of this interesting Mission.

BOHEMIA.—Rev. A. W. Clark writes:—"Gospel work in Skalitz was not long in outgrowing the small hall that was secured for Divine service, and yet until now we have submitted to painful overcrowding. The owner of the house has failed, and his house has been sold. Our cheering work—sixty members and a congregation of eighty—will soon be homeless. We must build. Our poor people are sacrificing nobly, but they cannot raise one-half the amount needed. Our preacher in Skalitz has five out-stations where he regularly preaches the Gospel. Two members that help him most in the smaller meetings are marvels of grace. They have been rescued not only from sin and superstition, but from gross intemperance. In faith that God will help us we have bought a site. A building containing rooms for the preacher, for the Y.M.C.A., and a Gospel Hall for 250, will be erected this summer." Mr. Clark's address is Prague, Smichov, 280, Bohemia.

SPIRITUALISM AND PROPHECY?

The Merchants' Lectures for the month of May were delivered by Rev. Edward White, and have been published at length in successive issues of The Christian World Pulpit. They are rich in information, and thoughtful throughout. Having explained at length the Mosaic law against necromancy, or seeking to the dead, as set forth in Deut. xviii., the speaker closed his first lecture:—

"The reason of the prohibition against necromancy, or seeking to the dead for information, guidance, or comfort, is supported by the promise that God would 'raise up' to Israel, on this side the veil, 'prophets,' or inspired men, who should afford them all the supernatural guidance they required, both in life and in death; a promise embracing the line of prophets who ministered to the supernatural needs of Israel under the law, and culminating in that great prophet—the Messiah—'who hath the keys of Hades and of death.' He will 'tell us all things that He has heard of his Father,' thereby dispensing with and prohibiting all endeavours to communicate with the dead by the old forbidden arts of necromancy or witchcraft. God has given us on this side the veil, by his inspired messengers, all the information He designs that we should have respecting the secrets of the unseen, and this by a line of prophets, speaking from the mouth and by the Spirit of the Lord, and lastly, by His Son. Henceforth there is no need to yield to the temptation of consulting souls departed, or of attempting to rend the veil from the bottom, by the aid of spirits malign and apostate from God.

"And just as in past ages every grand crisis in the world's history, and each corresponding fresh revelation of redeeming mercy in its successive dispensations, has—as in the time of Moses and in the time of Christ—been accompanied by some concurrent outbreak of so now the strange and world-wide spread of the phenomena of spiritualism probably indicates, along with the great missionary revival, the near approach of one of the great secular epochs in the history of the spiritual world—I refer to the expected establishment of truth in religion and justice in life and in government over the world, when the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven, with the shout of victory, to dash the rebellious kings of the nations, and their armies, in pieces like a potter's vessel, and to establish in their room his everlasting Kingdom. For 'the dominion, and the kingdom, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall then be given to the people of the saints of the most High';—the air shall be cleared of infernal spirits—Jacob's vision of the flight of golden steps to the gate of heaven shall be realised in open communication between this world and the Universe; while the 'power of the air' shall be vested in good men glorified and their immortal King. And then shall open a new era for the nations; for righteousness, and with it peace, shall reign from pole to pole; when, as says Isaiah, 'the pale moon shall blush, and the sun be ashamed, because Jehovah himself, in greater splendour than theirs, shall reign over the earth, and before his ancient people gloriously.'"

In the second lecture Mr. White dealt with the evidence of modern spiritualism. Speaking of the author of evil, he said: "Philosophers prefer to account for all the vice and wickedness, the violence, the oppression, the injustice, the cruelty, the frightful drunkenness, the impurity, and the reckless extravagance of mankind, by attributing them all to the single action of one nature—the human—which has, they say 'little the matter with it,' rather than on the principle, assumed in the Divine revelation, that this awful sum of evil is the combined result of two depraved natures—the Human and the Satanic—operating together! At all events, the aspect of the earth, after so many ages, corresponds accurately enough with the theory of Revelation, that the world is the scene, not only of a human rebellion against God, but of one in which the chief actors are 'Principalities and Powers in the aerial places,' dominating the human world."

The third and fourth lectures dealt with Spiritualism in the light of the New Testament; and in the course of his summing up, Mr. White said:

"Through the accident of nearly forty years' residence in North-Western London, which was long the very citadel and stronghold of the new 'Revelation,' I became acquainted both with the phenomena reported by highly credible and thoroughly trained witnesses, and with those witnesses themselves. Many of them were very able and amiable people, knowing comparatively, perhaps, little of the Bible, who have now left the world, but, as in all cases, their 'works remain,' to encourage 'intrusion into things not seen,' and the practice of that 'necromancy' which was strictly forbidden by name under the Mosaic law, and as sorcery under the Gospel. And I felt inwardly persuaded that, having had the opportunity of 'perfect understanding by report of the initiated from the very first' of the works and ways of this new 'gospel' of spiritual power, it was my duty, at whatever sacrifice of peace or repute, in my last days, to declare these convictions respecting its quality before I leave this earthly scene.

"And when I reflect upon the details of our Lord's own ministry, and on those of his apostles, as recorded in our sacred books, it seems to me an urgent duty to assist in warning the unwary against even the first steps towards experimental commerce with forbidden necromancy, and much more against yielding assent to the daring and even absurd defences of it, set up by those who cite the holy scene of the Transfiguration of Christ as an encouragement towards this hideous travesty of communion with the invisible realms of God.

"Nor can I close without confessing the persuasion—apart from precise fixtures in chronology—that this striking nineteenth-century outbreak of the demonic energies seems to prognosticate the approach on earth of foretold as many think by the prophets, when the evil and deceiving spirits, having been permitted to work their will, 'with all power and signs and lying wonders,' and to gather the nations to battle in antagonism to the purposes of God, will be suddenly and visibly smitten by his uplifted arm, and consigned to that 'Abyss' of destruction to which they once 'prayed Him' not to deliver them 'before the time.' The predicted Catholic 'Apostasy' has come, 'with all power and signs and lying wonders,' its compulsory celibacy, and its impious Roman autocracy, and thenceforward (says St. Paul to the Thessalonians) will be the 'destruction' of all the Antichrists, the overthrow of the so-called governing 'Wild Beasts,' and 'False Prophets,' the restoration of indestructible Israel, 'the gathering out of the nations,' by angelic 'selection,' of them that cause stumbling-blocks (the chief leaders in rebellion both in Church and State, both in Literature and in Life), and thereupon the establishment of a New World, both in government and thought, in which, thank God, the Lord Christ shall be King over the whole earth, and the spiritual dominate the material. For then all Nature too shall be renewed, and 'break forth into singing,' at the rending of the 'veil' which has so long concealed the loftier spiritual world from mankind, and the deepest yearnings of humanity shall be answered by an absolute working union between the Visible and Invisible Realms. The ethereal physical energies have already become subject to man, and soon those higher spiritual worlds will open by the rending of that 'veil now spread over all nations.'

"Meantime we may enjoy the consolation of a real, a loftier, and a Divine Communion present, and nearer at hand, for all who know the 'secret of the Lord.' Before He left the earth the Lord Jesus said to his sorrowing disciples, 'If any man love Me, he will keep my words; and My Father will love him, and we will come unto him and take up our abode with him. Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man open the door, I will come into him, and dwell with him, and he with Me.' There is no need to seek for communion with the dead; not with the dead who are in hades, not with the dead who are with the Lord, and certainly not with souls who wander on the earth amidst the trivialities of spiritualism. For the Ever Living One Himself will dwell in our hearts, if we are his servants, and He will guard us even to his eternal kingdom.

MR. AND MRS. J. J. MEEK.—These Zulu evangelists, whose work we have already noticed, spoke last week at a meeting held at Kent House, Knightsbridge, S.W. Mr. T. A. Denny took the chair, and the Zulu Choir sang, and one of them interpreted the vigorous speech of Mrs. Meek. Mr. Meek gave details of his work among the Zulus.

CHINESE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

There are said to be about 5000 Chinese in Victoria, and there are probably as many more in other towns of British Columbia. Much of the hard work necessary for turning the wilderness into a fruitful field, the clearing away the forest growth, the making of roads and railways, etc., is done by Chinese; most of them come over from Canton for a certain number of years, and then return to their own country with the money they have made. It would be indeed a grievous thing if these men were to return to their own country as ignorant of the glorious Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ as when they left it. Yet up to a few years ago the Christians of British Columbia were content that such should be the case.

The credit of being the first to initiate a new state of things belongs to the Methodists, and their missions have fully maintained the advanced position due to their being first in the field. They now have three missionaries in the province, and expend about £1000 a year on the maintenance of the work. A thorough knowledge, not only of the Chinese language and idiom, but of their modes of thought, is an essential condition to the success of an evangelist among this intellectual people. The missionary in charge of the Methodist Mission, Rev. J. E. Gardiner, is admitted on all hands to be the one man in Victoria who thoroughly understands the Chinese and their ways. Born in China himself, the stepson of a missionary, he became from his earliest childhood thoroughly acquainted with the Chinese in the neighbourhood of Canton. From thence he went with his relations to Australia, where he kept in contact with the Chinese, and having obtained an appointment at San Francisco, we presently find him interpreting in the law courts on behalf of the Chinese. Not content with befriending the Chinese by helping them in questions of civil right, he also devoted his spare time to teaching them English and telling them of Christ. Giving up his intention to enter the Presbyterian ministry, he resolved to devote his life to the Chinese in the service of the Methodist Church.

Mr. Gardiner is still a probationer for the ministry, but he has had the privilege of leading over 150 Chinese to profess their faith in Christ. In the great majority of cases these men have shown by their lives that they are new men in Christ. There are very few women amongst the Chinese immigrants, and these few are almost all of the degraded class, on whose behalf work has been organised by the Women's Missionary Society, with the result that several have been brought to the feet of the Saviour. Schools as well as evangelistic work are carried on. The Chinese are most anxious to learn English, as it greatly increases their value in the labour market. But the preaching of the Word is the principal method of influencing the heathen. Mr. Gardiner's little church is a plain but substantial building, with seats for 150 to 200, and when the present writer had the privilege of attending, it was occupied by a most orderly and attentive congregation of Chinese. Now and again a stranger would come in, and being instructed by the doorkeeper to remove his hat, he would be politely shown to a seat, with a whispered warning "not to talk." An address was given that evening by Dr. Lin, a Chinese medical missionary who is in charge of the work at Vancouver. The congregation joined most heartily in the hymns, and in the repetition of the Lord's prayer, all, of course, in Chinese. But the most interesting part of the service was the baptism of a convert who had, as Mr. Gardiner told us, during a year of probation, been thoroughly consistent. He had been called upon to endure a great deal of persecution, and had lost his employment owing to his attachment to Christianity.

The Church of England has a well-attended Chinese night school, mainly supported by the devoted labours of half-a-dozen ladies, led by Mrs. Lipscomb, the wife of a clergyman. Since the climate is much like that of England, and there is direct communication with China viâ Yokohama, it might be found advantageous to establish a connection between missionaries labouring in the Canton Province and this place. A missionary enervated by the heat of Canton might well visit British Columbia to recruit, and be very useful in helping on the work.

THERE IS NO WASTE SO PITIFUL, so costly, as the waste of child life; save the homeless little ones from the mournful fate of a ruined lifetime.

Letters to the Editor.

"A RANSOM FOR MANY."

DEAR SIR,—Your correspondent (in current number, June 22) is justly earnest in defending the doctrine of "substitution," but in this he commends the rendering that the blessed Lord "gave his life a ransom instead of many."

This rendering of the Greek preposition anti is, however, but a secondary or tertiary sense of it, if legitimate at all. Its simple radical meaning is as of something that is before, or over against, another. It is thus the great preposition of "barter" and "exchange" (see Winer's Gram. of N.T. Greek, p. 455). It thus is one of the terms employed in N.T. with metaphorical value derived from the markets: just as agorazein, "to redeem," is based on the customs of the agora, or "market." Keeping this well in view, we can bring a good key to the figurative sense of anti. "Exchange" and "barter" nowadays are largely replaced by "weights and measures," and monetary equivalents. Let us apply it to Jno. i. 16, for example, "charis anti charitos." Here expositors (as Alford in loc.) of just account, often see but the secondary, concomitant sense of "grace succeeding grace," "continual accessions of grace." It is not the radical sense, but a deduction from it.

The radical sense is "grace over against grace." And what meaneth it? We in our usage, go into market with varied wants, and are variously supplied, but the standards of capacity and weight are fixed. The needful commodity is placed by vendor in one scale, the "weight" over against it in the other. So in "balance of the sanctuary," the weight, the standard, is an all-sufficient, sole-meritorious Christ. I want my grace, you want yours. With Him in the scale, we get equivalence; "Our God supplying all our need," &c.

So the prophet's paradox, "Buy (yet) without money and without price." It is an equivalence of antithesis, not of repetition, we have here.

And even thus the blessed Lord had "the joy set before him, over against the death of the cross" (so Winer, p. 456, rightly). Not one instead of the other. The "joy" would so not have been its necessary sequence of purchase, or recompense. But the scale with joy in it "went down"; as did the apostle's "eternal weight of glory" over against the "light affliction for the moment." Here the merchantable sense again comes in. It is a N.T. Hebraism. The word for "glory" and "weight" are in the Hebrew alike, kavōd.

Thus was the cross endured "for" the glory, not "instead of" it, as one has heard others, as well as your esteemed contributor Mr. Meyer, render it. And so, amongst many examples, was (1 Cor. ii. 15) the woman's hair (anti peribolaion) "for," not instead of, "a covering."

The two other prepositions rendered "for many" in Matt. xxvi. 28 (peri), and "for all" 1 Tim. ii. 6 (huper), which will suit your correspondent's purpose well.

I trust this may help others, as it has helped me.

"THE BOYS' BRIGADE."

DEAR SIR,—One of your "Notes and Comments" in THE CHRISTIAN, of 8th inst., closes with the remark, "Perhaps fathers and mothers may yet have something to say about it." This I take to mean that you are not unwilling to receive the opinions of those who, though only viewing the movement from an outsider's point, yet are deeply concerned—as who among us hearing the sacred name of "mother" can fail to be concerned—that the boys, whether our own or other people's, should have such organisations; instituted and carried forward on their behalf as shall be for their best and highest good, and that therefore the methods of proposed organisation should be carefully tested as to whether or not they are calculated to bring about those professedly worthy ends.

Now, in respect of the aims of the Boys' Brigade, as set forth by its founders and promoters, there can be among Christians no two opinions. From its opening clause, embodying the second petition of our Lord's Prayer, down to the last clause, enforcing the Apostolic injunction, "Quit you like men: be strong," each in turn commands unqualified approval.

Nor is it contended by those who oppose the movement, that those high aims are not kept well to the front in the practical working of the organisations; but, if I estimate rightly the adverse criticism, it would appear that all this goes for nothing, because alongside with efforts for "the advancement of Christ's Kingdom, and the promotion of habits of reverence, discipline, self-respect, and all that tends towards a true Christian manliness," there lurks the danger, which dwarfs to insignificance all other dangers that can beset our boys, the risk of their becoming soldier-like. What, then, are the traits of a soldier which the Boys' Brigade promoters consider it worth striving to produce, above and beyond healthy recreation and physical development?

Those we find to be such qualities as cleanliness, order, prompt obedience, self-discipline. Are we to say that these traits are not worth attaining, or that they are gained at too great a price, if their attainment is accomplished by the same means as those which produce like effects in a soldier? In these days of self-assertion are we to say that there is no benefit towards character-making in the fact that a good "drill" must sacrifice everything which makes for prominence, or in any way invites attention to himself? Or because there are certain lessons which are pre-eminently the heritage of the man who, to whatever rank he attains in his profession, never forgets that he is "a man under authority," must we discard them on our boys' behalf just because the same kind of discipline which has achieved these results is that which has produced a good soldier?

Truly I am only a woman, but from my woman's standpoint I would rather see my boys follow their father's example in suffering "wrong," even to absolute injustice, without "reasoning why," and reserving all ardour in respect of "rights" for the upholding of the rights of the oppressed around, for the bearing of "others' burdens," for persuading the indifferent not to despise the heavenly birthright, than see them uphold so-called "Peace Society" objects—as I have seen a member of that Society do by an unseemly exhibition of ill-temper, irreverence, pugnacity, and disregard for the feelings of others, of which I am not afraid to say, after experience in five continents, every Christian soldier of my acquaintance would be heartily ashamed.

To those of us who hold by the Bible teaching, that evil-doing, whether on a small or on a large scale, is to be suppressed and peace maintained by the terror of the sword (Rom. xiii. 3, 4); to those of us who long to promote arbitration among nations, and who recognise that the accomplishment of this end depends largely on the strength of the nations who put forward a demand for it, there appears a little incongruity in the fact that a Society which, if loyal to its tenets, would deliver our empire over to anarchy and lawlessness, or, say, to the despotism of Russia, without striking a blow for law and order, which is, if possible, less peaceable in its language and methods than its logical outcome, should be accepted as an oracle under the misnomer of the "Peace Society." While I say this, I should like heartily to disavow, in respect of the P.S., as you yourself do with regard to the B.B., any wish to call in question the spirit, aim, and honesty of its founders and supporters.

If, in common with yourself and many peace-loving people, I desire that war should be minimised—to which end, viz., as a preventive against war, I realise that in the present constitution of the world we must keep our soldiers (though like policemen, doctors, mariners, grave-diggers, they will find no exercise for their vocations in the glory-land)—still, I confess that I cannot go with you in saying, "We can understand Sunday Schools quietly training up generations of boys who should have a repugnance to war, and thus, by ultimately delivering nations from the love and practice of war, bringing in the Kingdom of God." It seems to me that the Kingdom of God must come, if it comes at all, into the hearts of our boys, in quite another way, viz., through the preaching and teaching of that Word which is declared to the B.B. members "every Sabbath day," accompanied by the power of that Holy Spirit whose presence is invoked even at their gatherings for drill.

—Yours faithfully, A MOTHER OF BOYS.

DEAR SIR,—The accompanying letter from The Standard I think supports the view (though not from a Peace standpoint) you have expressed of the warlike spirit engendered by "The Boys' Brigade" movement.—Yours faithfully, E. BRACHER.

BOYS WITH BAYONETS.

SIR,—Who is responsible for the issue to mere children of soldiers' bayonets? Here, in Dulwich, a movement has been started for what is called "The Boys' Brigade," and boys of ten and twelve are seen strutting about with belt and bayonet. They chiefly belong to the Board School, and are mostly of the lower order. These boys think nothing of throwing stones, in the heat of temper, at their fellows, and I have seen knives drawn. Is it wise? and I again ask who is responsible for the issue of deadly weapons to such children? Cadet corps, under proper control, are right, the rank and file being of the better class; but if there are to be "Boys' Brigades," give them dummy guns and bayonets.—I am, sir, your obedient servant. J. D.

THE GUILDFORD CONVENTION.

SIR,—In the opening remarks of your correspondent at the recent Guildford Convention, he makes some observations upon Mr. Paynter's want of self-effacement as chairman, and says that his views on this point are shared by many. Permit me the equal opportunity of expressing the view, also shared by many, that Mr. Paynter's chairmanship is one of the happiest features of this growing Convention. I have repeatedly heard one and another state their thankfulness for his few opening words; and I can confidently say, as one of the usual speakers, that we on the platform should feel ourselves the poorer were he not to introduce us as he does.

May I add that there was a general consensus of opinion, among those best qualified to judge, that this last Convention was probably the best attended, and certainly the most full of spiritual promise, of those yet held?—Very faithfully yours, A. E. BARNES-LAWRENCE.

Blackheath, S.E.

PARIAHS IN MADRAS.

SOME weeks ago we gave a letter from Dr. McLaurin, a Bangalore missionary, dwelling on the distressed and downtrodden state of the Pariahs in the Madras Presidency. He stated that Rev. T. B. Pandian, an Indian pastor, was about to visit this country to set forth the claims of these people and try to secure some amelioration of their social condition. Mr. Pandian is now in England, and would be glad of opportunities of telling his story to Christian audiences. His objects will be gathered from the following extracts of a little work he has written, "Slaves of the Soil in Southern India":—

"Pariahs form no inconsiderable portion of the population of this Presidency. These are employed in various ways—as tillers of the soil; as watchmen of the Hindu cremation ground; as drudges and menials in Hindu high caste families; as cooks and butlers in European households; as sappers and miners, etc.—and well deserved encouragement. These are at present practically slaves. Their grievances are manifold, the most crying ones being intellectual darkness and practical incapacity to own land. If the Pariahs are to be emancipated as they well deserve to be, they must be educated.

"There must be industrial schools established for the Pariahs—one or more in each district, and in them the ordinary trades of the country must be taught, care being taken not to teach decaying trades or trades which in the nature of things must soon cease. A number of practically free schools should be established, and in them the rudiments of vernacular education should be taught. In certain centres model or normal schools should be established for training Pariah teachers, inspectors, etc.

"Government should make up its mind to a persistent and continued effort, and should not allow partial failure at first to damp its ardour. Government should call in largely the counsel and aid of missionaries and other philanthropists to assist in inaugurating and carrying on the scheme."

Mr. Pandian may be addressed, care of Dyer Brothers, Rose-street, Paternoster-square, E.C.

LOSS OF H.M.S. VICTORIA.

DEAR SIR,—The loss of this fine battleship, with nearly 400 officers and men, has come upon the country like a "bolt out of a clear sky," and is the greatest naval calamity that has happened since the loss of H.M.S. Captain. The agony and distress of the wives and mothers round us here in Portsmouth is most distressing—widows left with little children clinging around them and the bread-winner gone. In a very short time their cupboards will be bare. I have organised workers to meet the distress, and am in communication with the Admiralty as to names and addresses, while the sorrow-stricken women are crowding around us, living as we do in their midst. I am drawing heavily upon my own funds, and have already received letters from friends in the country offering help. I shall need help for present needs, while the Patriotic Fund will, I hope, provide for the future, and as in the case of the loss of H.M.S. Serpent, I shall be very glad to receive and to utilise for direct help any sums sent to me, not one farthing of which will be spent on working expenses, but all worked out for the help of widows and mothers connected with H.M.S. Victoria.

Cheques and postal orders may be sent to me at the Royal Sailors' Rest, Portsmouth, or paid to the account of the Royal Sailors' Rest, National Provincial Bank of England, Devonport.—Yours truly,

AGNES E. WESTON.

Royal Sailors' Rest, Devonport, June 26.

MOUNT HERMON GIRLS' ORPHAN HOMES.—In the twenty-ninth annual report Mrs. Parry says:—"The Lord has not suffered our children to lack a meal, although we have been greatly straitened at times for funds, and I regret to have to close the year's account with a deficit. The children have been kept in health, excepting a few cases of measles in the spring of last year. We have received thirteen new cases, and fourteen left the Homes during the year. One has gone to Australia, and two to Canada; the others to situations in this country. All, as far as I know, are doing well." Communications regarding this interesting work should be addressed to Mrs. Parry, 55, Cambridge-avenue, Kilburn, N.W.

THE Y.M.C.A.

Last month the Exeter Hall Tract Union distributed 17,344 tracts.

A new Association has recently been formed at Grange-over-Sands, and another is in course of formation at Preston.

The Hobart Y.M.C.A. annual meeting proved most encouraging; the work is reported as steadily increasing and full of power.

The general commercial depression has affected considerably most of the Antipodean associations; the work goes on but the funds run short.

The Winnipeg Mission Committee hold services every Sunday morning at the Government Immigration Hall among the newly arrived immigrants.

In Adelaide over 110,000 attendances are reported for last year. The theatre service, open-air meetings, rescue work, and other agencies have been greatly blessed.

The Auckland (N.Z.) Association reports 164 full members with much earnest and useful effort. The annual meeting was the best in tone and spirit held for some years.

The Lydd Y.M.C.A. had last Sunday two addresses from Lieut. Tapp, R.A. There were good attendances, particularly in the evening, when the room was well filled. A service for soldiers only was also held in the Garrison Theatre, Lydd, conducted by Lieut. Tapp and Lieut. Mackenzie, R.A.

The new premises of the Tottenham Association, Bruce Grove, were formally opened by Mr. Joseph Howard, M.P. for Tottenham, on Wednesday week. A thoroughly representative gathering was presided over by Mr. John Cloudesley, the president, and various speakers took part in the proceedings.

A new departure in the Friday evening meeting of the Dublin Association last winter was a monthly "Members'" meeting, when original papers, selections, poems, recitations, and singing were given by members. Taking part in this meeting was a distinct profession of being a follower of Christ, every item being sacred, full of interest and practical help.

A very successful garden party was held on the 21st inst. in connection with the Trowbridge Y.M.C.A., in the beautiful grounds of Hill View, the residence of the president of the Association, Mr. J. P. Haden. The Association is making very satisfactory progress, and the workers are very much encouraged by the past year's results, both spiritual and otherwise.

The "Y.M.C.A. Secretaries' Week," just held at Matlock, was attended by forty-five secretaries, including Mr. Henry Whitwell (Birmingham), Mr. W. H. Newett (Manchester), Mr. W. Oatts (Glasgow), Mr. T. Jameson (Liverpool), Messrs. Hind Smith and Burn (London), and Mr. Mills, of the National Council. Discussions of a useful character occupied the mornings of each day, affording practical and valuable training for the several newly-appointed officers who were present. On Sunday several of the secretaries occupied pulpits in the churches of Matlock and neighbourhood.

A few months ago it was ascertained that the Holden estate on West Monroe-street, Chicago, could be secured for 45,000dols., and remodelled and refitted for 5,000dols. more. Immediately the officials of the West Side Y.M.C.A. set themselves about raising the necessary funds to get possession of this property. One friend offered one-third the whole amount if the other two-thirds would be raised. This generous offer had the desired effect, and the building has been opened with a public reception. The mansion was thronged by over a thousand visitors. Mr. Moody made one of the addresses. The building is very complete.

THE Y.W.C.A.

Mr. J. Combie has made a gift of a library of about a thousand volumes to the Y.W.C.A. of Sydney.

A friend informs us that the Auckland Y.W.C.A. "are doing a noble work among the young women of the city."

At the annual meeting of the Melbourne Y.W.C.A., Mrs. J. G. Paton was elected president for the year. The work of the association goes on vigorously.

The members of the Sydney Association entirely support a China Inland Missionary, who went out from one of the branches. Two others have also offered, or gone to foreign lands.

The Dundee Y.W.C.A. report, full members, 572; associates, 79; juniors, 63. Of these one has gone to be trained as a medical nurse, and two have sailed for New York, having been accepted for the foreign mission field.

In connection with the work of the Park Mission, a Lodge will be opened at 13, Duke-street (Duke-street Mission Hall), Manchester Square, W., on Monday, July 3 at 4.30. An address will be given by Rev. E. W. Moore, of Wimbledon. Old clothes, especially boots and dresses, also letters for convalescent homes and hospitals, are much needed. Address, Miss Hay Chapman, 16A, Old Cavendish-street, Hon. Superintendent of the Mission.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

The first Chinese Christian Endeavour Society to be established east of California has recently been formed in Chicago.

The growth of the Christian Endeavour movement in Birmingham has been very considerable during the past twelve months, so much so as to call into existence a union, known as the Birmingham and District Christian Endeavour Union.

At the recently held General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church of North America, it was reported that there are 664 young people's societies in the denomination, which have 28,092 members. These contributed 30,000dols. last year to the general work of the denomination.

The Association Hall, Liverpool, was filled on Friday week, to welcome Dr. Clark, and to wish him "God speed" on his voyage home. Mr. James Barnes, vice-chairman of the Liverpool Sunday School Union, presided, and gave an address on the energy displayed in these days both in secular and religious work. Addresses of welcome were given by Revs. Stanley Rogers, John Thomas, and Henry Gardner. Dr. Clark gave an interesting sketch of his tour round the world, and Mrs. Clark won her way to the hearts of her hearers by a capital little speech on "Junior Endeavourers."

SCOTTISH NOTES.

Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, of Aberdeen, has received a cordial call to the pastorate of St. James's Presbyterian Church, Toronto, of which Dr. Kellogg was lately the pastor.

On retiring from the office of Principal of the Congregational Theological Hall, Edinburgh, to fill the same office in the Yorkshire College, Dr. Simon, at a farewell meeting, received hearty thanks for his professorial work of the last ten years.

Mr. John Martin, draper, Bridge of Allan, after addressing the morning meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association on Sunday week, took suddenly ill; he was conveyed home, but died in the evening from a blood-vessel bursting in the brain. Deceased was an enthusiastic evangelistic worker, took a great interest in children, was an elder in the Free Church, and a school superintendent.

IRISH NOTES.

Gospel services, including three open-air services and a Saturday-evening service for children, have been held at Magherafelt by Rev. H. Ball, Methodist Conference evangelist.

Rev. Dr. Hall, of New York, has arrived in this country on his annual two months' tour. He intends taking part in the International Sunday School Conference in London before returning to America.

The annual Methodist Conference has been in session in Cork during this and the past week, under the presidency of Rev. Dr. Rigg. Ten young men were set apart for the full work of the ministry; nine ministers died during the year. The membership showed an increase of 431, and the reports from the various parts of the country indicated that the opportunities for preaching the Gospel in the open-air and to Roman Catholics were never before so encouraging.

CHELSEA PREVENTIVE AND RESCUE HOMES.—The seventh annual report of these Homes, which are affiliated to the Fulham Cross Christian Mission, states; "The past year has been one of continued anxiety. Providence has superintended the efforts in a most striking manner. Many lonely and tempted lasses in this teeming Metropolis have been encouraged in the paths of virtue, despite their sad environments. Many servants out of situations have found here a Christian home at such critical periods of their lives. Many unsuspecting and amiable young girls and women, whose first mistake has been secured by vicious and unprincipled men, have been taken into these Homes and tenderly ministered to. No two cases are exactly alike. Each needs special assistance and wise discrimination. The Lord has greatly blessed all endeavours spiritually." Communications regarding the work should be addressed to the hon. secretary, at the office, 168, King's-road, Chelsea, S.W.

IN MEMORY OF JOHN HUSS.

In a recent circular, Revs. A. W. Clark and J. S. Porter, well-known workers in Bohemia, say:—"John Huss was born in Husinec, a small city of Bohemia about 200 miles south of Prague. He was educated as a Romanist; but, influenced by the writings of our Wyclif, he turned from the traditions of the Roman Catholic Church to a study and proclamation of the Gospel. He became a martyr for the truth, but God's instrument for sowing the seed whereby Bohemia and Moravia 'lived unto God.' Of the 3,000,000 Protestants in Bohemia by far the greater part suffered banishment or death; and Bohemia passed from the sunlight of the Gospel into spiritual darkness such as broods over Spain and Mexico. No Protestant church is within miles of the childhood home of the great reformer. More than this, it is a natural centre for work in the many adjacent cities and villages. A young man of experience and zeal is longing to begin the work.

"A national society owns and will preserve the house where Huss was born, but the Huss garden and barn adjoining has been secured by the Free Reformed Church. The legally organised society, 'Bethany,' will hold the title to this historic property. The work of changing the substantial old barn into a chapel with dwelling for the preacher has already begun. Ultramontane influence to the contrary, the name of Huss is among those of Bohemian worthies in the new national museum. A monument is soon to be erected to his memory in the heart of old Prague. Such praiseworthy patriotism, however, will not help us with the work in hand. Men and women who love the God of Huss must be looked to for such aid. To put the barn and garden in proper condition will cost at least £340. Towards this sum we already have £100. May we not receive your aid, little or much, towards establishing a fountain from whence shall flow forth the 'living water,' in the birthplace of that great Christian hero who belongs not to Bohemia alone, but to the whole world?"

Communications to the pastors named may be addressed: Prague, Smichov, Bohemia.

LANSDOWNE PLACE MISSION.

For many years this Ragged School Mission has done a noble work among the poor children in a labyrinth of courts behind Tabard-street, Borough. About thirty years ago Earl Shaftesbury presided at the opening of a new Mission-hall; but at length this became dilapidated as well as too strait for the work. The earnest workers are not, however, to be daunted. Backed by the testimony borne by the late C. H. Spurgeon that "It is a grand work which this gallant band is doing, and it should not cease or be slackened," they set resolutely to the task of collecting and giving (for they give liberally as well as serve faithfully), and in one way or another have raised £500, with which they have renovated and enlarged the place, adding an infant gallery and various much-needed class-rooms, etc. Their rule is never to go into debt; hence they have completed the operations so far as means go, and this renovated building was formally re-opened on Monday afternoon. Really it was open on Sunday, when delightful meetings were held, and many of the young people bore testimony to what God had done for them in the Mission.

At Monday's meeting Mr. John Wilson presided, and as a worker from the earliest days, gave a brief résumé of past history and pioneer experiences in connection with this Ragged School.

Mr. F. Fisher, the superintendent, described the alterations which had been made, rejoiced in the increased accommodation afforded, and urged the economy of the Mission (the annual expenditure being only some £145), told something of the cheering results attained in new and changed lives, and concluded by emphasising the present need of £200 in order to complete fully the fitting, furnishing, and adaptation of the place. We may observe that the report shows an amount of good work done altogether out of proportion to the smallness of the income.

Mr. T. A. Denny followed, declaring the building reopened, and adding hearty and sympathetic words on the value and efficiency of the operations.

Rev. F. B. Meyer addressed the workers in earnest and spiritual tones, directing them to the secret of true power and exhorting them to close fellowship and a deep sense of the presence of God in this work to which He had called them and in which He had blessed them.

Mr. John Kirk spoke brightly and cheerily, congratulating the friends on the improved aspect of the place, and exhorting to renewed and vigorous effort to win the children for Christ.

The proceedings concluded with a strong plea for the immediate raising of the £200 still wanting. The treasurer is Mr. J. Passmore, jun., 4, Paternoster-buildings, E.C.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Pastor Bodelschwingh, Founder and Director of the Homes for Epileptics, Westphalia, Germany.

To-day is a day of happy human augury for the stability of the throne of the British Empire. If the Prince and Princess who to-day will be wedded, are spared to see length of days, they will naturally have to fill the highest places in the realm. All their past leads us to hope and believe that they will fill these positions worthily and in the fear of God. We join the vast circle of British men and women who wish them all earthly happiness, and a full meed of wisdom and grace for the due discharge of great responsibility.

In pursuance of the resolution passed by the Armenian Christians' Defence Committee, a public meeting has been convened at Exeter Hall for Monday evening next, at 7.30 p.m., to protest against the continued incarceration and threatened execution of innocent men. The matter is pressing, and the time is short in which to arouse interest and secure attendance at the meeting. We would, therefore, ask our London readers to make all possible efforts in this direction. A strong expression of protest by a large assemblage would help our Government in taking official action.

One of the most hopeful movements of the time, in connection with the young, is the school scheme of the Band of Hope Union. Able lecturers are engaged to visit the elementary schools of the country, and present the scientific side of the temperance question to the children. During the fourth year of the work, just ended, nearly 3000 schools and institutions were visited. There are now 2,664,000 young people in England associated with Bands of Hope.

The development of Ragged Schools still continues. What was impossible in the past, owing to ignorance and irregularity, is now looked upon but as a stepping-stone to yet better things. This remark is called forth by the recent prize distribution, when eleven children from the Field Lane Bible Schools received prizes and certificates in connection with the Sunday School Union Examinations on Nehemiah.

There is no need to follow in detail the lines of advocacy of the Boys' Brigades adopted by several of our correspondents. We simply wish to say, as followers of the Prince of Peace, that all who do follow Him should do their utmost to discourage the military spirit. Europe is oppressed with armaments, the people are taxed to the point of beggary to pay for them: men are unfitted, by their early military training, for work as civilians; their powers are warped and weakened; their prospects are spoiled. Financiers, like Sir John Lubbock, warn us that there is social trouble in such a state of things. Yet in public schools, in some private schools, and now in Sunday schools, we are giving our boys a military training; besides which, in some large centres like Birmingham and Manchester, working boys are enrolled in cadet battalions; and lastly we have the drill of the telegraph messengers. Soldiers say that all this does tend to foster a military spirit, and on that account they welcome it. We desire, on the contrary, that our country should lead the nations into a better way.

"When a man's ways please the Lord He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with Him." As with individuals so with nations. If England's ways please God He will be a better defence than the strongest army and navy; He will, by his good Spirit turn the hearts of our enemies to us. In other words, by the cultivation and manifestation of the spirit of justice and mercy, we shall avoid occasions of dispute and the making of enemies, and shall make friends instead. Here lies the true Christian policy which it should be the persistent aim of believers to uphold and press upon their country. All reasoning which leaves God out of the great question of peace omits the point on which all turns.

As for keeping our older boys at the very time when they are so apt to forsake the Sunday-school and public worship, why should it be concluded that only by military drill can they be taught order, obedience, and promptitude, and be retained under good influences? We have seen sixty youths and men busy in a parish room two nights a week learning to work in metal, to carve wood, and to make furniture. They earned from eight to ten pounds a year each, a considerable help to a working boy or man. This was a temperance society, a thrift society, and a technical education class, all in one, besides being a link with Christian workers. In a Surrey village we have seen a beautiful wood carving of a head, done by a man who was a farm labourer and a scholar in a similar class. The exhibitions of useful articles made at Band of Hope meetings show that the musket has a rival. Boys and youths may be held quite as easily by means that are unexceptionable as by those which are associated with a state of things which our Saviour came to supersede.

It is right that we should correct any misapprehension which may arise in our readers' minds in consequence of the letter from The Standard, which appeared in our last issue, stating that boys belonging to a "Boys' Brigade" at Dulwich were entrusted with bayonets. The secretary of the Brigade movement writing from Glasgow to The Standard, says that no bayonets of any kind are used in any of the 600 companies which compose the brigade in the United Kingdom.

What a curious feature of the life of free nations is the appointment of one body of men to watch another and see that they do their duty! The ratepayers choose guardians and vestrymen; and then, in many places, appoint a Ratepayers' Association to protect themselves from excessive rates! We pass laws, and pay for a police force to see that those who break the laws are duly charged and tried; and then we constitute costly voluntary associations like the Children's Protection Society to make the law effectual. Is this because we expect our public servants to do too much, rather than because we suspect them of being unfaithful? "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance." Nations can be free only so long as they rigorously watch and guard their own affairs.

The law for the protection of children from cruel treatment, even when inflicted by their own parents, has exposed parents to a danger. Evil-disposed servants may injure the children and then fabricate a charge against the parents. Such a case has just happened near Chester, but the mother happily sustained her innocence. Still, it is only a poor compensation to come out from the dock with no more than the jury's verdict, "Not Guilty." In these, as in all cases which are sub judice, we shall do wisely to wait until all the evidence is heard. An additional motive, self-protection, is supplied to the heads of houses to engage only reputable servants.

"The difficulty is to get them." It is difficult. Yet there are as good servants as ever. We know many servants who have been with the same family for a very long term of years: for the last twenty years the door of a friend's house has been opened to us by the same maid, and she was "a bit of the house" when we first knew it. In another house, one of the servants has been there at least thirty years. And the love and devotion of these domestic friends is worthy of any gallery of heroines. One nursed her mistress through a dismal period of lunacy, though her master became too poor to pay her any wage. It took almost all her active life to render this service to God, but she did it without a murmur.

Something of our modern difficulty in obtaining servants, is no doubt owing to the fact that society generally is passing through a radical change, from a feudal to a democratic form. The old supremacy of the well-to-do classes was based largely on the sense of inferiority of the dependent classes; whereas now the sense of inferiority is gone, or fast going, and by combination the sense of dependence is going with it. We cannot mourn over the change. Men are men, whatever their occupation. Those who have been waited on, find, when necessity comes, that they can wait on themselves, and that they are the better for doing it. Our wisest plan is to adapt ourselves to new conditions, rather than sigh for the old which can never return. Servants, and most excellent ones, are, however, still within reach of ordinary English homes.

We have received the following from "J. K. W., of the Nelsonian school":—

Surely the awful and truly sad wreck of the Victoria must have brought to you the conversation you and I had in passing lately through the great bulky, lumbering, overclad ironclads in Portsmouth and Southsea waters. Many and many a time have I spoken to other and very leading men on this same all-important subject, and just before the sad loss of the Captain, I told one of the leading admirals of our day, then my Compr. General of Coastguard, that such things would occur, and that these monster vessels were neither seaworthy, manageable, nor to be trusted in fine or foul weather. Only fancy if such things and fearful wrecks take place when in fine fair weather and general exercise, what is likely to occur in war times, with an enemy and gales of wind to battle with. My blood, as an old lifeboat man and naval assessor of the Court of Admiralty, runs cold when I think of the frightful loss of life and property that has already taken place since these sea-drowning leviathan monsters have been introduced into our naval service. In the mercantile marine, if such things were introduced with such sad results, the business men and the public would condemn them, and give them up long since. Surely Christian people ought to speak out in defence of our noble sailors being sent to sea in such coffins—sudden deaths to hundreds, and in many cases, it is to be feared, not fit or prepared for eternal glory.

Much stronger words are used in another letter as to unsailorlike management, and the martyred seamen.

The Rev. Dr. John Brown, the biographer of Bunyan and his successor in the pastorate of Bunyan Meeting, Bedford, has done well to speak to students for the ministry, on "Bunyan as a Model for Christian Preachers." The great dreamer was more than a writer of matchless allegory: he was a man of action; a loving, patient, painstaking pastor; a mighty preacher and evangelist. Dr. Brown well described him as one of the most "living" preachers England had ever known.

He was no piler-up of rhetoric, but a man deeply versed in the lore of human souls, and heaven-taught in the great and wonderful art of getting hold of men. He had given his ideal of the Christian minister in "Evangelist," Watchful," and "Great-heart." His was a remarkable simplicity and directness of expression; he was indeed a master of grand and noble Saxon speech. Lithographed sermons at so much a dozen were not in his way. Bunyan preached what he saw and felt, and he not only told the truth but made the truth to tell. Such a ministry would be effective in the nineteenth century just as it was effective in the seventeenth century. The man who said nothing but the things he thought he was expected to say would be effective in no century. Bunyan knew how to present the truth of God so that all classes understood. The danger that beset scholarly men was that of becoming merely academic in their preaching.

One of the chief sources of weakness in the Church of Christ to-day is lack of what is called "the communion of saints." Weak believers often fall and make shipwreck of faith for want of the strength and help such communion is designed to afford. Many a weary toiler in the vineyard of the Lord is overborne with a sense of isolation and helplessness which Christian brotherhood would remove. Many a good work languishes which would flourish and bring forth fruit, if only united faith and prayer were concentrated upon it. These are not days for true servants of God to stand off from one another. Everything calls for unity on the part of those to whom the name and cause of Christ are dear. Co-operation and concentration abound in secular spheres; surely more of both should be seen in the Church of God.

Can it be of God that those who are through grace "one in Christ Jesus" should be separated by barriers which prevent their approaching each other on equal terms as brethren and sisters in the Lord? Can any system or creed be of Him which tends to alienate true believers, or to range them in rival camps? Can it be the Spirit of Christ which refuses to acknowledge one because he is not of our communion, or another because he is not in everything conformed to our type? These are questions which call for earnest and prayerful consideration.

Mildmay Memories.

Our recollections of Barnet and Mildmay cover a space of more than thirty years. During all that time we have found both pleasure and profit in our presence at these annual gatherings. In the speeches from the platform, very rarely has there been a single jarring note to awaken suspicion or distrust. By a singular combination of prudence and practicalness, the great themes on which all Evangelical Christians are in entire agreement have been alone in the foreground. Determining to know nothing save "Jesus Christ and Him crucified," denominational distinctions have, for the time, been forgotten, and Christians of many communions have assembled in one place with one accord.

Meanwhile other Conferences have arisen and multiplied. The advantage of special assemblies for the consideration of special departments of Christian life and work need not here be discussed. Yet, despite them all, Mildmay occupies the first place, and in a real sense remains œcumenical. From year to year the audience is no less inspiriting than the speakers. We do not envy the man who can stand unmoved and nerveless before the thousands of intelligent believers who assemble daily in the great hall. Among the mighty dead memory vividly recalls to us the stirring and suggestive addresses of the brothers Bonar, and Mackay of Hull. How thorough was their subjection to Scripture, and how fresh and forcible their utterances! In the present age of doubt, we had almost said of despair, we can only fervently pray that the same tone of calm, confident reliance on the Divine Word may continue to characterise every speech spoken from the Mildmay platform.

The Conference held last week has certainly not been unworthy of any that have preceded. The subject was second to none in importance, and each speaker fairly rose to the occasion. The first address, by Rev. Dr. Pierson, was equally voluminous, compact, and clear. It was a marvellous and masterly survey of the whole field on which the student of prophecy is invited to enter. Good to hear, it will be even more instructive and helpful to peruse and ponder it in the printed pages of the official report.

Most impressive and promising was the address delivered by Mr. Train, on the second morning of the conference. Intensely Scriptural and spiritual, it was no less practical and powerful. His recent settlement in Upper Norwood must be reckoned a great gain to the metropolis.

No one could fail to be carried away by the fervour and unction of Mr. Webb-Peploe's stirring appeal on the last morning. His words are still ringing in our ears. His direct earnestness must surely have touched every heart.

The evening addresses were also of real practical import and worth. Mr. Macartney's vivid and fervid application of the Canticles to the topic in hand, was a genuine piece of fresh exposition of a difficult theme. Dr. Bullinger was eminently suggestive and clear on his special subject of the believer's coming transformation; and Mr. Wilkinson well filled his rôle of an advocate for the Jew. Dr. Guinness's brief closing words were timely and weighty.

While it cannot be said that much added light was thrown on advent truth, the main features of the subject were reverently and thoughtfully handled, and there was a happy absence of needless theorising, in the matter of details or disputed points.

The Opium Debate.

On Friday night last, by a majority of seventy-nine, the House of Commons rejected the proposals of the Anti-Opium leaders, and accepted Mr. Gladstone's amendment. As both parties prayed for a Royal Commission, it is important to understand the position and aim of each. Briefly stated, the Anti-Opium party insisted on the claim that the traffic should be regarded as morally indefensible, and that a Royal Commission be appointed to make the necessary inquiries, with a view to devising how the financial difficulties should best be met. The Government, on the other hand, while admitting an evil, declined to accept the standpoint of moral indefensibility, and prayed for a Commission which should not only examine into the moral aspects of the traffic, but which should also take all the financial questions, and especially those which relate to the native States, into full consideration.

The first thought in the minds of the many who have cried to God for the abolition of this unholy traffic must naturally be: Is this Royal Commission in any measure the answer to these prayers? We believe that in one important aspect it will be found to be so. It was, and is, essential to any right solution of the questions involved that Government itself should take them up. We do not pretend to say what results may be contemplated by the Government itself: still less that it looks forward with any eagerness to the thorough treatment by abolition which is desired; but it is an enormous step in advance to have got the Government to move. It will be the fault of the Church if the Government is permitted to drop the question before a final settlement is effected.

But there are other factors in the settlement of this question besides that of Government. On the very morning after the debate in the House of Commons the telegrams from China conveyed tidings which those who have been praying on the subject cannot but regard as deeply significant, and which may make the task of the Commission a much easier one than was contemplated. The many provisions of Mr. Gladstone's Commission are founded undoubtedly on the idea that the revenue in question is an enormous one. But what if the revenue is about rapidly to dwindle? The telegrams told us on Saturday morning that business in Shanghai and Hong Kong is paralysed, as a result of the Indian currency changes. "These have had a ruinous effect upon the import trade, especially upon opium." We thank God heartily for it. He has effective ways of dealing with this wickedness, as well as by Royal Commissions.

There cannot be two opinions among us that the action of Mr. Webb and of Sir Joseph Pease, in insisting on a recognition of the immorality of the traffic as the starting point of any Royal Commission, was absolutely necessary. Throughout the country the Christian men and women who have identified themselves with the anti-opium movement, will thank God that in the face of the Government and its curiously mingled crowd of supporters on the subject, our leaders stood firm to their claim, and determined to divide the House. They will also thank God that no fewer than 105 members of the House opposed Mr. Gladstone in such circumstances. Truly the anti-opium movement has made rapid strides in these last few years.

In the speech of Mr. Gladstone, and also that of his chief supporter, Mr. Curzon, it is painful to note the deliberate way in which our pre sent opium relations with China are put before the House as being in thorough conformity with national righteousness. Mr. Gladstone's words are: "We had now ceased to force the trade, and the opium now exported to China was left to be freely received if that country so chose. We now, therefore, were doing nothing in respect to any foreign State except that which the freewill of that country admits and desires." And Mr. Curzon's: "By the treaty of 1886 it was possible for the Chinese Government, upon giving twelve months' notice, to repudiate the treaty, or to put a tax on the article, or even, like Japan, to prohibit its introduction altogether." Both of these statements are so incorrect, and proceeding from such men are so entirely misleading, that for the sake of the public we insert verbatim the text of the treaty of 1886 bearing on this point:—"The arrangement respecting opium contained in the present additional article shall remain binding for four years, after the expiration of which period either Government may at any time give twelve months' notice of its desire to terminate it, and such notice being given it shall terminate accordingly. In the event of the termination of the present additional article, the arrangement with regard to opium now in force under the regulations attached to the Treaty of Tien-tsin shall revive."

China is free, undoubtedly, to put her neck once more in the halter of the Treaty of Tien-tsin—the Treaty which she signed at the close of the second opium war, one stipulation of which was that in a revision of the tariff, the tariff on opium should not be revised, and which stipulation China endeavoured, but endeavoured in vain, to overturn in 1869. She is free to go back to the Treaty which gave room to no end of local smuggling, and to put herself in a much worse position than she is in at present. And this is what an Englishman who has occupied the post of Under-Secretary for India calls freedom! China is free, he dares to say, "like Japan, to prohibit its introduction (Indian opium) altogether." And this singularly inaccurate young statesman proceeds, with all the air of wounded honour, to inveigh against what he calls the "false" statements to be found in Anti-opium Literature. It will not do, however, to be too hard on a pleader who actually quoted as his chief authority on the harmlessness of opium, the opinion of a surgeon whom he had met at Hong Kong, and who has confessed to having been for years an opium sot.

There is, we venture to say, no more significant indication of China's want of freedom than this very Treaty of Chefoo, of which Mr. Curzon makes so much. In 1877 she claimed, for the many concessions which she then made to us, a double right: (1) to check the smuggling of Indian opium by having it put in bond till a purchaser was found and the local taxation paid; and (2) to put upon Indian opium what local taxation she chose. These were fair demands, which could not by any possibility have been refused to France or Spain. But did China get them? No; and why not? Because our Indian Government alleged that such freedom would enable China to put down the Indian opium trade, and China did not conceal that she wanted to have that power.

China continuing to demand something in return for her many concessions, she was told in 1881 that though this unlimited power of local taxation could not be permitted, a way of agreement might be found if she would fix the amount of local taxation at some rate which would hold for the whole of China, and would consent as a further gift to England to allow Indian opium thereafter to pass through all China without further tax. Agreed, said China, and she fixed the amount of local taxation at 120 taels per chest. Did she get it? No; and why not? Because again India said that such taxation would make Indian opium unsaleable to all but the very wealthy in China; and the Chinese statesmen frankly admitted that such was their desire.

Another Conference was held in the same year, and the Chinese reduced their demands to eighty taels per chest, with the intimation that this was final, and that they would have this or nothing. But did they get it? Yes, but only after another FOUR years of struggling over it, till our English statesmen felt that they must either yield or be put in an extremely false position.

But will any honest man call this giving China full freedom? To give her her lowest claim, and that after nine years' haggling, and to tell her that if she dares to venture one step beyond this agreement she will go back to the old Treaty of Tien-tsin—this is not what Englishmen call freedom, but a slave's chain.

It is plain, however, that the opium question cannot now pass from public view till it is settled. And there is only one settlement. The relation of our country to this evil traffic must come to an end. The result may be delayed, but, if the Christianity of England has any vitality, the end is sure. Public opinion, perhaps, may be found to ripen even faster than the Royal Commissioners' Report. The agitation of the subject throughout the country will go on, and prayer will not cease till the unholy traffic is destroyed.

The Fever-stricken Missionary.

THE loss of missionary life on the Congo has been saddening in the extreme; so was the death of Ridley and Latimer, and all the martyrs. But it was also sublime. From the death of the first Christian martyr, the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, to the last missionary who yielded up his spirit into the Father's hands, the Kingdom of God has owed more to suffering than to doing. Darkest Africa may not understand the stammering words of the Gospel pioneer, but human nature understands the love which lays down life on its behalf. Many a victory has been gained by hosts advancing over the dead bodies of the foremost ranks; and God's spiritual victories in the heathen world have generally been similarly won. "The blood of the martyr witnesses is the seed of the Church," whether they fall by fever or by fire.

It has been said that these fever-martyrs need not have died; that if they had had faith to claim Jesus as their life, these valuable men, the product of so much prayer and study and labour, would have been saved alive; that there must be something radically wrong, something essentially deficient, where so many precious lives are carried off by fever; and the conclusion drawn is that the special faith in Christ as our life is lacking: "For if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

But if this passage be interpreted to mean that the indwelling Spirit of Christ would have protected the bodies of these men from fever, or when fever-stricken would have preserved them from death, it must mean much more. It would operate at home, as well as on the Congo, and would preserve us, if we exercised the necessary faith, from death from any other cause, including the lapse of years. Why should we die at all?

We venture to think that this view, which seems so spiritual yet is devoid of Scriptural corroboration, and which implies a charge, however unexpressed, of want of intelligence, and want of faith, in those who die, arises from a misconception of the means by which the Kingdom of God advances. It is one of its laws that he that loves his life shall lose it; and he that loses his life for the King's sake shall find it. Paul counted not his life dear unto him. They who overcame the accuser because of the blood of the Lamb and because of the word of their testimony, loved not their lives even unto death. The blood of Abel has not ceased to cry from the ground against the wicked one at whose instigation he was slain by Cain. Stephen's face still shines like the face of an angel in the hearts of men, and reflects the glory of God on the rulers of the darkness of this world. His prayer, like that of his Lord upon the cross, still lives and testifies to the grace of Him that sitteth on the throne. Jesus still encourages his witnesses to be faithful unto death; still acknowledges those who held fast his name and faith when Antipas, his faithful martyr-witness, was slain in Satan's dwelling-place. The faith and faithfulness of the Christians of the Catacombs is fragrant and operative and influential to this day.

In the Epistles to the churches it is seen that the real adversary is Satan. The synagogue of Satan, Satan's seat, where Satan dwelleth, the depths of Satan, are all unmasked, and the Kingdom advances as he is overthrown.

His princedom is of this world; Christ's Kingdom is not of this world. That Kingdom is of the heavens, and is entered through death, and God was manifested in flesh that through death He might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is the devil. Therefore precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints before as well as since the mighty death of Him who said, "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction."

It may be that the want of knowledge and experience has caused the death of many missionary saints; but even so, the sons of Africa will not forget that one after another left home, and friends, and all that to the world makes life worth living, and yielded up his life in bearing the light into the dark places of the earth, and telling the love of God in the habitations of cruelty.

The essence of the Gospel of God is that "He loved me, and gave Himself for me." And this is written on the heart of Africa as the epitaph of every one who there has followed Jesus unto death.

It may prove true of the fever-sticken missionary, as of Samson and of his greater Antitype, that he wrought more in his death than in his life. "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."

PHILANTHROPIC AGENCIES are largely directed to the filtering and purifying of grown-up lives soiled with sinful living; but lives young, and fresh, and beautiful—how few think of nurturing these that they may be spared cruel contamination with evil.—Mrs. G. S. Reaney.

The Key-Notes of Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

CREATED IN HIM.

Create is one of the great words of the Bible. It is its peculiar possession. Other religious books have their cosmogonies, and attempt to explain how all things came to be. The process of production is traced as far back as possible, but they dare not speak this wonderful word. It is left to the Bible to inscribe the name of God on all things visible and invisible, and append to it the word create. "In the beginning God . . . " "In the beginning God created."

Eph. ii. 10. (1) It is, however, not with the material but with the spiritual creation that we have to deal.—When we first knelt at the Cross of the Lord Jesus, we were made new creatures. "If any man is in Christ, there is a new creation; the old things are passed away, behold they are become new." (2 Cor. v. 16, R.V. Marg.)

But there was an older creation than that. If we read aright the Apostle's thought, he takes us back, beyond the limits of our mortal life, to the eternal past, and reveals to us the workings of God's thought before even the earth or the world was made. We were created in Christ Jesus, in the purpose and intention of God, before an angel sped through the newly-created ether or a seraph raised his first sonnet of adoration. Our creation at the Cross was the realisation in our experience of an eternal thought of God.

Let us ponder deeply the Divine purpose in thus creating us in Christ. It was unto good works. The apostle was eager to put these in their legitimate and proper place. There was apparently a tendency among the converts whom he addressed to associate their salvation with their works, or, at the least, to get credit for their faith. He therefore reaffirms our entire indebtedness to grace, and says that even our faith is not of ourselves; it is the gift of God, "not of works, that no man should boast." We are not to work up to the new life, but from it. The good works we do before regeneration are not even reckoned to our account. The apostle calls them dead works. They are the automatic convulsive movements of a corpse. The only works that please God, and are accepted through the mediation of Christ, are those which emanate from that new life which He imparts in regeneration by the Holy Ghost. We are created unto good works. "He gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a people for his own possession, zealous of good works." Cain's gift of fruit may be both fair and fragrant, but it is rejected because it is an attempt to purchase God's favour, instead of being the outcome and flower of his faith.

It is very blessed to know that our good works have been prepared for us to walk in. Walking implies a path, whether through the cornfield or over the stretch of moorland, or beside the sea; and we may think, therefore, of our life-course as a path which starts from the Cross, where we entered on our real life, and ends, as Christian's did, at the gate of the Golden City.

All the paths begin and end at the same points, but how different their character; and how different the character of the same path at different places. Sometimes a bit of green sward, where at every step the foot sinks deep in flowers; then a few miles of rough walking over jagged flints, which cut the feet; then a climb up the Hill Difficulty, in the face of the pitiless blast; and finally a descent into the Valley of the Shadow. Now we shiver amid the shows of the mountains, and again we are enervated by the scorching heat of the plains. At times we come into the midst of congenial companions and enjoy their blessed fellowship in the Gospel; at other times we are carried into loneliness and isolation, and the work itself tries us to the uttermost.

But when once we have learned to believe that the pathway of our good works was before prepared for us by God; that He created us for the prepared path, endowing us with all the qualities it might demand; and that He prepared the path for us whom He created, in order to afford scope for our special powers—we come to rest in the perfect adaptation between God's creations and his preparations. Fear not, go forward; He gives what He commands, and then commands what He wills.

What relief is here.—We have no longer to choose our pathway, or to cut it through the thick undergrowth of the forest, or to scheme it through the trackless waste. It is all prepared, and we have but to walk in it, with God, one step at a time. Put your hand into God's, look up into his face, saying, "Lead me, Father, in the prepared way;" "Teach me thy way;" "Make me to know the way wherein I should walk."

What confidence is here.—The only serious matter is to discover the prepared path. We may do this by abiding fellowship with the Spirit. Remember how when Paul essayed to turn aside from the prepared path of his life, and to go first to the left to Ephesus, and then to the right into Bithynia, in each case the Spirit of Jesus suffered him not. For the most part the trend of daily circumstance will indicate the prepared path; but whenever we come to a standstill, puzzled to know which path to take of three or four that converge at a given point, let us stand still and consider the matter, asking God to speak to us through our judgment, and to bar every path but the right.

When once the decision is made, let us never look back. Let us never dare to suppose that God could fail them that trust Him, or permit them to make a mistake. If difficulties arise they do not prove us to be wrong; and probably they are less by this path than they would have been by any other. Go forward, the way has been prepared. The mountains are a way; the rivers have fords; the lions are chained; the very waves shall yield a path; the desert shall be a highway to the land which flows with milk and honey.

What scope for love is here!—Envy and jealousy need have no place. God has prepared the path for each of us, according to His infinite wisdom and love. One way is adapted for one, and another for another. Peter is girded and carried whither he would not go; whilst John tarries until the Master comes for him in the peaceful decease of old age. "What is that to thee? follow thou me." Each, then, can take a loving interest in the life-plan of another, sure that nothing can interfere with the evolution of his own, save his indolence or sin. Prepare us, O God, for all that Thou hast prepared for us. We will not be ambitious of great things, but to walk, day by day, humbly with Thee, and so fulfil our course. Thus shall we become thy workmanship—thy poem (Greek, lit.).

Eph. ii. 9. The revelation of the purpose of the Creator.—The purposes of God have been hidden deep in unfathomable mines. From the first He knew that man would fall from his high estate, but He ordained that his purpose should still be executed of making man his son, his heir, the sharer of his glorious life. Yes, and further, He resolved that his dealings with redeemed men should bring out into clearer relief his own manifold wisdom.

So He created all things through Jesus Christ. The entire fabric of creation was based upon the Person and workmanship of our blessed Lord. He was the medium and organ through whom the creative purpose moved; just as He became that through which the redemptive purpose passed into execution.

For long ages the purposes of God were obscured. Men could not tell their drift, until the Spirit of Pentecost made them understand something of the marvellous design. The mystery, which in other generations was not made known unto the sons of men, was revealed to the holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit. And now all babes who are Spirit-taught, know things which the great and good of previous ages failed to discern.

And when the completed Church stands before the assembled universe, then will the principalities and powers of the heavenlies understand the manifold wisdom of God. To use the figure suggested by the Greek, then will the Church, like a prism, break into its sevenfold colour, the single ray of the Divine wisdom.

A VALEDICTORY IN MADAGASCAR.

Not the first by any means, as we have had such meetings annually for several years at Ambohimandrose, but this year it was unusually interesting and important. On Sunday afternoon, April 9, the largest chapel was well filled with a sympathetic congregation, to wish God-speed to a party of thirty-four young people, appointed to work in different parts of the island. Thirty of these were students and their wives who had finished their course at the training institute. Of these, three and their wives had volunteered for work on the South-East Coast, in the districts under the care of Revs. Messrs. Shaw, and Collins. The remaining twenty-four were destined for work in towns and villages around Ambohimandrose. The others were two evangelists and their wives; one, a Christian, having given up trading, was going out as an itinerant evangelist. The other, a former student, had been at work as village schoolmaster and pastor; having grown in grace and usefulness, he had been raised to the responsible position of evangelist, with several churches under his care.

It was with very mixed feelings that we gazed on this large party leaving us. We sorrowed to part with them, as every one of them had grown very dear to us. Also we knew their spiritual history almost individually. We rejoiced that God had given them to us to train and nurse up in the faith, and that now they were counted worthy to be sent out to teach and preach the everlasting Gospel. We believed that everyone had been born again, though some were weak. It was the largest and best party we had ever sent out. We thank God that the standard is being raised year by year. It is very pleasant to reflect, too, that missionary enthusiasm is increasing among our students, so that more volunteer for distant work than we can afford to appoint, the need being so great around us.

But to return to the meeting. After Mr. Rowlands had introduced them, and stated their respective appointments, they were addressed by one pastor, and commended to God in prayer by another. During the meetings several hymns, such as, "Work, for the night is coming," translated by some of our own workers, were heartily sung; also several of the party spoke, telling of their joy and their hopes of usefulness. Two of them thanked the Governor, who was present, that they had ever been compelled to become scholars. What a dark day that was to them, and how they hated the thought of school; now, however, they could say it was good for them to have been thus afflicted, that they might learn of God, and find salvation.

The Christian Governor responded, and added some wise and gracious words. One of the Government officers, "a man of good repute," did the same; also our town evangelist, "a man full of faith and the Holy Ghost," in pathetic language urged them not to cast away their confidence in God and miss their crown, to which he added his own testimony to the faithfulness of God and to the joy he found in being wholly consecrated to God.

The meeting (though held after Sunday-school) lasted nearly three hours, yet no one seemed tired, and the interest was sustained from first to last.

From the time they had been appointed they met together frequently for prayer and spiritual exercises, and real, good, warm little meetings they were. Most of them belong to our Christian Endeavour Society. Oh, blessed Gospel of the Grace of God, that can so change the hearts of these once heathen people! Oh, blessed privilege of being workers together with God for this end! Here is joy, pure and unalloyed, which no man can take away! It is sought in other ways, but not found. It is only found in doing his commandments, and they are not grievous. Lizzie Rowlands.

Ambohimandrose, Betsilse, Madagascar.

A CONFERENCE for the deepening of the spiritual life was held at Koderkanal, in the Madura district, India, from May 22 to 26 inclusive. The general subject was "Divine Sonship," and many helpful stimulating words were spoken by the various brethren who addressed the conference.

MIDNIGHT MEETING MOVEMENT.—Last Thursday night, on the invitation of Mr. George Williams, one hundred young women and girls were entertained to tea at Exeter Hall. Some were terribly young. "Can it be that these mere children are leading an immoral life?" was the question which pressed itself home on all the workers present. Yet, so it is. All listened most attentively to what was said, and many promised to give up their evil life at once and enter Homes.

THE MILDMAY CONFERENCE.

TUESDAY EVENING, JUNE 27.

Notwithstanding the heavy rain on Tuesday afternoon and evening the various gatherings were largely attended. Mr. H. C. Nisbet, who presided at the evening meeting, made reference to the weather, and called for special thanksgiving for the refreshing showers so sorely needed throughout the land.

The subject of the evening was "The satisfaction of his desire," and the Chairman, having read Prov. viii. 14—36, dwelt for a few moments on the expression, "My delights are with the sons of men." It is, he said, the uniform testimony of Scripture that God seeks the companionship of men; so it was in the days when He walked with man in the Garden of Eden, in the days of Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaiah, Daniel, and other holy men of old with whom God spoke as friend with friend. And thus loving men, He has designed the ransom of fallen men, and their restoration to communion and fellowship in order that they may dwell with Him for ever. Even as from the wounded side of Adam there came a bride to be helpmeet and companion, so from the pierced side of the Lord Jesus comes that beautiful Bride, the Church, which He hath purchased with his own blood; and in the day of his espousal He shall say in the gladness of his heart, "Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee."

"The Satisfaction of His Desire."

REV. H. B. MACARTNEY (of Melbourne).

I hope that you are all praising and blessing God for the wet weather, and are praying that we may be even more enriched by inward and spiritual showers than the British Islands are by the breaking up of the drought. My subject is the satisfaction of the Saviour's desire, when He sees of the travail of his soul in that moment of supreme felicity, his marriage day. The Scriptures say that Jesus must be lifted up—that is past; that He must increase—that is present; that He must reign—that is future; but what has that to do with us? Everything: whatever concerns Him, concerns his elect, and this truth concerns us most intimately.

"Thou too shalt reign—He will not wear
His crown of joy alone!
And earth shall see his royal Bride
Beside Him on the throne."

Let us take our Bibles, and see what God has said about the Bride, by symbols and otherwise, that so we may enter more fully into the thoughts and interests of his heart about her, and more into sympathy with the Bridegroom in the approaching hour.

(1) Gen. i. 16. "God made two great lights"—Jesus made them, for "all things were made by Him," and we love what we make with our own hands. The second "great light" teaches us the doctrine of the Church and the truth about holiness, with a kind of mathematical exactness. Taken by herself the moon is dull, dark, lifeless and prone to wander. Her experience, if left without a Lord Paramount, would be—fall, fall, sink, sink, into the hideous abysses of eternity; but it is now quite otherwise. Instead of being less than the least of all the orbs of heaven, and utterly unlovely, she is lustrous with borrowed splendour, and scatters the darkness of our planet. Captured by an invisible power, she has never for a single second deflected even one hair's-breadth from her divinely ordered path; she has never been a moment in advance of her time, and never a moment late; her influence is of the mightiest kind in earth and air and sea, but only because of her subjection to control. This is what should be found in the antetype, the Church. In herself she is nothing but dust and ashes, ready every instant to run wild from government; yet, with her eyes on God, she is fair as the morning, clear as the sun; and goes on her way conquering and to conquer. Herself conquered by Him who is invisible, her captivity is as sublime as it absolute—only one will operating, no self-life, nothing but soft submission. This is holiness—do you know it? This is rest and victory. "He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit." Everything is gathered up in those simple lines,

"I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all;
Jesus Christ is my all in all."

(2) Gen. ii. 23. Adam said, "This is now flesh of my flesh." Here is a garden, and a man in a profound sleep. His side is rent—something is taken from it—he wakes, and lo, another! He sees himself in Eve; love now awakes; he claims her as his bride; she is bone of his bone; she is his to-day and for ever. "She shall be called Isha, because she was taken out of Ish." There is a garden years after, and another Adam. Behold Jesus in his death sleep! gaze on that fissure in his side! the Church was born there! Surely then He will love her with an everlasting love, and look with a Divine eagerness to the Nuptial Day? We love what we suffer for, what we pay for dearly; and what were his payments, his sufferings? After riches ineffable, coming into contact with this poor world, coming into contact with sinners—that was bad enough—yet not enough; his elect Bride had trespassed, and trespass is debt, and debt means curse and death. Jesus must come in contact with the sin itself—and so He did, in his heaven-born passion to save:—

"And as the load, immense, intolerable,
Of the world's sin, come nearer and more near,
Grounded at last upon His sinless soul,
Then first, from all eternity the first,
From his beloved Son, the Father's face
Was slowly averted, and its light eclipsed,
And through the darkness rang the Sufferer's moan,
Eloi, Eloi, Lama Sabacthani."

(3) Gen. xxiv. 65. "What man is this that walketh in the field to meet us?" You know the story and its spiritual significance. I need only observe therefore that there are two in one country, the father and the son, and two in another country, far away, the ruler of Abraham's house and the bride. The steward had only one thought, his master, his wealth, his glory; above all his master's son, "and unto him hath he given all that he hath." Even so the Holy Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son, has come down to show the things of Christ, to win our "yes," and to conduct us to the Bridegroom. But how is the Bridegroom occupied? "He goes out into the field to meditate, to pray, at eventide" (v. 63). His feet are on the path along which his Church is coming; his face is towards her; for her his petitions ascend. The Church is the fruit of his intercession, as well as of his creative power and of his great birth pangs, and this will greatly augment his nuptial joy. Who knows but that in another minute He might arise, and we, "caught up," might be asking, "What man is this that cometh to meet us?" Angels would answer, "Your next of kin, your Mighty Man of wealth, the One whom the King delights to honour, the Vine of which you are the branches, the Bridegroom coming out of his palace, the long-expected Jesus."

(4) Esther ii. 12. "Six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odours, and with other things for the purifying of the women." The queen had to "go in unto the King," but only "thus." No sudden thought, no hurried preparation, only "thus." Oh, beloved, you will catch the sacred suggestion. You are to be queen, therefore you are to be holy, and that is not a matter of a minute. Alas! for the holiness that is all the fashion just now; it is a cheap and spurious thing. Holiness hymns, a holiness vocabulary, intimacy with holy people, a little Christian service, and a second-hand experience, this is only skin-deep;

IT CANNOT SATISFY GOD.

When Heaven opened at Jordan, there was a great conjunction between God the Holy Ghost and a sinless Man, and Satan saw and trembled. When Jesus was taken up, the earth was void; there was not a man left full of Deity; but when heaven opened again at Pentecost, there was another conjunction of a double kind, the Holy Ghost first joined Himself to sinful men and then He joined them to Jesus.

Think not that this baptism was for purposes of testimony only—it was for purification—it was for suffering as well as service. Union with Christ means union with his afflictions; union with Him in Gethsemane; union with Him in rejection, crucifixion, death, and burial; union with Him in anguish for souls; union with his Spirit in groanings that cannot be uttered. The Holy Ghost is in you, beloved; you are aware of his presence theoretically—perhaps you have experience of his power—but do you know Him? This knowledge of God can only come when the indwelling is recognised as the greatest thing in life, and oh, how everything is reduced to extreme simplicity when you understand "Christ liveth in me"—not "is" in me, but "liveth" in me—a springing fountain—the blessed and only Potentate in the temple of my body! This body of ours has not room for two or three lives—life physical, life intellectual, life spiritual—such lives would perplex and entangle one another. Christ is our life, our only life for every purpose, and thus God Himself sanctifies us wholly, body, soul, and spirit. Child of God, see not only that when you are "married to Another," "all your garments smell of myrrh," but that you are "all glorious within." Deep-reaching holiness will be a special joy to Jesus, on the Bridal Day, when He makes up his jewels.

(5) Solomon's Song. Once you get into this song, it is hard to get out of it; nevertheless let me recal to mind the growth in grace indicated by the altered exclamations of the Bride, "My Beloved is mine" (ii. 16), "I am my Beloved's" (vi. 3), and "I am my Beloved's, and his desire is toward me" (vii. 10). Note also how the Bridegroom deals with the soul that has caught the idea of "his inheritance in the saints." First, He brings us "into his chamber" (i. 4), that is for converse, alone. Secondly, we are privileged to see the King sitting "at his table" (i. 12), and the "meat" of that table is better than Solomon's (1 Kings x. 5): "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me." His gaze is on his Father, but not on Him only; his feast has a second part—He gazes on his people, and He cries, "Thou hast ravished My heart with one of thine eyes." Oh for eyes that sparkle as they look on Him! Thirdly, we "sit down under his shadow" (ii. 3) with other members of the great family of affliction; He, He Himself, shelters us from the burning sun of trial; He wipes the tears from off all faces; He refreshes us with the fruits of Paradise. Fourthly, He brings us "to the Banqueting House" (ii. 4). We enter leaning on his arm. He is not ashamed of us; from association with us. His own fragrance in us has endeared us to Him, and association has a new commencement from his wedding day, when his cup is full. Listen to his words, "Thou art fair." "Thou art all fair; there is no spot in thee." "A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon." His love for his Church is proved in another way. In the New Testament we read that his coming will be ushered in by "the voice of the archangel and the trump of God," but here (ii. 8) we get his own voice; it is a cry of wordless joy—"the voice of my Beloved"—and like an arrow from the bow, like a lightning flash from the upper air, "Behold, He cometh!" And see how He comes, not as one loath to leave the heavens, but "leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills." Yes, He is coming, coming quickly, and Solomon's Song ends, as Revelation ends, with "Make haste, my Beloved." The Bride has been so taught by the Holy Ghost, that their voice, their word, their very tone is the same, "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come."

HIS LOVE HAS NOT GROWN COLD

(6) Ezekiel xvi. "I sware unto thee, entered into a covenant with thee, washed thee, clothed thee, girded thee, covered thee with silk, decked thee with ornaments; thy renown went forth for thy beauty, for it was perfect through my comeliness which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord God. But thou didst trust in thine own beauty." Then follows one of the saddest tales ever told in Scripture, a downward course, a terrible backsliding, till we come to "nevertheless" in v. 60, and "I will remember." Here we get the truth that the joy of Jesus will be heightened in that day by the trembling recollection that what He had created, purchased, prayed for, purified by his Spirit, and personally delighted in, He had very nearly lost through her unfaithfulness—that she would have utterly perished by her worldliness and apostacy had He not, by fresh acts of marvellous grace, gone after her into the depths of her iniquity to restore her soul. Oh, the gladness of that restoration following on the anguish of departure! He had said: "Return: I will heal your backsliding, I will love you freely; from Me shall thy fruit again be found." "And it shall be in that day, saith the Lord, that thou shalt call Me Ishi"—the husband of the heart (Hos. ii. 16, and xiv.).

(7) John xiv. Here we find two comings of Christ. First his coming to his people (v. 18), "I will come to you." Have you ever read a strange book called "Visits to and from the Lord Jesus"? The idea is based on this remarkable chapter. Jesus does come to see his people between the time of his espousal and the time of the Royal wedding. "I will love him, and will manifest Myself to him"; "We will come unto him, and make our abode with him." But there is also here the coming for his bride, after preparation. "I go to prepare a place for you, and I will come again and receive you unto Myself." Wonderful that any preparation should be thought necessary in such a place as heaven; yet we must bear in mind, not the lowly origin of the wife, but the dignity and the great love of the Husband.

HE WILL DEEM NOTHING TOO GOOD for her with whom have been his delights for thousands of years. A charming little story is told of an old African named "Uncle Johnson" (published by Messrs. Partridge). His minister looked over the fence one day, and heard him say with uplifted face, "Lord Jesus, will dere be one for me?" Tenderly asking the aged negro what he meant, he replied: "Oh, I was just tinking of Jesus being the carpenter, and so He can build mansions for his people in glory." Then again he looked up through his tears, crying, "Lord Jesus, will dere be one for me?" Yes, there will—one for you, lover and friend of Jesus. His very preparation for you has increased his longing after you. Thus will his full cup overflow upon that "silver morn."

I may add that there will be two other glorious elements in the Saviour's happiness in the day of our gathering together unto Him. (1.) Angelic beings, so far from entertaining jealousy because He has passed them by, to "take hold of" and to exalt an inferior order in creation, will be in a state of heavenly ecstasy. "Unto them is known by the Church the manifold wisdom of God." It is the four Living Creatures, the four-and-twenty Elders, and the ten thousand times ten thousand, who make the vault of heaven ring with "Thou art worthy" and "Worthy is the Lamb," because of his redemptive work. (2.) Jesus' "exceeding joy" (Jude 24), when He presents us to Himself, will not be damped by any fear of his earth-born bride being unacceptable when He presents her to his Father. She will be "faultless"; her beauty will be the very beauty of his own beloved Son; but to make our assurance doubly sure, He comforts us with words like these: "Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom."

In conclusion, let me remind you that Holiness comes not only, if at all, when we die; we must be holy now; without it "no man shall see the Lord." The test of Holiness is Love. "He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love." Have you tested yourselves? Have you singled out someone beneath you, perhaps intellectually, or socially, or spiritually, who it may be dislikes you—to whom you have a strong natural aversion, who is always crossing your path and fretting your memory—have you, I say, singled out such a one to wrap them round with love ineffable, with God's love for them shed abroad in your heart? Oh, "well is thee and happy shalt thou be," if you make that seeming stumbling-block your stepping-stone to fuller sanctification; your Lord's joy will not then be dimmed at the marriage supper by any feeling of shame for you!

Now, workers, at home, in Christendom among the heathen, tell it out from sea to sea, from pole to pole, that men may not only be saved from sin and saved from hell, but that oneness with Jesus, union with God, awaits every believer. Let the thought grow and burn within you—what we are saved for, what we are destined to. Get more exalted views of God, and of God's Beloved Son, and the higher you soar in your conception of Him, the higher will be your view of your heavenly calling, the more fervent your pleading with those whose eyes are still blinded to such celestial glory. Notwithstanding all that you know against yourself, you will not then be ashamed before Him at his coming. His undisguised gladness will dissipate every fear. "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied." "He will rest in his love; He will joy over you with singing."

A season of prayer followed, both silent and vocal, in which the sufferings of the persecuted Stundists and Armenians were borne up before God, while the iniquities of the Opium Traffic were also confessed and deplored. Rev. J. Hudson Taylor and Mr. Eugene Stock led the prayers of the Conference at this point.

THE BRIDE AND BRIDEGROOM.

Dr. McKilliam said: We have been speaking of the satisfaction of our Lord in looking forward to the wonderful moment when his heart shall have its highest joy; but the question arises whether his Church has sympathy with her Lord in this longing. In Rev. xix. 7 we read that "The marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." I believe that she is now making herself ready, that as we come closer to this wonderful event the power of the Holy Ghost is coming upon the Church, and awakening a deeper longing after holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. The readiness spoken of is not merely salvation from sin, deliverance from wrath which we have through Jesus Christ, but rather that sanctification spoken of in Eph. v. 27, the alienating of our heart from anything selfish, worldly, and worthless, and the bringing it by the power of the Spirit of God into fuller sympathy with our Lord's heart and mind about that event to which He is looking forward.

Now, turning to Psa. xlv., you see something of the readiness of which we have spoken. The Father addresses the Bride, the true Church, exhorting her: "Hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear; forget also thine own people and thy father's house; so shall the King greatly desire thy beauty; for He is thy Lord, and worship thou Him." The speaker proceeded to expound these exhortations in practical and pertinent fashion, showing how God is calling the Bride, in view of the approaching espousals, to closer fellowship, greater separation, and deeper yearnings after her glorious Lord.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

The Reception of his Saints.

The President directed attention to a conference described in Exodus xxxiv., pointing out the blessedness of being "with the Lord." Moses had said, "Show me now thy way." God "made known his way unto Moses, his acts unto the children of Israel." Many people see his acts who do not know his way. God told Moses that He would show him his glory: "I will make all my goodness to pass before thee." The glory of God is his character; Jesus Christ is the character of God, the brightness of his glory, and the express image, or character, of his person. To see God's glory, we must look at Jesus Christ—full of grace and truth.

REV. J. G. TRAIN.

The subject is "The Coming of the Lord and our Gathering Together unto Him"—words which point to the fact that his coming and our gathering will be coincident. Here, as elsewhere, the Apostle teaches that when the Lord Jesus comes we shall have experience instantly of our gathering together unto Him. It is so in the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, chapter iv., where we are told that the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; and then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. When He comes, those who have fallen asleep, and those who are alive and remain, shall instantly, and universally, the wide world over, be gathered together. The testimony of our Lord Himself is, it seems to me, in the same line. Speaking to his disciples, He said, "I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto Myself." When He comes He will receive us. On the instant of his coming we shall be taken.

I have used the word that is employed in Luke xvii., which refers to the same event, and how solemn is that passage! With what impressiveness does the Lord testify "One shall be taken (received) and the other left." Are we really ready for his coming, knowing that when He comes his own shall be gathered?

Thou art coming, we are waiting,
With a hope that cannot fail;
Asking not the day or hour,
Resting on thy word of power,
Anchored safe within the veil.
Time appointed may be long,
But the vision must be sure;
Certainty shall make us strong;
Joyful patience can endure.

At his coming, as now, the Lord Jesus Christ will be the one centre of attraction. The truest preparation for the coming is not an intellectual one, not a storing of the head with information concerning the coming; but it is the preparation of the heart. That Christ will be the centre of attraction would appear from the words "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven." And in Tim. i. 1 we read of "The Lord Jesus Christ our hope." You remember how, in his earthly life, when speaking to Him regarding the resurrection of Lazarus, Martha said she knew that her brother would "rise again in the resurrection of the last day." Seeming well-nigh grieved that she should put the day far away, he showed that the resurrection was bound up in his own person. He brought it near by saying, "I am the Resurrection and the Life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live" (a reference, I think, to those who have fallen asleep); "and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die" (a reference to those who remain unto the coming of the Lord). Then, as now, Christ Himself will be the centre of attraction, and our gathering together will be unto Him.

He testifies of this in that tender passage in John xiv. When taking leave of his disciples, He gives remarkable prominence to his personality. How frequently is the word "I" upon his lips! "I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." As many of us as know his salvation have, by the power of his redemption, been gathered to Him spiritually; finally we shall be gathered to Himself in the other sense, as He made request: "Father, I will that they whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am, that they may behold my glory." Do not let us be distracted even by the thoughts of glory, so as to get our eyes off the Lord Jesus Christ Himself:—

The bride eyes not her garment,
But her dear bridegroom's face
I will not gaze at glory,
But on my King of Grace;
Not at the crown He giveth,
But on his pierced hand;
The Lamb is all the glory
Of Immanuel's land.

While He will be the centre of attraction in the coming day, the thought of joy in association with all those who believe is not forbidden us. The gathering will have Christ for its centre, radiating from which we shall gladly look on ever-widening circles of those who have believed. There is joy in the thought that the day is coming when we shall find ourselves together. The Apostle says that He "died for us, that whether we wake or sleep we should live together with Him." As we dwell on the joy which the believer now has when associated with all those who believe, we have some anticipation of what is spoken of in Scripture, as our gathering together with Him. Devoted as the Apostle was to the thought of our Lord being the centre, he was not beyond the thought that in that day we shall be in joyous association with others, especially with such as we may have been privileged to bring to a knowledge of the truth. He says: "What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?" We shall find ourselves in the presence one of another at the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, and, I doubt not, such as have fallen asleep await, as truly as we do, the glorious consummation; for the blessedness of the believer will not be perfectly realised until the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto Him.

When the weary ones we love
Enter on their rest above—
Seems the earth so poor and vast,
All our life joy overcast.
Hush! be every murmur dumb;
It is only "till He come,"

Further, we are warranted in saying that we have a foretaste and pledge of our final gathering even now, according to the language of another portion of Scripture, while we "forsake not the assembling of ourselves together." In reality, the expression rendered "gathering together" in 2 Thessalonians ii., is only found once again in the New Testament, and that is in Heb. x. 25, where it is rendered "assembling together." We may equally render "assembling together" in the former passage, and preserve the idea of spontaneity, for it will be a spontaneous matter. We are not spoken of as being gathered, but rather "our gathering" is spoken of. When the Lord comes, such will be his attractiveness to all who believe, that instantaneously, universally, the wide world over, we shall assemble ourselves unto Him. Individually, we find the centre of attraction of our lives in the Lord Jesus Christ; and as we look reverently in each other's faces, we cannot but think that we have now and here a pledge and a foretaste of the final assembling which will be accomplished at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER.

Colonel MORTON read out the requests for prayer, and they were presented by Dr. PENTECOST. Blessing was asked upon the work of the Cape General Mission, Deacon Abraham's labours in Persia, and the union of the Duke of York and the Princess May. God was praised on behalf of one whose son was saved from the warship Victoria; and for opening the way for the inauguration of a Gospel Hall at Gratz, in Austria. The audience sang heartily the hymn by Miss E. S. Elliott, "The Royal Bridal" (given in our issue of June 22), and the President announced his intention to send word to the Prince and Princess and other members of the Royal family, of the interest which the auspicious event has had in the prayers of the Conference. He added that as, on one occasion a few years ago, the Duchess of Teck and the Princess attended the Conference, the nature of the intimation would be readily appreciated.

REV. E. W. MOORE, OF WIMBLEDON, alled attention to the oft-repeated prayer, "Thy Kingdom come," and asked, "What constitutes readiness for the King's return?" He answered the question by saying that those who would be ready for the kingdom must have the kingdom established within them. Proceeding, he traced a parallel between the setting up of Christ's kingdom on earth and the full establishment of the same in the soul.

First, The Source.—"My kingdom is not of this world." It descends, comes down from heaven. Just the same is the case with the inward kingdom. Education, culture, morality, cannot regenerate the soul. Heaven must enter us, or we cannot enter heaven.

Secondly, The Characteristics of the Kingdom.—There will be its universality—"one Lord and his name one." Every knee shall bow to Him, and every tongue confess. It is precisely the same in regard to individual experience. Christ will brook no rival. Alas! that there are many who would have Christ and some darling idol, too. But Christ will wield no partial authority; it must be universal. Moreover, it is transforming and not tyrannical, an inspiring rather than a constraining power. Righteousness and peace belong to Christ's kingdom, which is abiding and not temporary. Those who receive Christ into their hearts receive "a kingdom which cannot be moved."

Thirdly, The Conditions.—The first of these is the revelation of the King. Before anything else there must be the advent of the King who is to reign, and whose right it is. If we would have the kingdom in our hearts, we must first have the revelation of the King. But we must see that foes are surrendered. The usurper must be dethroned: self must be crucified if Christ is to be King. If with Christ we are crucified, then with Christ we shall reign.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

The Transformation of His People.

MR. J. HERBERT TRITTON, who presided, in some opening remarks pointed out that if we would share in future glories we must translate, if not indeed transmute, doctrine into life, belief into practice, faith into works. Those who would be transformed must first reform in their lives, perform God's commands, and be conformed to the image of Christ. Scripture illustrations were given on each of these heads.

REV. DR. BULLINGER.

It is a matter of devout thankfulness that this great and important subject of the transformation of God's people should find a place to-day at Mildmay; and a great and blessed privilege it is to take part in its consideration. There are few subjects that are made more of in the Word of God, and yet there are few subjects that are more set at nought by the traditions of men. I believe it was the late Mr. Spurgeon who lamented the fact that our English theology, while rich in many departments of Christian theology, does not contain a single standard and satisfactory work on this subject; and a reference to a bibliography, such as that given in Alger's "Future Life," will convince anyone of this fact—a fact as instructive as it is remarkable.

We are all constantly confessing in our creeds, "I look for the resurrection of the dead." Do we look for it? We each confess, "I believe in the forgiveness of sins." Do we believe in it? I think the two professions may go together, and that we may say that thousands who utter them know little about the forgiveness of sins, and look but little for the resurrection of the dead. It was with special reference to the resurrection that our blessed Lord said to his enemies, "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God." And we "err" with regard to this subject of the transformation of God's people, because we are ignorant of what the Word of God has to say about it; just as, on the other hand, we are ignorant about all that flows from a knowledge of the forgiveness of sins because our eyes are not open to the blessed which He has given us in Christ. We separate ourselves from Christ, and we separate this great doctrine from Christ; and hence it is, while He holds out hope for troubled hearts by saying, "If I go away I will come again and receive you unto Myself," and further says in effect, "I am coming to gather my saints—to raise those who are asleep, to change them and those who are alive and remain," we reply, practically, at any rate, "No, Lord, you need not come for me; I am going to die and come to Thee."

Now, while we may draw our own inferences from what the Scriptures state, we shall all agree that it is highly important that we should clothe these views in Scriptural terms, and it is for us to ask and to answer the question, How far have popular views blotted out the hope of the Lord's coming again to fulfil his promise to receive us unto Himself; and also how far have they really blotted out the doctrine of the resurrection and disestablished it from the place it occupies in the Word of God, and also from the various hymn books of the Church as a great object of hope? This error crept into the Church at a very early date. In 1 Cor. xv. 12, the Apostle Paul speaks of some who say, "There is no resurrection of the dead"; and in 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, he mentions Hymenæus and Philetus, "who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already." It is remarkable and instructive that although there is so little said about death in the New Testament, at any rate as a hope, much is said about the blessed hope of the transformation of God's people at the resurrection. In John vi. 39—54, Jesus says four times that He will "raise up at the last day" those who are his, and this He will do because it is "the Father's will."

The greatest comfort which the greatest Comforter that the world ever knew, had to give to two sisters who had been just bereaved of a beloved brother, was, "Thy brother shall rise again." All hope is bound up with this great subject; and if our theology has no place in it for this great hope, then the sooner we change it the better! For remember, this subject is wholly one of revelation. There is not a man upon the face of the earth that can tell you anything about it except what he himself shall learn from the Word of God. It is not, therefore, a question of human reason; it is not a question of the private views of this or that great or learned man, or of any system of doctrine or philosophy. It is purely

A QUESTION OF DIVINE REVELATION.

At the present moment a placard is being exposed announcing a book, "Death and Afterward," written by a poor mortal woman. What can she tell us about it, or, indeed, know about it, beyond the lies that have been taught by demons and evil angels? True, even with the Word of God in our hands, we only know "in part"; but, thank God! the time is coming when we shall know in whole—when "that which is perfect is come."

The fact of a resurrection has been the hope of God's people all along the ages; but a great secret regarding it was made known to and by the Apostle Paul. Our Lord in Mark ix. gave a hint of it when (v. 9) He spoke of His rising "from the dead." The disciples would not have been puzzled if the Lord had simply spoken of resurrection; but he spoke of a resurrection from the dead, and we read that "they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising FROM the dead should mean." They knew of the resurrection of dead people, but did not know what it could be to rise from the dead. But when the revelation was made to the Apostle Paul, he writes, 1 Cor xv. 51: "Behold, I show you a mystery"—I am going to tell you a secret, to disclose something that has remained hidden. "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." The heathen world before, and the world to-day, being ignorant of this secret, is saying, "There are many things that are uncertain, but there is one that is certain, and that is that we shall all die." Thank God, we know a secret about that. We shall not all die; but whether we live and remain, or whether we fall asleep, we know we shall be changed and raised at Christ's coming. And whenever the resurrection of the Lord Jesus is spoken of, and the resurrection of his people, it is always with the preposition "from"—which is uniformly expressed in the Revised Version, although not in the Authorised. This is the resurrection from among the dead.

But we may ask—How are the dead raised up? Of course man has his theories about this. His "thoughts" we may be perfectly sure are

CONTRARY TO GOD'S "THOUGHTS."

These theories may be summarised in four great classes. First, comes the Germ theory, which is the most ancient one. It was held by the Jews, and is spoken of in the Talmud. It was also entertained by some of the Christian Fathers, including Tertullian, Gregory of Nyssa, and Basil, and consisted of the idea that there is a certain bone or substance in the human body (called "Luz") which can never be destroyed. It was maintained that from that germ the resurrection body would be made. But there is no Scripture for the theory. Indeed, Scripture distinctly says, "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." The "germ" never dies; therefore, how can it be quickened? Further, "It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. That which is born of the flesh is flesh." A "germ" of flesh must produce flesh! The "seed," of course, is only an illustration, not a strictly analogous process. Christ's body did not see corruption, yet it died, and, therefore, "bringeth forth much fruit."

The second is the Identity theory, which found some favour in the early Church. According to this, cripples and infants would rise as such. Jerome held that all would rise as if aged about thirty. The Mohammedans believe that a man will rise exactly as he dies; so when injured in battle they refuse to have their limbs amputated, as the result would be eternal disfigurement. But the teaching of Scripture is opposed to all this: "Thou sowest not that body which shall be"; and "flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God" (1 Cor. xv. 37, 50). Again, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God"—a new house, a house from heaven.

The third theory is that of Re-incarnation, which is associated for the most part with the ancient religions of the East, and has been revived to-day under the guise of Theosophy—the teaching of evil angels. Satan is getting a circulation for this lie in preparation for the moment when he will reincarnate the Man of Sin. Some modern writers come very near to it—as Archbishop Whately in his "Future State," Bishop Westcott in some of his writings, and Professor Perowne. But Scripture says the body is a home for us; and always assumes that our bodies will be our own. Job said, "I shall see for myself; mine eyes shall behold." Again, the Apostle Paul, "Your whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved . . . unto the coming" (1 Thes. v. 23); Christ "shall change the bodies of our humiliation" (Phil. iii. 20, 21); "we shall be changed" (1 Cor. xv. 21). See also John vi. 39-54; Rom. viii. 11. The law of continuity is utterly broken down by this theory.

The fourth is the Spiritual Body theory, otherwise known as the Swedenborgian view. It is held by the Spiritualists, through the teaching of demons, and is much more popular than many of us imagine. This is also an ancient error, and leads to a denial altogether of the Resurrection. According to this theory, resurrection practically takes place at death by a spiritual body being evolved from the mortal body. But this utterly and does away with the hope of all who are Christ's being raised together. We are to be changed together, at a definite moment (at Christ's coming), and in a definite order (1 Cor. xv. 23, 24), at "the last day." The "last day" is not the hour of each believer's death, but it is coincident with the coming of the Lord. We that are alive and remain are not to precede those that are asleep. Why? Because they are to be raised first, and then we shall be changed, and caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air. This spiritual body theory utterly reverses the teaching of Scripture as to death and judgment, and makes a mockery of those great solemn statements, "Thou shalt surely die," and "There shall be no more death." It is completely negatived by the fact that the resurrection body is to be like unto Christ's glorious body (Phil. iii. 20, 21), which is the type, illustration, and definition of what the body of the raised saints will be. "We know that when He shall appear we shall be LIKE HIM."

What was Christ's resurrection body like? Women "held Him" (Matt. xxviii. 9); so it could be held. He said, "Handle Me and see" (Luke xxiv. 39); so it could be handled. To Thomas he said, "Reach hither thy finger and behold"; the spear mark was visible, the prints of the nails could be seen! (John xx. 27). There is thus great meaning in those solemn words which refer to Israel, "They shall look on Me whom they have pierced" (Zech. xii. 10). By resurrection He became "the First-born from the dead," and will have many brethren; and He was "declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead" (Rom. i. 4). That is how we shall be declared sons of God; for we are told that when the body shall be redeemed from the grave, the manifestation of the sons of God shall take place (Rom. viii. 19-23). Resurrection was Christ's because of whom He was; it is ours because of whose we are.

Now we ask, How are the dead raised up? and the answer is—By the power of God. Nicodemus asked, How can these things be? The answer was, "God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son" (John iii. 9, 16). God's gift was the answer. The woman of Samaria asked, "How is it that thou ... askest drink of me?" Jesus said, "If thou knewest the gift of God" (John iv. 9, 10). So also it is here in 1 Cor. xv. 35-38: "Some man will say, How are the dead raised up?" The answer is, "God giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him." The power of God in the gift of God is the answer to all our questions. Hence, to refer again to 2 Cor. v., we know that if—it is no hypothetical conjecture—"WE KNOW" because God hath said so, "that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God." In other words, supposing our body should be dissolved in death, we know we shall have a better one, a house that God Himself shall build, not an earthly but a heavenly one.

When shall we have it? Such commentators as I have looked at say we have it at death. But from Phil. iii. 20, 21, it is clear that the coming of the Lord is the point of time. Mark that 2 Cor. v. is a continuation of the preceding chapter, and the "For" with which it begins introduces another reason of our knowing that "he which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus." Resurrection (iv. 14) is great subject of 2 Cor. v. 1-10; no mere transition or evolution is contemplated, but a transformation—"the redemption of the body," for which we groan, waiting for the sonship (Rom. viii. 19, 23). Not identity but continuity is the word that expresses the truth as to the transformation of God's people. The bodies which we possess now are the same as when we were children, although scientifically and philosophically they are not the same. "He that was dead came forth." "Women received their dead raised to life." The grave has already been robbed of some of its prey, and two—Enoch and Elijah—have escaped death altogether.

CONTINUITY AND RE-CREATION

briefly describe the transformation. Hence we are exhorted in 1 Peter iv. 19 to "commit the keeping of our souls to God in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator. The transfiguration of the Lord Jesus Christ is a type of the resurrection body, which will be glorious—"white as no fuller on earth can white them." The scene on the Mount was a revelation of the King and his people, a specimen of the Kingdom and its power.

We have other instruction on this wonderful subject in Jer. xviii. 1—4, "The word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, Arise, and go down to the potter's house, and there I will cause thee to hear my words. Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels. And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hands of the potter; so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it." If you look at the immediate context, you will see that the interpretation of this passage refers to the house of Israel, but there is an application of them which goes very much further; it illustrates a great principle, which we see in all the works of God. Man is always marring everything with which God has entrusted him. The covenant of works was marred, and God made another (Heb. viii. 7—9). So with regard to the earth itself. Sin entered, and the curse was pronounced; the earth was marred, but it is not going to be mended, for the Potter will make a new one. "I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away." So as to our old nature. It has been marred—in our first parents and in each of us. God will not mend it, but He makes a new creation, and gives man a new nature. The new wine cannot be put into the old bottles, nor the new piece of cloth upon the old garment; but new must be put to new, and so both are preserved. These bodies of ours have been "marred upon the wheels." As soon as we are born we begin to die; the seeds of disease and suffering and death are in every one of us. "Marred upon the wheels," but "the potter returned, and made it again another vessel, as it seemed good to the potter to make it." (v. 4, marg.) And so, with these transformed bodies at the resurrection, when the great Potter Himself shall return, He will make them again "another body, as it hath pleased Him." So, whether we consider our old nature, our hearts, or our bodies, they are never mended or repaired, or improved and reformed, but they are condemned; and a new nature and a new heart are given, and by-and-by new bodies also will be bestowed. What a depth of meaning then there is in these few simple words—"He made again another vessel, as it pleased the potter to make it." "God giveth it

A BODY AS IT HATH PLEASED HIM."

So in Heb. x., speaking of the sacrifices and offerings of the first covenant, we read that they were all taken away, and then He said "Lo, I come, to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that He may establish the second." Thank God, He has established the second; so these glorious bodies will be established for ever.

This is our hope, and you will see that it is all bound up in Christ. It shuts us up entirely to Christ, and is the subject of the present Conference. But people do not heed it. As the shepherds told of Christ's first coming, the people "wondered." They talked about the same things as occupy people to-day—of taxes, politics, and so on. But the early Christians cherished this blessed hope. Gibbon (vol. 1 ch. xv.) says, "It was universally believed . . . The approach of this event had been predicted by the Apostles; the tradition of it was preserved by their nearest disciples, and those who understood in their literal sense the discourses of Christ Himself, were obliged to expect the coming of the Son of Man before that generation was totally extinguished [they were not "obliged," but they did expect.] As long as, for wise purposes, this error [an expression which shows this to be the testimony of an enemy] was permitted to subsist in the Church, it was productive of the most salutary effect on the faith and practice of Christians." This is hostile testimony, but how true! Oh, that Christians to-day would try the experiment of this "error," and accustom themselves to look for the Lord's return!

As Christ is the blessed object and centre of our hope, so He is presented to us in this great subject. "Every man that hath this hope in Him" (in Christ)—the hope of being like Christ at his appearing—what does he do? He "purifieth himself, even as He is pure" (1 John iii. 3). Why is there such a low standard of walk among Christians? Because this purifying hope is not held. Why are other methods used and sought for the promotion of purity of life, and this Divine method not tried? Here is God's method to secure purity of life. Other methods may be carried too far, and are carried too far; but you cannot look too much to Christ or for Christ. There will be no ill-effects in looking for Him. And when this blessed hope is realised, we shall surely say, "The half had not been told me." It will exceed all our expectation and all we ever desired. For "it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be LIKE HIM, for we shall see Him as He is."

spoke to young believers, showing that the second coming of the Lord may be divided into two parts—first, to the air for his people; secondly, to the earth with his people. It is with the latter that all the prophecies of judgment and destruction are connected. Some have supposed that the moment the Lord takes his people all hope for the unconverted will be taken away. He believed, however, that at the coming of the Lord for his saints there will be a Pentecost far greater than that described in the book of the Acts, and a greater ingathering of souls. In Revelation ix. a great multitude which no man can number, gathered from every nation and people and kindred and tongue, are seen. Who are they, wearing white robes? It says that they came out of the great tribulation, and that commences after "the first fruits" have been caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and before the coming of the saints to judgment and to reign. O Lord Jesus, come quickly, that the work which we are doing so badly, may be better done, and all nations may hear the Gospel.

In some further remarks the speaker pointed out that the Lord will not transform into his likeness those who are not like-minded with Himself. How do we become like-minded? "We all, with open face beholding, as in a mirror, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord" (2 Cor. iii. 18). Sanctification progresses as we behold the Master and delight in Him.

THURSDAY MORNING.

God's Eternal Purpose.

Sir S. A. BLACKWOOD again presided over a large assemblage, and in a few sentences commented suggestively on passages from Eph. i. and Romans viii. We append pretty full notes of the address by Mr. Webb-Peploe, which was the only address of the morning.

REV. W. H. WEBB-PEPLOE.

AFTER a brief résumé of the subjects of the preceding two days, which dealt with what may be described as events or facts connected with Christ's second advent, the speaker said: We are this morning called to look at what may at first sight appear to some to be abstract or theoretical. How, it may be said, can we enter into the council halls of a past eternity and see the members of the Trinity speaking one to another, in a majesty and solitude which no creature ever approached, and proposing to themselves purposes which should be carried out through time? Were it not for revelation we would know nothing concerning that which God purposed in the past ages before the earth was made. Yet let no one think for a moment that the subject is in any sense to be called unpractical, or lacking in personal interest and blessing for our souls. As we heard yesterday, whatever interests God should interest us. Are we not so closely linked with Christ by the bonds of gratitude and love, that whatever is for his glory must interest his saints on earth? We may in this way test our spiritual condition. There are some who call themselves Christians, who seem to care so little for their Lord, and so much in matters spiritual for their own souls' satisfaction. Would God his Church could be raised to a higher level at this time, so that we may be lifted above the mere selfish considerations: "Am I saved? Is there hope for me? What lies before me in the eternity of the future?" The selfishness of the Church is the curse of the age. Is it wicked or hard to say that of the body of believers? I ask your careful consideration of the assertion that the want of the age is an unselfish body of Christ—a self-sacrificing Church, with the glory of the Lord as the one centre of its being, and the one single idea that absorbs the Church's attention. Therefore I say that whatever interests God should interest us. At the same time, whatever of interest we can feel towards our God is simply a reflection

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, JULY 9.—JOB X.

In times of trouble it is well to give free course to our complaint, and to speak in the bitterness of our soul; when the whole tide of our anguish is poured out to God Himself, there is nothing but gain in asking God to show why He contends. It is God Himself who invites us to this, saying, Come, let us reason together. The very expression of our bitterness in the calm presence of Christ, as when the disciples told Him all that had happened to them, soothes and quiets, and He says, Come and rest.

The one question about which the sufferer is eager is, as to whether God's standard is the same as man's (4, 5), for if love and right and good are the same to Him as to us, there is a common ground on which we can meet. But these questions are answered by the Incarnation, in which God meets us in the humanity of his Son.

To Job it seemed so great an anomaly that God should have done so much for him in his creation, preservation, and continual providence, and that yet He did not save him from suffering, but seemed to delight in heaping it upon his head. There seemed to be a variableness about God which was inconsistent with his immutable love. But there is one underlying purpose which is now revealed to the eye of faith, that God's one desire is to do the best He can for us, and if He cannot realise this except through pain, He loves us well enough to give us pain that He may bring us to his ideal of blessedness. It is one purpose pursued through various processes of light and shade, joy and pain.

MONDAY, JULY 10.—JOB XI.

Zophar followed in the track of the other two. He seemed rather put out that Job had spoken so much, little weening that his own address would produce a third prolific answer. He returns to the suggestion of the other two, that though Job was pure in his own eyes, it would be only necessary for God to speak, and He would show him himself after another fashion, and that in fact God was exacting of him less than his iniquity deserved.

The description of God given is very splendid in what it suggests of his greatness. We cannot find out God, but He knows us and sees our sin, and deals with us as He knows us with an infinite love, which is not turned away or surprised or weary. Our wanderings cannot get beyond the length, nor our falls beyond the depth, of his love.

Let us set our heart aright, and stretch our hands toward Him, and put away iniquity, then will our faces be without a cloud, and our feet without slipping, and the misery of the past shall be forgotten, as rivers that flow down towards the sea. Life will reach its meridian; night shall be without alarm, and men shall find in our help and consolation the supply of their lack. Be right with God, and you will be right with man, and helpful to him. The love of God welling up in the heart pours forth in refreshing streams to the world.

TUESDAY, JULY 11.—JOB XII.

There is a tone of sarcasm in Job's opening words, as though he were driven to extremities by the persistent assertions of his friends. He felt they had no right to insist upon his special sinnership, as though they were so much wiser and better than himself. Why should they make him, a man that had called upon God, their laughing-stock?

Then from men, with their false accusations and imaginings, the sufferer turns to God, and enters upon a sublime description of his Almightiness and Sovereignty. All creation is summoned to bear witness to these mighty facts of the Divine nature. Beasts, and fowls, and fish, alike attest them (7). And still further proofs are found in the history of man. God does as He will. Counsellors and judges, kings and priests, the mighty and the strong, are equally in his hand, and the differences that pertain amongst them do not avail to alter in any special degree God's treatment of them. It is in this conception of God that the patriarch finds refuge.

There is a certain unsatisfactoriness to the Christian heart in this view of suffering. It has the flavour of arbitrariness in God's actions and treatment of his people. We need to supply the further thought of the New Testament of the Father's Love, as revealed in Jesus Christ, his Son, our Lord. Add to God's Almightiness and Greatness his Love and Wisdom, bent on doing the best for each of us, through the varying circumstances of our life, and there is a foundation on which to build amid the dark swirling waters of trouble.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 12.—JOB XIII.

The sufferer turns from the attempts of his friends; he feels that they do not understand his case. They were forgers of lies and physicians of no value, who spoke unrighteously for God, and talked deceitfully for Him. Their memorable sayings were proverbs of ashes, which contained no nutriment; their defences of clay.

But from them all, he turns to God Himself in a splendid outburst of unwavering faith. (15) To trust God even when He seems intent on slaying, as Isaac must have trusted Abraham though the knife was outstretched above him; to argue in spite of appearances from the known facts of God's character: to go back on past dealings as the clue to his heart: this is the true attitude of the child who will believe anything rather than that God has swerved to the right or left from the most perfect love. If any who read these lines are passing through times of rebuke and suffering, tempted by the devil to believe that God has shut up his tender mercies, that his compassions have failed, let them take up these words, spoken so many centuries ago, and let them dare to affirm them in spite of everything that would argue to the contrary. Oh Christian soul, go through the valley of the shadow, saying aloud, Though He slay me yet will I trust in Him. Surely thou shalt come to feel true what thou only sayest to be true, and thy words will cheer another, as Faithful's did Christian.

THURSDAY, JULY 13.—JOB XIV.

Man is fragile as a flower, and transient as a shadow, but how much he is to God, since his earthly life is the vestibule of eternal existence in the home of God. To the frailty and transience of man's life we must add his sinfulness, which contaminates his holiest acts, for clean things cannot come out of unclean. But God loves us, and his grace is sufficient, and He knew our worthlessness before He set his hand to our redemption, and He will not abandon that which He has begun, however great the difficulties. This is the miracle of redeeming grace, that God can do what man cannot. He brings lilies out of muddy ponds, and saints out of Augustines.

In the beautiful similitude that follows, Job contrasts the tree which is cut down, but which sprouts through the scent of water, with man who lies down in the grave, and comes not again. He asks whether a man should live again when he has died. The glimmerings of resurrection hope, of which there are traces in other parts of this book, are struggling with contending darkness and doubt, and in sad need for that more perfect revelation which He gives who has brought life and immortality to light by his Gospel. How blessed it is to anticipate the immortality that shall greet our bliss with its everlasting kiss.

FRIDAY, JULY 14.—JOB XV.

Eliphaz begins the second cycle of talk. From the vague suggestion of special sinnership in Job, the friends now proceed to specific accusations of sins of which they suspect him. "Thou doest away with fear, and restrainest prayer before God." Even his recent speeches are quoted in evidence against him, as adding hypocrisy to his sin, because they supposed that he had claimed a sanctity which he was conscious of not possessing.

Job's friends also find fault with him for not accepting their philosophy of pain. He had dared to protest his innocence so persistently, and to question their rightness in associating special pain with special wrongdoing. This aroused their bitterest recriminations. "Art thou the first man that was born?" "Hast thou heard the secret counsel of God?" "What knowest thou that we know not?" And yet the patriarch was being taught deeper things than they guessed. Do not be afraid when God gives experiences and teachings which are unique in their character. He has a distinct and separate plan for each of us.

The picture of God riding into battle against the proud sinner is very terrible. And no doubt such things are. But we must not, consequently, infer that every one who is exposed to searching sorrow is therefore, a proud sinner. But who of us can be clean in the searching eyes of the holy God, in whose sight the heavens are impure! We can have no hope but in the blood and righteousness of Jesus.

SATURDAY, JULY 15.—JOB XVI.

Miserable comforters! Such were Job's friends. And there are very few who have learnt the Divine art of comfort. We should go to school to learn of the Comforter. He comforts in every sorrow, that we should be able to comfort others, as we ourselves have been comforted of God. Job thinks that if he had been in the place of his friends he would have been more lenient and sympathising. It is only they who have suffered that know how to deal with suffering.

Very sad are the words which follow, in which the sufferer details his anguish. To be delivered to the ungodly and made the mark of arrows, to be broken with breach on breach, to be dashed ruthlessly to the ground—such was his experience. But, ah, how much more truly these words might have been spoken by Jesus. Yet, his patience and gentleness are the more apparent by contrast, for He answered not a word. He was dumb before his shearers.

See how, after all, Job's spirit rises above all his sorrows and carries its cause into the court of heaven (19). There is one there who voucheth for us (R.V.). Our Advocate with the Father!

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

JULY 16.

PAUL AT ATHENS. Acts xvii. 22—31.

GOLDEN TEXT, John iv. 24.

BETWEEN the last lesson and this, Paul has visited Thessalonica and Berea, and in both places has founded churches of Jesus Christ. The Jews of Thessalonica not only persecuted him in their own city, but pursued him to Berea, and stirred up bitter persecution against him there (5—14). Luke appears to have been left at Philippi; for the first person "we" is dropped, and not resumed again until the Apostle reaches Philippi on his return journey (xx. 5, 6). Silas and Timothy were left at Berea (14); while Paul was taken down to the coast, and thence conveyed by ship to Athens, where he appears to have been left alone for some time (15, 16).

Athens was situated about five miles inland from the Saronic Gulf, an arm of the Ægean Sea. The Piræus was its harbour, and had been connected with the city by two long walls, broken fragments of which would be seen by Paul during his journey. The city lay between the two rivers Cephissus on the north, and Illysus on the south. The lofty peak of Lycabettus was beyond the city to the north-east, and within the city were "the Acropolis, the Areopagus, or Mars' Hill; the Pnyx, on which the assemblies of the people were held, and where Demosthenes spoke his oration; and the Museum."

The space enclosed by the first three of these hills was called the Agora, or "market" (xvii. 17). It was a beautiful and extensive square, enclosed within magnificent buildings, and adorned with numerous sculptured images. This place, as well as other parts of the city, Paul saw to be "wholly given to idolatry" (16). Temples and altars met him on every hand. "Every god in the Olympus found a place in the Agora. Every public place and building in the city was a sanctuary. And as if that were not enough, altars were erected to such abstractions as Fame, Modesty, Energy, Persuasion, and Pity."

The people were as intellectual as they were superstitious. In the Agora Paul came in contact with representatives of two schools of philosophy (18). The Stoics, founded by Zeno about 300 B.C., were practical Pantheists, who regarded God, not as a personal being, but as the rational spirit of the universe. Their creed included neither immortality nor the resurrection. Their ideal was a life of indifference either to pleasure or to pain. The tendency of this system may be judged from the fact that both Zeno and his successor Cleanthes died by their own hand. The Epicureans were founded about the same time by Epicurus. They were virtually Atheists, who, if they believed in God at all, did not regard Him as having any interest in the affairs of men. To them body and soul were so alike that at death both were dissolved, and the man ceased to be. Paul alludes to the effect of this spirit in 1 Cor. xv. 32. It led to a life of mere self-gratification. If the Gospel met the spirit of pride in the Stoics, it met the spirit of pleasure in the Epicureans.

Paul's address to the people was given upon the hill Areopagus, called Mars' Hill (22), from the temple to Mars erected there. Here, upon seats hewn out of the rock, the judges sat to decide most important questions. Below their seats was the Sanctuary of the Furies, which gave additional solemnity to the place. Paul was not brought there as a prisoner, but as one whose words had awakened much interest, and from whom they would learn more.

The address (22—31). Their own inscription (23) furnished Paul a text. It bore witness to the Athenians' desire to worship, and their ignorance of the true object of worship. This was a skilful commencement, for if they were already confessing a need, should they not welcome any instruction that would meet the need? Yet the God whom Paul declared contradicted all their notions of deity. Were such temples and altars as they had built useless in his service? God is to be known as Creator (24), as the source of all blessing (25), and as superintending and overruling all (26). National distinctions such as the Greeks claimed over the barbarians were excluded. In all his dealings with men God's aim is to bring them to seek and find Him (27). The quotation (28) is from Aratus, a Greek poet, and a native of Cilicia. Almost the same words had been repeated in a poem by Cleanthes. We must not force into these words the idea that all men are children of God in the Gospel sense. That is the privilege that results not from creation, but from being born again (Jno. i. 12, 13). The word "winked at" should be "over-looked" (30, R.V.). The aim of the address is to lead to repentance, and the argument with which the call is enforced is that God will judge men by Jesus Christ (30, 31). The thought of judgment should lead all men to repent and turn to God. How shall we meet the Judge if we do not know the Saviour?

For the Young.

A PICTURE OF A BURMAN WOMAN.

By Mrs. W. M. Lisle.

I fear few girls think of the blessings that religion has brought to our Christian country. We look about us, and never dream that all we are and all we have and all we expect is entirely the outgrowth and consequence of the nineteen centuries of Christianity that lie behind us.

It will do us good perhaps to look for a moment at our sisters over the sea, in a country that has, until the last century, been entirely shut off from all knowledge of the one true God. I would like to introduce you to a Burman woman.

She is not crippled with tiny feet like her Chinese sister; she is not condemned to a lifelong imprisonment in a Zenana as her Hindu neighbour; neither does fashion veil her face when she walks abroad, as is the custom in Turkey.

Her right to do all the hard work of the family is not questioned. She may plough the field, and plant the rice, may gather it and thresh it, may cook it, and then stand on one side, and let her husband satisfy his appetite. If any remains she may eat it alone. She may weave the cloth, and make the close jacket and grey scarf, which she drapes around her for a skirt. But the highest honour awarded her is to carry the purse; the wife has charge of the money.

Her household cares are few. The home is only one small room. Mrs. Emily Judson's pen pictures a Burman house as looking "like a last year's haystack," and very true is the resemblance. She has no furniture to be destroyed by moth and rust. A mat for a bed is all the house requires; the floor answers the purpose of chairs and tables. The rice-pot stands outside the door, and at dinner-time a little fire is built around it. From the hour a Burman girl begins to think she is taught that she is vile. When she climbs the beautiful green hills of Burma she must not let her garment touch a man; she would pollute him. Low must her head be bent in the presence of the superior sex, and only as "your servant" can she even address her husband. Even the little boys at play in the street avoid her, as though contagion, yes, the contagion of sin, was in her clothing.

Daily she must feed the many priests, but they may never look upon her, lest they be defiled; and it is an unpardonable sin for a woman to step into the shadow of a priest.

She is told she has no mind, is no better than the monkey in the tree above her; nay, the monkey may once have been a man, and so is better than she is.

The great desire, her highest ambition, is to be born into a man in the next stage of existence, and to attain this she will suffer anything. For this she makes long pilgrimages. For this she feeds the priests, even if she goes hungry herself. The little girl is taught, if she can only make nine pilgrimages to the great Pagoda of Shwaydagong in Rangoon she will surely be a man in the next state; to accomplish this is the aim of every Burman woman.

The priests taught that whoever should put a new top to the great pagoda should recover the country occupied by the English. So a number of years ago the king resolved to accomplish this object. A huge golden umbrella was to surmount this structure, and, to make it, the great sum of sixty thousand pounds were needed. The women of Burma were urged to help in this enterprise, and nobly did they respond; for were they not promised by the priests that their gifts would purchase them the end they desired? They should certainly be men in the next state. So to Rangoon the women flocked, bringing their treasures, their ear-rings, and bracelets, their gifts, small and great.

All they had they gladly poured into the great box placed to receive their offerings. But many a poor woman had no gold, nothing of value; must she be deprived of all share in this labour? No, a missionary saw a poor woman cut off her finger and fling it into the box with the jewels and gold and flowers. Another old bent woman, hardly able to move, vowed if she might only exchange her weary frame for a man's she would walk around that great square surrounding the pagoda, four long miles, seven times in one day, one burning tropical day, and before her task was accomplished, or the sun had set, the tired suffering soul was in eternity.

But if she should attain the summit of her ambition, for which she has sacrificed so much, and leave the old woman's tired body, and look out once more through the eyes of a baby boy in this green world, would that mean bliss? Far from it. For only for a few brief years would she be master, not servant, and for every sin she must pay the full price, and her next state may be that of a spider, or a dog, or even the terrible snake in the jungle, and so on and on must she go through ages upon ages of change and suffering, till the full cup is emptied, and she may sink at last into a state of utter nothingness, and be lost to all pain or pleasure for evermore.

Did the angel at the empty tomb, that Easter morning centuries ago, say to the living Marys, "Come, see the place where the Lord lay, and go quickly and tell"? Dear girls of a Christian land, whose ancestors were as vile heathens as any in Burmah to-day, if we have seen an empty tomb, and a living Saviour, are we in a hurry to "go quickly and tell," to the uttermost ends of the earth, the glad news, that thousands, yea, millions, of ears are waiting to hear?

JESUS—MY FRIEND.*

Friend. Yes that is even what Jesus the King of kings wants to be to you. You know how proud you would feel if a real live prince were to ask you to go and stay with him at his palace and treated you as one of his dearest friends. But think, I want to tell you to-day of something far more wonderful than that: Jesus the King of kings, Lord of lords, Son of God, stoops down to ask you, a little child, "Will you be my little friend?" a friend, one to whom you may go any moment and whisper all your little secrets, yes, even the things you feel you can tell to no one else. Did you imagine that Jesus would not care to enter into all your little cares and troubles? Why, little one, He wants to be such a near and dear Friend that very soon He means to ask you to go and live with Him for ever, and He will share his beautiful home and all that He has with you.

As Jesus draws near to you to-day, will you just place your hand in his and tell him you want a friend so badly, one who will never, never leave you alone, one who will never be too tired or too busy to listen to you? Ah, having a friend like this will make your life so bright and glad, and you will never, never be alone: He will always be beside you, and day by day you will grow more like Him as He holds you by the hand to keep you from stumbling and sinning. Now, dear child, what is the answer you are going to give Him to-day—Yes or No?

"I have called you friends."

A PRAYER.

Spirit Divine, thy grace impart;
With ardent zeal the Church inspire;
That love may glow, in every heart,
Fervent as with celestial fire.

Send down the wisdom from above,
First pure, then gentle, free from strife—
The gift of the Eternal Love,
The way of truth, and peace, and life.

The mysteries of grace unfold—
Hid treasures from thy sacred store;
Enrich the Church with gifts untold;
Endue her from on high with power.

Bearing the lamp of truth divine,
May she diffuse the Heavenly Light,
And through earth's mists and darkness shine,
As morning beams dispel the night.

A faithful witness may she prove
For Him who is her living Lord;
Tell of his wondrous grace and love,
Of man redeemed, a world restored.

THE GOSPEL IN HYDE PARK.

Sir,—Might I suggest that evangelists, pastors, teachers, singers, Christian workers of all kinds who can afford the time, should visit Hyde Park any of these evenings from five to ten o'clock, and I can vouch that their souls cannot help being deeply stirred with the magnitude of the sphere of work ready to hand in the teeming thousands who flock thither from all parts of London; also, at this season of the year, from all parts of the world. Surely the Churches of London might combine in a work like this, or the Y.M.C. Associations, and reap a glorious harvest.

While listening a few evenings ago near the Marble Arch to several of the speakers there, and gazing on the faces of large crowds of young men eagerly attentive to the blasphemies of the Atheist, the crude panaceas of the Socialist, or the ravings of party politicians, my heart was stirred to pity for our young men and women, whose minds are being filled with all loathsomeness, as well as corrupted by every variety of unbelief.

I ventured to accept the challenge of an atheist lecturer, and for about half-an-hour had the joy of speaking with little interruption to one of the most interesting audiences in my life. I found there at least one answer to the oft-repeated question, "How can we reach the masses?" In Hyde Park, in this glorious weather, you have masses ready to hand. Here is one of the most promising opportunities in London. Here is scope for the best talent, wit, and wisdom of our Christian teachers. Here is a rare place of exercise for the dialectic skill of our best students in the evidences of Christianity. One month's drill at the Marble Arch would marvellously improve the best sermons in our churches, would give more insight into the real battle of life and how to grapple with it, than many years' study of the Commentaries.

Further afield I saw Mr. Chas. Cook's well-known banner, and a considerable crowd surrounding it; beautiful hymns, songs, and solos were rendered with great taste and effect. Portions of Scripture were read, and short, pithy addresses delivered. Much feeling was manifest in the audience, and that night several young men followed into Hyde Park Hall who sought and found the Saviour.

From personal observation I can testify that while the masses in Hyde Park will not listen for one moment to the hackneyed platitudes which have done so much to empty our churches, they will give a patient hearing to a living, loving, sensible testimony for Christ.—Yours, etc.,

Arthur Robertson.

YOUNG ENGLISHWOMEN IN PARIS.

Daily young English and American girls arrive at the Home, having no friends in Paris and with very little money. Often they have only the address of "Miss Leigh's Homes," given to them by some fellow-traveller perhaps.

One such case came before our notice lately. In much anxiety she presented herself at 77, Avenue Wagram, wondering whether the lady in charge will take her in. The reply is "Certainly." The story of disappointment is told, a situation is sought for her, but eventually the lady in charge advises her to return to England with another girl, who has had a similar experience. These two girls were drafted on to the London Home, 22A, Queen's-road, Bayswater. The lady in charge received them at a moment's notice, until their friends could be written to, and a suitable situation found. Thus the timely help has proved an untold blessing.

It is touching to see the deep gratitude these girls show to the Homes, and to the ladies who do their utmost to lead all who come under their care to the Good Shepherd who gave his life for the sheep. If people could but realise how great this work of timely help is, we should not have to beg for means to sustain it in its integrity. £2000 is urgently needed to continue the work which has been a blessing to so many thousands of English and American girls in Paris.

MR. JOHN J. MEEK,

EVANGELIST IN THE ZULU KRAALS.

AGAIN and again in the story of missions it has been shown how men—called and chosen of God for some peculiar sphere of service—have been trained and fitted for that particular work by the whole course of earlier life and experience. When the hand of God has touched them, when they have been awakened from the death of sin, and made new creatures in Christ Jesus, then it has become evident that, even while God was not in all their thoughts, He was leading them by a way they knew not, and preparing them for the work and witness yet to come. This recognised principle finds fresh illustration in the history of an evangelist to the Zulus, who is now on a visit to this land, and who forms the subject of our present sketch.

John J. Meek was born in England, but at the age of ten was transplanted to Natal, his father emigrating with his family to South Africa, and settling on a farm with Zulus on all sides. Circumstances threw the lad among the Zulus, and for years he ran almost wild with the native boys, learning their language, ways, and habits of thought until to him these became second nature. Dr. Dalzell, of the Gordon Memorial Mission, thus sums up these early experiences:—"The country was then very different from what it is now. Elephants grazed fearlessly then where villas now stand; lions roared in what is now a crowded busy town, and a tramway now runs where as a boy of fifteen or sixteen he fled at his best pace with a female elephant at his heels. 'I was always a fleet runner,' he says, 'but I beat the record that day.' As a boy he grew up with native boys, and naturally learnt to do all they did and be what they were. He was for many years one of them, and as a consequence was regarded by most as an outcast and a lost man. . . . Thus his knowledge of the Zulu tongue is unsurpassed, as also of their rites, practices, customs, and superstitions. . . . Indeed, the natives say 'he speaks like us, he is one of us.'"

In 1865 Mr. Meek married a Zulu lady, whose position as a princess in her own land secured him great influence amongst the natives. Meanwhile he had been working from place to place, picking up a variety of useful experiences, and settling at length for some years as overseer on Bishop Colenso's farm at Bishopstowe.

In this manner thirty-nine years passed without God, and with scarcely even a rudimentary knowledge of the facts of Christianity. Now, looking back on this time, he frankly confesses that while he was kept living in a fairly honest and sober way, he was frequently conscious of a deep longing for something beyond and above himself. His inner nature was not satisfied, although he could not then understand exactly what was lacking. He hated and despised the Gospel declared by the missionaries, looking on it as fit only for women and children. In the meantime his wife had been converted to God from heathenism in a remarkable way, during a time of illness and through the instrumentality of Mrs. Colenso.

Then came the terrible days of the Zulu war, in which Mr. Meek was fully engaged—not as a combatant, but as transport rider and conductor, owing to his intimate familiarity with the country. It is noteworthy that though his experience and knowledge were unreservedly at the service of the British, he lost none of his influence and respect among the Zulus. The sad scenes of that time are deeply engraved on his memory; the weariness and woe of the few fugitives from Isandaluwana, and the cutting up of such a noble race as the Zulus really are.

So, in all nature's blindness, had God been leading and preparing him for his appointed work; and now came the time of his spiritual illumination. After leaving Bishop Colenso, Mr. Meek had settled on his own farm at Othello, Rorke's Drift. The nearest Christian European was Rev. Otto Witt, a Swedish missionary, who became greatly interested in the stalwart farmer, and sought to win him to the Saviour. "For two and a-half years," says Mr. Meek, "he kept at me, trying to persuade me. All the time I wanted to be saved in my own way, but I could not see how it was possible to be saved by the death of another. It seemed to me so strange that I would not accept it. I wanted to save myself, and I knew little of Jesus. Always the question rose in my heart: 'How can it be?' Then something Mr. Witt had said from the Bible would come to me. At last, when I was at home, Mr. Otto Witt came bringing with him a lady missionary. They sat on each side of me for about two hours, till the sun seemed to shine in, and I said, 'It must be true; God forgives for his Son's sake. It is true; God says so.' I was very dark and blind; I knew so little; but I know now that at that moment I passed from death unto life; that God had mercy on me for the sake of his Son. The burden fell, the day broke, the sun shone in, and it has kept shining ever since. Praise and bless his holy name. That was on the 26th of October, 1889."

The instant and manifest change which came over his view of the object of his existence seems very remarkable in these days, though certainly it has many examples in New Testament times. Of the way of salvation Mr. Meek knew but little, but he had found Christ, and on the very day of his conversion he testified of Him to twelve Zulus. He puts the new idea that came into his mind in this fashion:—

"I know these Zulus; I have lived among them; I love them. But they are heathen; they do not know Jesus. I must tell them. They will hear me, for they know me." So, as we have said, he started right away to speak of his newly-found peace. But although it was quite true that, knowing him, they listened willingly to what he had to say, he had yet to learn something of the depth and hardness of the human heart. So for eighteen months he laboured without evident result. The kraals were everywhere open to him, but the understandings were closed until the Spirit of God moved, and then the stubborn began to yield. Seven out of the first twelve to whom he had witnessed on the day of his conversion were led to the Saviour, and were baptized in June, 1891, the eighth (a sorceress) followed in July, and by the end of the year, a church had been formed numbering thirty-five adults, whose children came with their parents, and heard the Gospel also.

Thus devoting himself to evangelising, his farm suffered from want of attention, and had to be given up. He believed he was called of God to labour among these Zulus, and he dared not hold back. His plan of work was mainly to form classes which he taught at his own place—the theme being the Gospel—and to ride from kraal to kraal witnessing to Jesus. These rides are long and arduous undertakings, through a pathless country, full of rocks and gullies. He plans out a week's work, knowing every little Zulu farm in the whole district. Then he sends to warn those he intends visiting to be ready for him. Each day he rides as far as a good horse can go, taking each farm by the way. His Zulu runner runs on before to have the people gathered and save time. The distances vary; the difficulties of the way are often very great, the country being very rough, hence three or four kraals (and occasionally, when near together, eight) represent a toilsome day's work. The classes we have referred to are held chiefly at his own farm on the Lord's day, while the week is mainly given to kraal visitation, and two meetings held at his residence every morning and evening, each visitation meaning a simple, earnest Gospel talk and prayer, for as we have been assured by a friend, "Mr. Meek is a red-hot evangelist in Zulu, although somewhat rusty in English."

About the end of 1891 a remarkable addition was made to the infant church in the conversion of a grandfather, father and mother, and three grown sons. Mr. Meek had been dealing with the old gentleman for some time, but he seemed very dark—to him it was all so new and strange. Gradually the light broke. He was ill, prayer was made for him, God was pleased to hear. The old Zulu confessed it was of God, yielded to the Saviour, and witnessed boldly, "We belong to Christ." Then were brought in the son and his wife, and by-and-by the three fine young Zulu lads. This conversion of a whole kraal aroused fresh native interest, and led to other conversions. As the work grew, Mr. Meek's front room became too small for the Sunday service, and he cleared out his stable, turning his hard-worked horses out to rough it like himself, adapting his store-house for meeting purposes. This new hall held 200, but soon it also was too strait. The Gordon Memorial Mission, which has accepted Mr. Meek as an evangelist member, agrees that a mission hall must be put up. Mr. Meek has given ten acres of his own ground at Othello for the purpose; but £400 to £500 are wanted to erect the various buildings. For a time services have been held in the open air, but the hot sun, the heavy rains, and frequent violent thunderstorms in the country interfere with open-air work and render shelter necessary. Besides incessant evangelising, Mr. Meek, in conjunction with the Mission, is training several young Christian Zulus for the same work, while schools are also being organised. His own wife, it should be noted, is a very valuable evangelist, and is almost constantly engaged in the work among her own people with good result.

These two devoted labourers are, during their stay in this country, willing to give accounts of the work, and they have indeed a stirring story to tell. They may be communicated with, care of Miss Cutbush, 56, Norrey-road, Putney, S.W. We trust many will extend them the right hand of Christian greeting and fellowship, so that they may return to their loved service greatly strengthened and encouraged to go forward, according to Mr. Meek's firm resolve that, "God helping me, I cannot go back, I must go on. I must tell the natives, who know all about my past life, about my blessed Lord Jesus, and try and undo some of the evil that the past has wrought. If no one will help me, no matter, I will sell all I have and go on. I must go on and proclaim the Gospel till I die."

ENGLAND'S "CONSECRATION."

A REPLY FROM ST. PAUL'S.

The Ven. Archdeacon Sinclair, D.D., who has come into residence at St. Paul's for the month of July, preached in the Cathedral on Sunday afternoon, on the subject of "The One Mediator." Taking as his text 1 Tim. ii. 5, the Archdeacon said that the sole mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ between man and God was the cardinal truth of Christianity. No access to the Father could be more untrammelled, direct, complete, full, and absolute—sin being the only hindrance; and Jesus Christ was the propitiation for our sins. We need nothing more than that assurance. To that assurance nothing could be added by the prayers of her who was so highly favoured, nor of the glorious company of the apostles, nor of the noble army of martyrs. For all of these, we may be certain some fitting work is found in the land of the blessed; but in face of such divine promises there was no room for intervention, mediation, intercession on their part between us and the Head of that body of which we, like them, are the members. The endeavour to engage such advocates would, on the other hand, be disloyal. It would be distrustful of that near, complete, unhindered love of which we have the pledge. It would be putting Christ further off instead of bringing Him near. When the mother wished, in her fond anxiety, to take a part in the work of her Son on earth, he said to her with quiet decision, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" When the priest of Jupiter would have done sacrifice at Lystra with the Apostles Paul and Barnabas, what did they say? "They rent their clothes, and ran in among the people, and said, Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are men of like passions with you." "See that thou do it not," said St. John when the glorified elder would have worshipped him, "I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus; worship God!"

If the primitive Church had allowed the Christian martyrs to give the same homage which a certain section of Christians now give to saints and angels, it might have been argued in the same way that they were not interfering with the supreme honour of God, and they might have escaped. Not only that, but the primitive Church repudiated the worship of saints, and angels in particular, and distinctly condemned it as idolatry. For 300 years after Christ there cannot be produced out of the genuine writings of one ancient father one clear testimony for the invocation of saints or angels. It was in the fourth century, when the Church was recognised by the Emperors, and no longer suffered the wholesome discipline of persecution, that she began to lose the simplicity of the Gospel. We begin to see the asserted superiority of the clergy over the laity, the undue exaltation of the episcopal order, the germs of the supremacy of the Roman See, the unwise privileges and exemptions of the clerical order, the practice of hunting gifts and legacies, the encouragement of clerical celibacy as a state of higher sanctity, the fierceness and almost incredible extravagances of monasticism, the exaggerated devotion to the mother of our Lord. And it was in this century that we first find traces of the invocation of saints, the two eminent and holy men in particular to whom the innovation was owing being Gregory Nazianzen and Basil.

It was at this time that patron saints began to be selected. Ambrose is the earliest witness to the fact, when in A.D. 385 he calls Gervasius and Protasius the patrons of the orthodox at Milan. The usage was much extended by the Gallican poet Paulinus. It was taken up by another poet, Prudentius. Then it began to spread. The possession of a relic was thought to give a right to the patronage of the saint. About A.D. 600 Theodelinda built a church near Milan in honour of John the Baptist, that he might be an intercessor for her husband and children. In the fifth century, Leo the Great, Bishop of Rome, declared St. Peter and St. Paul to be the special patrons of Rome. Other consecrations and developments marked the same period. The idea of a female mediator performing in a higher world offices akin to those labours of mercy and intercession which befit the feminine character on earth, was one which the mind of mankind was ready to receive; and this idea of "Blessed Mary" was welcomed as a substitute for some other ideas that had been lost by the fall of polytheism, with its host of female deities. The pagan superstitions connected with growing departure from Scripture and the primitive Church rapidly increased. Basil calls the saints "Helpers of Prayer." Leo exhorts the people of Rome to keep vigil in St. Peter's. Paulinus tells of a rustic, who had lost two oxen by theft, instead of pursuing the robbers, flying at once to the Church of St. Felix, whom he declared responsible for their restoration. Theodoret says that Christians made a point of giving the appellations of the martyrs to their children, by that means procuring for them safety and guardianship.

Still more alien from the spirit and faith of the Gospel was the dependence placed on the patron saint for protection from the consequences of sin, even at the day of judgment. Prudentius, the unfortunate poet, actually declared that he desired to be placed on the left hand of the Judge in order that the martyr Romanus might come to his rescue at that awful moment! To such a pitch of impious extravagance even at that early period were men led by the incautious words and the improper licence of the Christian poets.

The preacher concluded:—And to our dear brothers of the Roman persuasion, to whom the unbroken development of the Church is of greater consequence than the plain teaching of the Son of God, and to whom the tradition of 1,500 years (whatever its origin) is very dear, we would say this: Oh, think once more of the way in which you are walking! Christ never guaranteed even his disciples against error. They thought St. John would never die. They thought the Lord would come to judgment in their own lifetime. It is not only the authority of the body to which you belong that is of importance, but the accordance of the truth that you hold with the teaching of the Son of God. The Jewish Church was splendidly and magnificently continuous; they had Abraham to their father, yet they crucified Christ. When you talk with such hope and confidence of converting us, is it not a duty of Christian humility, in the face of such strong contradictions as those of which you cannot but be aware, to ask yourselves whether you too may not have been misled? Mistakes have been made by all of us in our time. This access of pagan influences in the fourth century, is it not worth inquiry? Will you not this day join us, laying aside all prepossession and prejudice, in praying the Holy Spirit once more to take us into his own hands and guide us into all truth?—Daily Chronicle.

Crews Ashore in London.

The Destitute Sailors' Asylum, built sixty-six years ago, in Well-street, London Docks, at a cost of £2000, has been leased as one of the branch Missions to Seamen Institutes contemplated for the Port of London. It is situated near to where the principal shipping offices of the Board of Trade are about to be moved at the Sailors' Home, and to the Shipwrecked Mariners Society's offices, places much frequented by crews of all nationalities in large numbers.

Whilst the Missions to Seamen has seventy-two Churches, Institutes, or Mission-rooms in use in provincial seaports or abroad, this is the first building it has acquired for the Port of London.

The Mildmay Conference.

of what He in his mercy has felt towards us. We must have been struck with the fact that in those passages in Romans to which our Chairman referred, while in each of them Christ Jesus is the central thought of God and the Person round whom all is gathered, yet we, the Church, the saints of God, are the very persons for whom all the glorification of Christ is to take place.

Let us ask ourselves what are the great purposes of God in Christ Jesus. "I and My Father are one," said the blessed Lord. When Christ Jesus spoke of his unity with his Father, our minds would turn perhaps to the unity of being, of prospect, and of power. But have we ever thought of the wondrous unity of purpose which Christ seems to put forward in these words? As one thought He thought for the other; and as the other thought He thought for the first, if we may dare to separate them in being, when we consider their deity and humanity. As God thought for Christ and thought of Him, as far as He deigned to reveal Himself, Christ came down from heaven that He might be the Saviour of the human race above all other races that exist in the universe. When Christ thought of God He thought, we believe, from what He has told us, how God should be glorified in this perfected human race. So God and Christ are one in their purpose; and the only question of true import to our souls to-day is this—Are we to be one with Christ in his thought, that we may be one with God through all eternity in his thought? Remember this, that Christ Jesus died the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God; and it is when we go back to God in Christ that we are enabled to think of humanity as we ought.

Why are men doing so little for their fellows? Why is the Church hugging itself to sleep in too many cases? Why are there so many conventions and conferences; the same people present many times a year—for the Church as it seems to me? For this reason, that the devil perverts every blessing that God gives. A few years ago God stirred the churches to think upon the subject of holiness. Men gathered together for conference, yearning for the truths of God in Christ Jesus. Now the danger is, that men may settle down to eat and drink of the provision of God, forgetting that when we are saved we are sent back to the world to be a blessing to others.

It is a very blessed thought in looking at the three texts given in the syllabus for our consideration this morning, that each of them has in it a manifestation of God's infinite love towards humanity, and at the same time lifts us essentially towards God. Take the first, "That in all things He might have the pre-eminence" (Col. i. 18). Has God had the pre-eminence? The word used here is a remarkable one. It occurs nowhere else in the Bible, and there is a difficulty in the minds of commentators as to its special force. Some say it is a word of time; others think it is a word of power. I think it involves both, and that when it is said concerning the Lord Jesus that He may be acknowledged or recognised as "the firstling" in all things, the intention is to magnify Christ both in regard to time and position. The purpose of God is that his Son Christ Jesus should be known as the very centre and also as the fountain-head of all that is known by the name of authority in regard to things that are called creation.

If you look into the passage you will be struck by the fact that from verse 16 to verse 20 there are no less than seven descriptions of "all things." What a wonderful picture is here of universality. And what is this universality? The pre-eminence of Christ Jesus, as the fountain-head or source of all creation, all authority, all dominion, throughout all eternity. No less than twelve times in these five verses do you find the Greek expressing the word Him or He. It is very remarkable, because it is not usual in ordinary Greek to express the person by the pronoun. God's purpose in Christ Jesus, therefore, is that He should be known from all eternity as the very centre of all existences.

And it is not only in the past eternity. There comes a time in which the Lord Jesus Christ is the first to descend. No one descended until Christ came from the throne of God; He allowed Himself to become incarnate among a sinful race of men. Then He was the first who ever kept God's holy Law, the first who ever was raised up by the glory of God the Father, and the first who ever carried up to the throne of God our humanity in splendid perfection. And now, at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty on high, He has in God's purpose the pre-eminence over all things. He is resting, we are told—waiting till his enemies be made his footstool; but God's purpose is that He should be acknowledged as Lord of all. We wait for the time—would God it were to-day—when the Christ of God, at the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, shall leave the throne where He is resting, and shall take his great power and reign. Then we shall hear the voice saying, "Behold, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ." He shall take the throne which God has given Him; He shall appear in his own glory, in the glory of his Father, and of his holy angels. Is that a theoretical and abstract subject? Is it not the very moment for which the Church of God is aspiring; for which the whole creation groans and travails in pain together until now? If that voice were heard this morning, would it be good news to every soul in this hall? Then shall He have the pre-eminence indeed.

But it cannot be until the Church upon earth begins to give Him as she should the pre-eminence in all things now and evermore. I know few subjects so practical as when we come to ask ourselves—"Is the eternal purpose of God in Christ Jesus being fulfilled to-day in regard to my soul, my life, my all?" It is well to sing hymns and say sweet things before God; as against the so-called saint if there be no truth in the utterance. So God claims, not by law, but by the whole force of gratitude and love that ought to stir the hearts of his people, that the life, the soul, the power, the wealth, the all of a man should be yielded to Christ Jesus this day before the astonished world, that they shall be compelled to acknowledge that God is in them of a truth. We ask what is wanted to-day, and the answer is this—a consecrated body of believers for Christ's glory; and that the purpose of God should be so felt in the Church, that when men look at us they should say by necessity (here it is compulsion) that our Christ is not like the other gods and lords that hold authority over men.

BUT GOD REGISTERS EVERY ONE OF THEM

Would you answer the scientific disturber of our peace, the rejector of Him whom you call your Lord and Christ? All that men say about evolution and about matter is simply to be answered by the dominion of Christ in and through the lives of his people. Would you answer to-day the Biblical critic who overthrows the Book your soul delights in? You have simply to give Christ his pre-eminence in all things, and men shall be compelled to acknowledge that God is in us and Christ is Lord. Would you answer to-day the haughty demand of the Pope of Rome and his emissary Cardinal Vaughan, who, as I passed Brompton Oratory just now, was gathering his crowds to dedicate our free land of England to St. Peter and the Virgin? You can never answer tradition, and the claims of a system such as Rome, except by the influence that comes from those who are in sympathy with the eternal purpose of God in Christ Jesus. That purpose is that Christ should have the pre-eminence—not Peter or Mary, or mind or matter. The answer to all these is to be given by simply fulfilling God's purpose that in all things Christ should have the pre-eminence. He will have it as the body of believers lifts up its head, because its redemption draweth nigh, and watches and waits and works and walks as God would have his believing Church do.

Let us turn to the second passage: "That in the dispensation of the fulness of time He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth" (Col. i. 10). What shall we say concerning this purpose? As we put forth our theories with respect to it doctrinally, men say, and perhaps justly: "I have no power or time to weigh these theological arguments and considerations." If I understand this glorious picture aright, it means that as all dominion is to be given to Christ Jesus, and the Church is to share that dominion, so here all life and power are to be centred or headed up in Christ Jesus. If we look around and ask as to the lack of life, what shall we say? How death reigns still! How death commands, how death terrifies, and how death absorbs the unwilling attention of the human race. How the cry goes up from every heart, "Oh, wretched manhood! who shall deliver us from the body of this death?" I thank God, says the apostle, through Jesus Christ our Lord. And I thank God for this glorious promise, that in Christ Jesus all things that exist in the earth are to be headed up, so that He shall be the very centre and supply of life. When we talk of physical life and mental life and moral life and spiritual life, we sever, as it were, the departments of man's being. Then we sever the existences in creation the one from the other. But in the purpose of God there is to be no life hereafter

OF ANY KIND BUT THE CHRIST LIFE.

From the blade of grass and the rippling water, so far as it may be said to have life at all, up to the highest angel and archangel; with all the intermediate existences, from the lowest to the highest—from the limpet to the eagle; from the just-born babe to the very highest specimen of human nature that ever lived—all alike, material and spiritual, all classes of life that we denominate life at all, shall have their existence and be summed up and headed up into Christ Jesus the Lord; and He shall be glorified of God as one Life for the universe.

Oh, blessed picture! Is it theoretical or practical? Why surely, as we ought to be giving Christ Jesus the pre-eminence of dominion, authority and power, so we ought to realise that Christ Jesus is our life. "My life is hid with Christ in God." The Apostle says still more strongly, "To me to live is Christ." Every atom even of my physical life now should be Christ's. No wonder that Paul says: "Glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are his." No wonder he calls on the pleasure-loving Romans to render their creature existence as it were, to God, and give themselves a living sacrifice to God. I would ask tenderly, but firmly, What are many of those who think of giving their spirits to God, doing with their bodies? Is not "London Society" too often largely made up of those who are known as the saints of God? On Tuesday you heard that the "Christian world" is a paradox; but what shall we say of the worldly Christian? What of the men to whom life means getting as much out of Christ as they can; of young people coming to the minister at confirmation, and asking so plaintively, "Must I give up everything? May I have none of my little pleasures if I say I am Christ's?" What we need to-day is a body of believers who realise that life is no life except in Christ; that to exist is misery, except as we exist for Christ. What means that wonderful picture of creation which the Apostle gives in Col. i.—In Him were all things created; through Him were all things created; unto Him were all things created? Then for God's sake, as you claim to be a new creation, remember the words: "If I have known Christ after the flesh, henceforth know I Him no more."

One step further: "That in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Jesus Christ" (Eph. ii. 7). I love that word—the "kindness" of God. Christ came to tell God's character; to make us know God. Exactly as we are being lifted up to the very apex, which is Christ in God, and God in Christ, so we come back as it were from God to man. Through all eternity in the past God's kindness was sending forth

PRELIMINARY BEAMS OF GRACE.

We hear of the time it takes for a ray of light to touch the earth. How long it took for the beams of God's grace and kindness in Christ Jesus to touch the earth we cannot tell. All we know is that in the fulness of the time God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, and grace began to be revealed in Christ Jesus. We think too much of grace in a limited way, as though it referred only to pardon of sin, and acceptance in the person of Christ, through the blood of the cross. Remember there is grace for the past, but there is also grace for the present, in the Christ life. "My grace is sufficient." I have learned much from that word is. God's grace is sufficient for the present battle and distress.

But what of the future? What means Peter when he says: "Gird up the loins of your mind, and hope for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation (or apocalypse) of Jesus Christ"? I know there is a disputed reading, but I affirm my own conviction that it looks forward to the coming of Christ as the full revelation of grace all through eternity. When the top stone comes to be revealed there will be one everlasting song, "Grace, grace unto it." We are called now to take up that blessed song, and to realise the meaning of this wondrous word grace which occurs a hundred and fifty times in the New Testament. Shall we not go from this gathering feeling more than ever our responsibility, while this present age lasts, to make known the exceeding riches of the grace of God which He has shown in his kindness?

Oh brethren, are you kind? There are plenty of doctrinal Christians to-day; the churches are split into groups. As a consequence they are too often split up in their service; they carry none of the consolations of God to the world, because of the asperities with which they dogmatise upon their particular "isms." I do not know, my "Church" brother, if you are sitting this morning next to a Baptist; I do not know if a Wesleyan is side by side with a Presbyterian. But I do know this, that where grace is the centre of all that we hope and desire, the "isms" of men go right away out of sight, and God is glorified.

I close like the Apostle Paul when he came to the climax of his doctrine in writing to the Romans, and broke out into practical exhortation: "Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments (or purposes) and his ways past finding out. For who hath known the mind of the Lord? Or who hath been his counsellor? Or who hath first given to Him and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things; to whom be glory for ever. Amen."

Afternoon Gatherings.

GOSPEL LIGHT FOR ISRAEL.

The progress and prospects of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews occupied the attention of a full meeting in the large hall on Tuesday afternoon. Mr. T. A. Denny presided, and spoke about the remarkable way in which the people, anciently favoured of God, are crowding back to Palestine. He read several striking and appropriate Scriptures, and showed that the veil upon Jewish hearts, hindering the recognition of Jesus Christ as their true Messiah, is the primary cause of all their trouble.

Mr. Albert Day, a graduate of Cambridge and Berlin Universities, prefacing his address, as did subsequent speakers, with fervent prayer, narrated some experiences of a three months' continental tour which he had taken with Mr. Samuel Wilkinson, and the greater part of which had been spent in Germany, where the tourists had visited some eighteen towns, preaching the Gospel to the Jews and stirring up native Christians to increased interest in the souls of their Israelitish neighbours. Starting from Berlin, the travellers held meetings in one or two towns on the way to Breslau, where a long stay was made, and much good work was done for the Master. It was delightful to find Miss Sargisson there, doing much in a quiet way to influence young Jewish folk for Christ, through the attraction of much sought lessons in English, combined with social intercourse at this lady's residence. Unexpected fruit in the conversion of a young Jew resulted from a Sunday morning address by Mr. Samuel Wilkinson in the Presbyterian Church. Here there were also very happy English meetings, attended, on one occasion, by the United States Consul, among others. At Dresden some large meetings were held in the Methodist Chapel, there being over fifty Jews present one Sunday evening, most of whom accepted a New Testament on leaving. After contending with Press misrepresentation at Boyton, the evangelists met with much encouragement in connection with a meeting in the public hall at Posen, though the advantage of local support was here lacking. At Konigsberg Mr. Day separated from his companion, and after some meetings in East Russia, rejoined him in Berlin, where their tour closed with a week's meetings, the last of which, a farewell gathering, was convened in the buildings of the Y.M.C.A. by Lutheran friends, this large gathering of German Christians affording an opportunity for some words against the prevalent anti-Semitism. Mr. Day felt that God had been with them throughout their travels, and they had full confidence that He would bless their sowing of his own Word.

Mr. Samuel Wilkinson said that out of three months he had spent only fourteen days in Russia, so that his experience of that country had been very short, but it had sufficed to send him home to England with a very heavy burden about the land which he had visited, where all the Jews are in a miserable condition outwardly and in a hopeless state spiritually. They are found to the number of five millions, shut up to themselves within the pale of settlement, with its twenty-six provinces, and which, though only a small part of the enormous empire, is as big as six Englands. Without discussing the causes, political or otherwise, of the widespread misery which abounds, the facts are patent enough, aggravated as they are by the gross spiritual darkness which has prevailed for centuries through the exclusive action of the Greek Church. But about six years ago God's light was let in through the inauguration by Rev. John Wilkinson of the distribution of Hebrew New Testaments and portions, which has continued and increased ever since, with much acceptance to the people, and with undoubted fruit unto God. Moreover, six months ago, in a most remarkable way, God laid the condition of the Jews in Russia upon the heart of a Greek Church dignitary, who, seeing the English action in the circulation of the Scriptures, appointed a missionary to the Jews from the orthodox national Church of Russia. The latter found that Church's forms and ceremonies unintelligible to those among whom he moved. On this report the dignitary aforesaid had instructions drawn up which, in effect, provided that nothing but the simple Gospel should be preached by his missionary among the people. And, whereas it was once necessary to get permission from the governor of each province, in order to open preaching of the Gospel, it is now only needful when coming into a town for that purpose, to submit our papers to the local police. The way in which the light is thus being let in, should stir Christian hearts to pray for increased liberty of utterance and wider spread of the truth. Among these five millions of Jews the Mildmay Mission has only five or six agents; while of other societies' workers, it is doubtful whether there are more than twenty-five; but, suppose there are fifty, this is only one missionary to every one hundred thousand Jews. The difficulties in the way of English workers entering Russian work seem insuperable, but in answer to prayer God can raise up in Russia itself earnest men, full of the Holy Ghost, to preach the Gospel among these benighted millions. In closing, Mr. Wilkinson described the spirit of intense expectation which reigns in the minds of godly Russian workers with whom he had converse, their earnest longing that the Holy Ghost may be poured out in rich measure upon themselves, and their fervent hope that increased interest and practical sympathy may be stirred in enlightened Christian England concerning the pressing spiritual necessities of dark Russia.

Rev. John Wilkinson began with a few words of affectionate hope concerning his beloved son's present and future part in the work which has engaged the venerable father's energies for so many years. He also mentioned that Mr. Day had come into the work through a drawing-room meeting in Brighton. Recent events in Russia, he said, may well encourage the hope that if the Church of God betakes itself to strong and earnest prayer, there may be in Russia the mightiest movement of the Holy Ghost which has been witnessed since Pentecost. He was inclined to think that the dispensation will close as it opened, in thousands of Jews flocking to Jesus, and justifying the sharpest judgments of God upon an apostate Christendom. The missionary employed in boarding vessels with Jewish refugees, reaching Gravesend and Tilbury from Hamburg, had seen a degree of poverty and wretchedness which was indescribable. Through the unsolicited kindness of Christian friends, the Mission had been able to provide 20,000 meals in ten months. A large hall off Whitechapel-road was opened last November, with five floors and forty-one rooms nearly all appropriated. There has been, too, an extensive distribution of garments made by the loving wielders of busy needles; and the recipients of these and other benefits are plainly told that the liberal kindness shown them comes from love to Jesus. Many a poor Jew has tearfully said, "Oh! bless these dear Christians in England who are so kind to us in our wretchedness and poverty." Mr. Wilkinson told how the Testament and portions distributed had far exceeded his original thought and mentioned his hope of establishing new centres of work in connection with his mission for the whole Eastern world and for North and South America, London remaining the centre for Europe. Thus the whole world of Jews might be evangelised, so that God might work through them upon the Gentiles. n conclusion, he commended to his hearers two statements for prayerful thought. With the Bible in his hands and with facts before his eyes, he was ready to go on testifying until he met his Lord, that there is no hope for the evangelisation of the world without the agency of the converted Jew, and that the world will never be covered with Bibles through sales. "Freely ye have received," freely sell? Nay, "freely give."

At the close of the address a further half-hour or so was devoted to special prayer for Israel.

MEDICAL MISSIONS.

The South Tent was crowded on the first afternoon by those interested in the subject of Medical Missions at home and abroad.

Dr. J. L. Maxwell, who presided, rejoiced in the great missionary revival, and particularly in the re-discovery of the value of medical missions. With regard to this special form of missionary effort, he maintained that the great and pressing need is the multiplication of labourers. There are at present about 350 fully-qualified medical missionaries in the foreign field, but this number ought speedily to be largely augmented. Earnest prayer should be made that many more may be thrust forth into the harvest field. Pains should be taken to bring the claims of Medical Missions before the young men and women now in the medical schools. Further, the Chairman called attention with thankfulness to the efforts being made in India and China in the way of training natives for Medical Mission service. He closed with a touching reference to the death of Dr. Walfridsson, of the Congo Mission—the first man to go from the London Medical Missionary Association.

Dr. Gauld gave an account of the Medical Mission work carried on in connection with Mildmay. Having referred to the Nursing Institutions, and the labours of the deaconesses in Jaffa, Hebron, Cyprus, and elsewhere, he mentioned the Medical Mission branches at Old Ford and Walworth, the Cottage Hospital in the Conference Hall grounds, and the Convalescent Home at Barnet. But his chief theme was the Bethnal Green Medical Mission Hospital, and on this he enlarged, giving various cases in illustration, and dwelling on the large opportunities of service presented in the new Hospital. He trusted the sympathies of many would be awakened in support of this noble work in a needy district.

Dr. Crabb followed with an account of seventeen years' medical missionary labour in Birmingham. During the past year from five to six thousand persons have been treated in the mission, many of them repeatedly. The work goes on, either at the centre or in one of the branches, five days a week, and the result has been most delightful. Thousands have heard the Gospel who otherwise would have remained fast bound in prejudice. The workers in the mission are nearly all spiritual children thereof; and they not only work but they also give largely in proportion to their means. Illustrating the spirit animating many of these, Dr. Crabb told of one poor man who quite lately was crushed fearfully. His first words when he recovered consciousness were "All is well, underneath are the everlasting arms," and his last, ere he passed away, were "His banner over me is love."

Dr. Harry Guinness led the thoughts of his hearers away from London and Birmingham to Central Africa, and urged the needs of the dying millions on the Congo. Medical missionaries are wanted out there—first for the heathen, and second for the sake of the missionaries themselves, exposed to a new and trying climate, and often without medical aid in time of need. While a firm believer in the necessity for fully-qualified medical missionaries, the speaker maintained that every missionary should be equipped with some knowledge of medicine—for his or her own safety, and for the benefit of the natives. As a matter of fact, a missionary in such lands has to do something somehow for sick and injured people, the common idea being that the white man (or woman either, for that part) can help at such times. Therefore, while fully-qualified medical missionaries ought to be sent wherever possible, every means should also be used to furnish all missionaries with some elementary acquaintance with the use of drugs in case of emergency. In order to meet this need it is proposed to found the Livingstone College, at 51, Bow-road, E.

REPORTS OF WORK.

The rain interfered somewhat with the first of the meetings under the mulberry tree, on Tuesday afternoon. About 150 friends, however, gathered to listen to "reports of Christian work."

Mr. ISAACS gave an account of the work at the Sailors' Rest, Ratcliff Highway, and interested the audience in the work being done among the sailors of many nations. Mr. W. H. SEAGRAM spoke of the success accomplished by the Railway Mission, and cited some illustrations of men who had been converted through its agency. A clergyman told of the good influence of the Y.W.C.A., and mentioned that his best workers were members of that institution. There were fifty members of the Y.W.C.A. at work as missionaries in China alone. Following this account came a report of work among factory girls, and very cheering news was brought of the good done in this very arduous sphere of Christian service. Miss GRUNDBERG, from St. Petersburg, gave a most interesting account of meetings held, and homes formed for girls and babies in that city.

The friends were privileged also to hear a most touching account of the St. Giles' Christian Mission from Mr. WHEATLEY, who rightly said "discharged prisoners are not necessarily discharged criminals." Some idea of the usefulness of the mission may be gained from the fact that 500 boys have, through Mr. Wheatley's work, been dealt with under the First Offenders Act, and discharged to his care. A hundred and fifty boys are now in the Homes, and there is room for seventy more. Every discharged prisoner is invited to breakfast by the Mission, and almost every judge on the criminal bench and every magistrate in the police courts, are prepared to tell of the worth of this Mission. One of the most useful of the many branches of the work is the visiting of the wives and children (at their homes) of men who are in prison. Several ladies are giving their time to this work; and sewing machines and mangles are lent by the Mission to help these poor tired ones. Mr. Wheatley told of a man who was tried for his life; sentenced to death; but who to-day is doing noble Christian work in the Seven Dials.

The rain became so heavy as to necessitate the closing of the meeting, which though not large, was most interesting.

THE GOSPEL ABROAD.

A glimpse of foreign missions was afforded by Wednesday afternoon's meeting in the large hall, and, judging by the very full attendance, much interest was felt in the operations of the various agencies represented. After Rev. Dr. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS had opened with prayer, Mr. J. E. MATHIESON, who occupied the chair, read from Matthew xx., about the eleventh hour labourers, and from that subject, in connection with the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, he derived incentives to increased diligence, earnestness, prayer, and humiliation before God, on the part of Christian workers. He remarked that Rev. J. G. Paton, of the New Hebrides, had not arrived in England in time to be present with them on that occasion, but it was hoped he would reach London in the autumn.

Rev. J. HUDSON TAYLOR said they were met not so much for information as in hope that the Spirit of God might apply in power to their hearts what they already knew. Some of those who had really seen the need abroad were almost appalled in view of the numbers gathered at home conferences, and the question arose: What are we all doing here while there are societies possessed of money but without men, and other organisations able to lay their hands upon willing men, but straitened for funds? Taking a rapid review of the tardy inception and undermanned condition of foreign missions generally, it was wonderful what God had done among the heathen. Jesus is a King coming to reckon with his servants very soon; but does that fact affect our banking accounts, or prevent us from making the world infidel by our unreality? God has been rebuking by financial loss those who forget to bring his tithes into the storehouse. There is need for a larger proportion of young Christians to be giving themselves to God for the heathen. In Tibet the heathen think it a disgrace if at least one son of each family is not devoted to the priestly office, and supported therein by the family from which he comes. Unless China's open door is promptly entered with the Gospel, it seems very probable that, should the Lord tarry, it will not be open in five years' time; seeing that, in America and in our own colonies, the Chinese are meeting with difficulties which may lead to retaliation. In spite of increased hostility to missionaries on the part of the governing class of China, the Spirit of God has been poured out there very gloriously within the last year or two. At a meeting in one Chinese city, where representatives of five Missions were present seeking an outpouring of the Holy Spirit, everyone was consciously filled; so that one expects to hear of much blessing and trial following. With a passing reference to England's lamentable complicity in the opium iniquity, Mr. Taylor closed his eloquent address with a prayer that God would make his hearers honest in answering the question whether each one is doing all he can in obedience to the command of the coming One about the Gospel for every creature.

Mr. EUGENE STOCK had lately been in three places where he had found the coming of the Lord made prominent. He graphically pictured the mud walls and floor and the thatched roof of a church building occupied by some thirty converted lepers, in a remote North Indian village. He asked them by interpretation, "Do you think the Lord Jesus Christ will come to-day?" following other questions on that blessed event. The reply was, "We don't know, but we hope so." They might indeed hope so, for it was a real thing to them. The second place was a range of low buildings in the heart of an Indian city, with some half-dozen missionary ladies engaged in the activities of school, hospital, and dispensary, with the motto on the wall, "The Lord is at hand." They, too, have a right to look forward to their Lord's coming, seeing that they are doing all they can to bring Him back. The third place is the Hall in which we are assembled, with its days of prayer, song, and speech about the Lord's return. But what are we who are assembled here doing to hasten that coming? True, the Lord is coming to an unconverted world, but the called-out Church has to be gathered; and with tribes, nations, multitudes, in Central Africa, in the heart of Arabia, in Tibet, in Central Asia, in India, in China, and in the Islands of the Sea, who are we that we should assert that there are none of the elect to be gathered in from those lands? How would it be possible to explain our inactivity to the leper church. But what an abundant reward the Lord gives to those who do carry out his command. It was beautiful to hear in India Mildmay hymns sung in language after language in various districts. It is cheering, too, to find a whole family of Christian workers scattered in various spheres of service for God, the children of a man who some fifty years ago was a lad in a mission school. Instead of singing "Where are the reapers?" we ought to be bowing our heads in humiliation. An invalid lady, lying on a couch, rebuked Mr. Stock for making certain excuses on behalf of those who do not go out to the foreign mission field. She has a right to speak, said he, for she is sparing her husband, son, and daughter, for India, while she remains on her couch at home, praying for them. She said that the Bible order was reversed by one of the excuses, in that there were, comparatively speaking, thousands on the mountain praying for the three who entered the valley to fight the Amalekites. Her husband, in deprecating another excuse, pointed out that the prayer to the Lord of the harvest was enjoined upon men who were themselves missionaries, and not upon stay-at-homes. If, said Mr. Stock, concluding his address, in answer to our question, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? He puts obstacles in the way of our entry into the foreign field of toil, there are means by which we may still render very effective service to the cause of missions while we remain at home; but alas! to many of us the latter things are impossible, because we have not taken the first step of placing ourselves unreservedly at the disposal of our Lord.

Lord RADSTOCK testified that his travels in India had shown at least widespread aspirations after the supernatural on the part of the people.

Having to leave the meeting at this point, Rev. Dr. PENTECOST spoke a few words in introduction and strong commendation of a cultured and high-class Japanese lady, who had visited America, as a philanthropist, to study methods of education for the benefit of her countrywomen. While there she was converted to God, and consequently returns to her native land with the higher aim of bringing the Gospel to bear upon her own class, which class is inaccessible to the influence of English and American missionaries.

Before the lady spoke, however, Mr. EDWARD GLENNY was introduced to advocate the claims of Africa, the nearest mission field to this country, outside Christendom. The more particularly associated with work in the north of that continent, he dealt with it as a whole. First came a comparison of its vast area, comprising many districts without a single missionary, with the comparatively small home districts, upon which are lavished large sums of money and much effort, and this through many organisations, where one might effectively do the work. Then there was the variety of population, including the Jew and the large, motley aggregations of Greeks, Italians, French, English, and others, who are sunk in the grossest immorality, with the vast bulk of the inhabitants, the heathen, in the Congo, the Soudan, and the greater part of Southern Africa. The few labourers, too, beset with many physical as well as awful spiritual difficulties. It is often asked whether Africa, with its fifty millions of Mahommedans, is to become a Moslem or a Christian country; for the difficulty is that the vices of heathendom have a nominally Divine sanction under Mahommedanism. Cost what it may in precious lives, in sacrifice of gold or of blood, the great commission concerning the Gospel for every creature must be obeyed. Are we prepared to embrace a Christianity which goes beyond the drawing-room and Exeter Hall? It would not be right to ignore what has been done in Africa; but the great bulk of the continent is still in utter darkness; and the fact of blessing having been given, should be an incentive to further effort. In view of the future, we have to recognise individual responsibility. So many wait for others to do something; while the word is, What wouldst Thou have me to do? We believe also in united action; for unity is strength. When one here and another there feels that something must be done, God will, in all probability, bring them together. From various parts of the Moslem world, by some regarded as a hopeless field for evangelisation, come encouraging information of Mahommedans turned to Christ; for, there is less fanaticism and more readiness to hear than formerly. God grant that realisation of personal responsibility may lead to united action for putting God's command into practice.

Madame TEL SONO, the Japanese lady already referred to, gave broken but moving utterance to words which, in effect, covered the facts mentioned in Dr. Pentecost's introduction. The Lord had, she said, wonderfully blessed her in America, and had now brought her to London that she might raise the remainder (£250) of the sum needed for the erection and furnishing of her projected school in Japan. Entering upon interesting personal particulars, she stated that her father had never followed the custom of idol worship which is common in her country. Then followed a vivid and affecting description of her inquiries after the true God, and the striking answer which He gave to her supplications for the restoration of her father from a dangerous illness. She besought the prayers of her hearers, and intimated that Dr. Pentecost would receive contributions for her special work.

HOW TO WIN SOULS.

Many evangelists, and other soul-winners, gathered in the tent on Wednesday afternoon anxious to learn how to be more useful in their work. Dr. PENTECOST opened with instructive words. He said: It takes a wise man to win a soul; one talent in particular is wanted to be a soul-winner: you must be a soul-lover. We are not to love a man's clothes, nor his house, nor the subscriptions he may give after his conversion, but his soul. "God so loved that He gave." We are to love, not with human love, for that will not love the unlovely; but with Divine love, the love of Christ constraining us.

Mr. ROBERT BURN said God takes up men we should pass by. He told of a most unlikely young man in a public office who had been instrumental in the conversion of many others in the same institution; he mentioned another case of a young fellow who came to him, "an awkward clumsy young man, whom I put in the background," but whom God brought to the front; who went away into the country and opened a chapel, and who has been greatly blessed."

Mr. KENNEDY, of Exeter Hall, next spoke. The Lord has need of all classes as his message-bearers; individual work is the secret of successful work, and it is good to form a bond of union or sympathy with the soul you are seeking to win. We must be careful also to dwell on the love of God. One friend said, "I could have resisted God's wrath all my life, but his love has broken my heart."

Mr. W. R. LANE followed with a short word from 1 Peter iii. 1, "without the word be won by the conversation," remarking that the old English word conversation meant behaviour. Often what we have said is spoilt by what we have done; but "by well-doing we are to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men."

Pastor Fuller Gooch remarked that it stands to reason that if more souls are to be won there must be more soul-winners. There are thousands who sit to hear, who should rise to serve. The end of a Christian life should be not simply "to support a minister," but to become a minister oneself. It is often because we have not enough of Christ in us that we do not more often give out; if we go away with more Christ in us there will be more of Christ through us to give out.

Dr. McKilliam told of a lady who was asked if she "ever spoke to any one about Jesus?" and who replied, "No, certainly not. I have my own duties to perform, and I pay my clergyman liberally to do that sort of thing."

Mr. Mallinson, of Staines, spoke on the clearness of the Word in giving us directions "how to win souls." "Preach the old Gospel," said this young evangelist, "and the voice of Jesus, sweeter than a woman's, gentler than a child's, and more entrancing than a nightingale's song, will lead the wanderer home."

Mr. Henry Thorne followed with an exhortation to continuance in prayer. Mr. J. E. Taylor and Mr. Henry Varley also spoke briefly.

EAST-END WORKERS.

Under the mulberry tree on Wednesday a large company assembled to hear of the Lord's work in East London. Mr. W. H. Seagram presided, and, after praise and prayer called on

Mr. F. N. Charrington, L.C.C., who gave an account of his own conversion, and his surrender of the share falling to him of the brewery concern. In passing he alluded to the fact that the eldest son of a well-known brewer has just surrendered in a similar way for conscience' sake his share in the profits of his father's brewery. Proceeding, the speaker traced briefly the history of the Tower Hamlets Mission, from its first beginning with some rough boys in a hayloft, to its present large proportions in the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End. About six thousand meetings have now been held consecutively—for the hall is open every night of the week. God has greatly blessed the work. Very many careless and godless have been converted, and not a few of these are now amongst the best workers. Moreover, through means of the operations carried on several hundreds of houses of ill-fame have been closed. The latest addition is a hall specially for work among boys and girls. An old chapel was secured for this purpose, and is being adapted to the requirements of the work proposed.

Mr. George Holland, the grand old veteran of East End service, came next, telling afresh to the glory of God something of George Yard experiences, trials, and triumphs. The keynote of his whole address was—God is faithful. The work is, he said emphatically, based on total abstinence, because intemperance is the curse of the locality. Moreover, the workers at George Yard believe in the conversion of children, and aim at nothing less than winning them to the Saviour. In every department—and there are at least forty branches—Christ is the centre of all, and his power has been wondrously manifested. Still, however, sin and sorrow are all around, and there is much, very much, yet to be done. The secret, said Mr. Holland in closing, of real useful service is this—Let the Lord be leader; be content to follow where He leads, and all will be well.

Dr. Barnardo maintained that every suffering ignorant child might say to the Church of Christ, "I am what I am, not because I willed it, not because I have given way to vice and sin, but through the wrongdoing of others, and potentially through your neglect." Thank God, the Church is awakening to its responsibility in this matter. It is a grand thing to save men and women out of the depths, but it is a nobler, higher, and more hopeful work to save the children before they become corrupted and degraded. The Doctor went on to give some pitiful and well nigh heartrending stories of the abominable cruelties which some of his rescued children have had to endure in the past, for, as he said, hunger, cold, and pain are by no means the worst they have sometimes to suffer. He rejoiced that his doors were ever open to such. In closing, he referred specially to some recent attacks made on the emigration work, and stated that a systematic investigation has resulted in showing that in the whole of Canada there are but two of his protégés in prison or reformatory, and one of these is only suspected of dishonesty. Considering that 6000 have been sent out to Canada, and the circumstances under which many of these have been rescued, Dr. Barnardo thought, and his hearers cordially agreed with him, that the result was eminently encouraging.

Mr. James Merry, who spoke as representing Miss Macpherson (now on the other side of the Atlantic), devoted his remarks specially to the emigration work. There is, he reminded the audience, a large amount of evangelistic and other service connected with the Home of Industry, but at present he wished to dwell particularly on what is being done in the way of emigration. The 66th party, led by Miss Macpherson personally, has safely reached the distributing Home at Stratford, Ontario. In all these voyages out and home, no serious accident has happened, and no lives have been lost. Moreover, in the vast majority of cases, happy homes have been provided for the children beyond the sea. In some rare cases a change has been necessitated. As illustrating the vigilant oversight exercised in this respect, Mr. Merry described a visiting tour, in which he saw last year 150 young people, and out of the whole there were but two cases in which a change was felt to be desirable. He also told how well many are doing, and how some are now evangelists, pastors, and missionaries, who were rescued by Miss Macpherson, trained, and sent to the new land beyond the sea. Those who know anything of the issue of this work, know that it is being abundantly blessed of God.

EVANGELISTIC ADDRESSES.

The outside gathering on Thursday, under the presidency of Mr. E. J. Kennedy, was favoured with delightful weather. The meeting was opened by prayer by Mr. Chas. Cook, and the first address given by Mr. Norman Bennett, of Cambridge, who gave his personal testimony of what the Lord had done for him in converting him, and enabling him to bear witness for the Lord. Then followed Major Liebenrood with a simple straight talk on man's sin and God's grace. If among the audience at Mildmay there were unsaved people they surely heard words whereby they could be saved. The closing address was given by Mr. Kennedy on the word "Mercy."

Later on a prayer-meeting was held at the same place; a Jewish brother gave a splendid testimony to the power of Christ in saving him and giving grace to carry the Gospel of a despised Saviour to his brethren in Whitechapel.

AN ADVENT SONG.

Until the day break and the shadows flee away.—S.S. iv. 6.

The night is long and dreary now,
But trust Him still;
He has not come in glory yet,
But soon He will.

A cloud of densest darkness rolls
Above the sky;
And for awhile this hides our Lord
From human eye.

That cloud which long ago received
Him from our sight,
Will, when that glorious morn shall dawn,
Shine with his light.

Though through that cloud we cannot see
With natural eye,
Yet faith beholds the dawning light
Beyond the sky.

Faith almost sees the Master leave
His home on high,
And lifts her voice 'mid sleeping ones:
"Your King is nigh.

"Rise, trim your lamps, lest you should hear
The cry 'Too late,'
And find yourselves unheeded stand
Outside the gate."

And so if hand in hand we press
Along his way,
We shall behold our coming King
Through endless day.

A MEDICAL MAN speaking at Wimbledon on the threatened cholera invasion, said the first to succumb to the dread disease were those who had been using alcohol habitually as a stimulant.

GREAT ASSEMBLY HALL.

Another successful month of work for the Master has been brought to a close by Mr. Charles Inglis in Mr. Charrington's Great Assembly Hall, Mile End-road. It has been Mr. Inglis's privilege to labour among the dwellers in the East End of London, in connection with the Tower Hamlets Mission, for twenty years. No evangelist can look back for so long a period and see the wonderful success that has attended the efforts of Mr. Charrington and his helpers. When Mr. Inglis first preached in their midst it was under a canvas roof in a small tent, and in an iron building in Carlton-square. God has spared him to see the gigantic hall reared and in full working order. Although the weather has been exceptionally warm, our brother has had large congregations. He is greatly liked, and his attractive and powerful addresses God has blessed. The friends of the Mission feel they have had a time of refreshing.

Mr. Inglis on his last night alluded to the length of time God had been pleased to spare him, and said, "I have now been coming in and out among you for twenty years. It has always been a great privilege to me to repeat my visits from time to time, but the most pleasing feature has been to see those who have been brought to the truth through my teaching. I thank God that there are some with us to-night who were brought to the Lord twenty years ago in the old tent at the corner of White Horse-lane. This proves the stability of the work carried on by Mr. Charrington, Mr. Kerwin, and other workers. I praise God for this work carried on every night all the year round. In all my travels I know nothing like this work, and I trust God will spare us all to continue it for many years to come."

Mr. Inglis took his departure amid general handshaking of those who claim him as their spiritual father.

THE SHAFTESBURY MEMORIAL.

In October, 1888, a full-length statue of the noble Earl of Shaftesbury was unveiled in Westminster Abbey, and now a more public memorial has been completed. This was unveiled on Thursday afternoon on the site so long reserved for it in the centre of Piccadilly-circus, and consists of a beautiful drinking fountain.

This fountain is symbolical, and is illustrative of Christian charity. It is in bronze, octagonal in form, with lower, central, and upper basins, surmounted by a figure in aluminium, the whole being thirty-six feet in height from the ground line and seventeen feet six inches in width at the base. It is approached by four steps, and is enclosed by a balustrade in stone two feet nine inches in height with four entrances. Facing the Piccadilly and Regent-street entrances, and surmounting the plinth upon which the bronze tablet containing the inscription is fixed, is a life-size bust of Lord Shaftesbury, over which is a handsome canopy supported by four columns. The likeness is very striking, and the whole has been executed in Mr. Alfred Gilbert's most characteristic style. For the convenience and use of thirsty pedestrians eight drinking cups are attached to the fountain by chains, while below, a gentle stream will flow from each angle into a shell-like basin for the refreshment of the canine race.

The tablet bears the following inscription:—"Erected by public subscription to Antony Ashley Cooper, K.G., seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, born April 28th, 1801; died October 1st, 1885. During a public life of half a century he devoted the influence of his station, the strong sympathies of his heart, and the great powers of his mind to honouring God by serving his fellow men. An example of his order, a blessing to this people, and a name to be by them ever gratefully remembered."

The opening ceremony was performed by the Duke and Duchess of Westminster, in the presence of many leading and influential workers for the poor. Mr. H. R. Williams, who has been the life and soul of the movement for the erection of this monument, read an address bearing on the life and character of the great Earl, and explaining the steps taken to commorate his services to the nation.

In connection with this we gladly note that Messrs. Cassell and Co. have issued in cheap form The Life and Work of Earl Shaftesbury, K.G., by Mr. Edwin Hodder. Originally this appeared in two volumes at 32s., now it is issued in one volume at 3s. 6d. Naturally the type is small, but it is readable and clear.

FAREWELL TO MISSIONARIES.

Meetings to bid farewell to missionaries proceeding to the foreign field, after training at Harley House, Bow, E., are of pleasant frequency. More than that, with a growth of activity there is a stronger grasp of the great purposes of world-wide evangelisation. The meetings held on Friday last were largely attended, many who had been attending the Mildmay Conference having remained in London expressly to be present. And what could have been more appropriate than to follow up studies on the return of the Lord with deliberations upon the urgent work of the coming King?

The College Hall would not have been capacious enough for the large assembly in the afternoon, which well filled Harley-street Chapel near by. The outgoing missionaries occupied seats by themselves in the gallery, and they seemed to be a very promising party. Ladies and gentlemen alike, they were in the bloom of health and vigour, and their faces indicated in some degree the enthusiasm and devotion which had possessed their hearts.

Mr. J. E. Mathieson, who presided, appropriately dwelt upon the urgency of mission work. He spoke of present opportunities, and referred to the return of the Lord as an inspiring motive in Gospel enterprise.

Rev. Dr. Grattan Guinness, in the course of an interesting address, told the story of the Institute in its origin and advancement. The missionary work began in evangelistic work. More than twenty years ago, while working at Bradford, he learned that a series of infidel lectures were to be delivered at Keighley. They attacked the character of Christ, and he took means to have them answered. Out of that effort grew classes in which he led young men through works on Christian evidences. Those classes grew into the Institute, with its various departments of work for the training of young women as well as young men for evangelistic work at home and abroad.

The text which he had taken as a warrant in the work was, "The things that thou hast heard of me, the same commit to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also." These two characteristics, of faithfulness and ability to instruct, had ever been before the directors of the work, and the rule has been to receive only those who have been converted for several years, and engaged for one or two years in Christian work. In all about 1100 have been received into the Institute, and had been sent out to work for God. Of these, eighty are in China, scattered over all parts of the Empire, some in connection with the C.I.M., and others with the British and Foreign Bible Society and the National Bible Society of Scotland. Thirty-one are in India; 103 in Africa—twenty-eight in the North, twenty-eight in the South, five in East Central, and forty-two in the West, chiefly on the Congo. Within the last thirteen or fourteen years the Congo Mission has grown into three—the American, the Swedish, and the English—having about a hundred missionaries between them. Though the mission has been sorely tried, God has greatly blessed it, and at the different stations there are somewhere about 1300 natives who have confessed the name of Christ. In Jamaica there are about twenty workers from the Institute, in South America seventeen, in Canada thirty, in the United States—chiefly in the West and on the Pacific coast—91; and in Australasia, Syria, and Continental countries, 32. In Great Britain and Ireland also many are labouring. Both in the East of London and in Derbyshire the students have experienced much joy in evangelistic work, which God has signally blessed. Over a hundred prizes offered by the Christian Evidence Society were taken by the students. In conclusion, the speaker commended the young people to the prayerful interest of the audience.

Some helpful words were spoken by Rev. H. B. Macartney, of Melbourne, who expressed a hope that the outgoing missionaries would all have an intimate acquaintance with Psalm lxviii. As a key to the understanding of prophecy, he urged attention to the terms of 1 Cor. x. 32, "The Jews, the Gentiles, the Church of God." Passing on, he quoted Acts xiii. 52, "The disciples were filled with joy, and with the Holy Ghost." This is a joy that flourishes in the teeth of adverse circumstances, and is specially needful in missionaries labouring in the midst of heathens.

Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson, after acknowledging the value of the service that is rendered to the missionary cause by the East London Institute, spoke of the work of the London Missionary Society in India. The present disposition of the people to listen to the Gospel is a great change from the state of things which prevailed a few years ago. God's truth is being disseminated, and his Spirit is working; in due course, perhaps soon, there will surely be a great movement which will signalise the decision of thousands of natives to follow Christ openly and heartily. In the meantime, more workers are required, who can help in the instruction of the people in the things which make for eternal peace.

Dr. Harry Guinness stated that nine of the outgoing missionaries hope to labour in China, four in Africa, eight in India, and three among the Jews. Miss Gertrude Broomhall followed with some thoughtful words of and appealed to those who stay at home to pray for such as go into heathen surroundings. The last speaker was Mrs. Bannister, who presented some timely counsel to the lady missionaries on the power of their lives. The Divine message has a power of its own, but the life may illustrate and enforce it. As Christ "declared" the Father, so the Christian should interpret Christ to those among whom he or she moves. In order to do this, there must be absolute self-surrender. In conclusion, the importance of a regular study of the Bible was lovingly urged.

In the evening a largely-attended gathering was held in the East London Tabernacle, Mr. S. Gurney Sheppard occupying the chair. Rev. Archibald G. Brown gave a valedictory address, in which he spoke of the privileges of Christian service which the mission field opens up, and referred to missionaries as the aristocracy—the very cream—of the Church. Dr. Harry Guinness, having commented on the readiness with which £250,000 worth of presents had been given to the Princess May, appealed for further financial support on behalf of the Institute and the Congo mission, both of which need £2000 for carrying on their work.

ZAMBESI INDUSTRIAL MISSIONS.

Meetings have been held at Bristol in view of the approaching departure of a large body of workers in connection with the Zambesi Industrial Mission. The party consists of Dr. and Mrs. Fallon and their two boys, Miss Raynor (daughter of Mr. J. Raynor, secretary of the Y.M.C.A.), Miss Davis, and Miss Mortimer, all inhabitants of Bristol, Mr. J. G. Edwards (of Carnarvon), Mr. and Mrs. George Allen (of Glasgow), and Mr. and Mrs. William Graham and two children (of Broxburn, Scotland). A crowded meeting was held in the Y.M.C.A hall.

Mr. R. Caldwell (secretary) stated that at the present time they hoped to send forth at least ten workers. All told, they had twenty European missionaries now in the field, as well as a staff of fourteen native Christians. There were also fourteen overseers engaged in teaching the natives how to cultivate the soil, how to grow coffee, and how to make the best use of the rich land God had given them. At present 300 natives were in the employ of the teachers, and thousands were waiting for work. The Mission was but a child in age, but it was a man in strength. They had now more than 100,000 acres of rich land honestly bought; but they hoped to build mission and school houses, small chapels, storehouses, etc. Near the mission land was a large tract inhabited by 150,000 natives—savages and slaves. Mr. Joseph Booth, the pioneer missionary, had a plan to set these people free. Taking the people to number say 50,000 families, he was going to offer an acre of land free to each family, on which they could build a hut and live with the missionaries free from tyranny. They would be much disappointed if the plan was not successful. The mission would still have left over 50,000 acres for other purpsses.

Mr. F. G. Toller (treasurer), in the course of an interesting address, said that calico and such goods were much needed in the district. Altogether about £500 of goods had been shipped to Africa. The wages were paid in calico; a man supported himself and his family on eight yards a month! Tools, etc., for the plantations, provisions, building materials, and other necessaries had been sent out in considerable quantities.

THE PARIS CITY MISSION.

The report of this energetic Society is a record to give gladness of heart to all who rejoice in the toils and triumphs of the Gospel. The ten missionaries of the Society are well qualified to spread the light of life through the gay city. As the result, souls are being won for Christ; the oil and wine of the Gospel are poured into the social and religious wounds of our neighbour city.

The incidents of the work are of interest. One woman wrote to the missionary, "You must have wondered why I wept so much at the service of the Lord's Supper. It was because I was overcome with emotion at the thought that my dear husband and myself had at last found our way to Jesus Christ. We have deep gratitude to you for having won us to the Saviour." They had both been Roman Catholics. Here a little girl of ten prays after her mother. There a paralysed Catholic woman calls prayer, "sending up words to God." A Catholic, being invited, sends her children to Sunday-school. An organ-grinder is glad of the visits, and, with his wife, always attends the meetings. A woman joyfully shows a perambulator which her husband, a reclaimed drunkard, brought to her saying, "Here are my small drops." At funerals hundreds of people are addressed, almost daily, in the cemeteries, and one missionary alone addressed fifty-six meetings in a month, both indoors and out. An old Catholic woman said: "I used to go to mass, and understood nothing in it. My daughter reads at night the Gospel you gave her, and this gives me joy." After a meeting held in the Breton language, a man stood up and said, "The Gospel is the power of God; it has made me a new man."

The late Dr. McAll truly wrote:—"The Paris City Mission, in supplying us with self-denying and earnest evangelists, who go from house to house seeking to carry home to the inmates individually the truths announced to them in the mission rooms, is rendering invaluable service."

Successful Christian work is often done under difficulties which lead to the exercise of faith and prayer. This has been the case with the Paris Committee, as through the home-call of several supporters, and reverse of fortune with others, they have been tried of late from lack of money. One of their staff is now under notice to leave. A few gifts cast into this part of our Lord's treasury will avert misfortune to thousands of the Paris poor. The hon. secretary for England, Mr. J. M. Weylland, 14, Nicol-road, Harlesden, London, N.W., will gladly supply information.

MR. GRUBB IN SOUTH AMERICA.

Rev. George Grubb and his companions, Messrs. Millard and Bidlake, landed last week at Buenos Ayres, after quarantine spent on board ship. A party, including representatives from the different churches, welcomed them on landing.

On the first Sunday Mr. Grubb preached both morning and evening at St. John's Church. They have been led, after much prayer, to begin the week-day services at Lomas Church, a suburb about twelve miles off, Canon Prichard having given them a hearty invitation. This morning a united Communion service took place in St. John's Church, the Scotch and American ministers joining. The congregations are not very large as yet: those who know this country will understand this. But interest has been stirred up, and we are believing that God is answering the prayers of his people to this much-needed spiritual movement. Already the brightened faces of many of the Lord's people show how they appreciate the teaching, and are rejoicing. Asking all friends of the Master's work in the "neglected Continent" to continue instant in prayer.

JEWS IN THE TURKISH ARMY.—Mr. D. C. Joseph writes from Jerusalem:—"I was surprised to read that the Jews are 'satisfied,' and even 'thankful' for the new edict for their enrolment into the Turkish army. The opposite is the truth; here there are lamentations, and fasts are being proclaimed. Men and women are weeping upon Rachel's grave, and the wailing place is thronged every day with praying old men, while the young men are deserting the country. The Jews from Palestine are not willing (and it is no wonder) to serve side by side with the Turkish soldier."

MRS. BAEYERTZ IN DUNDEE.

During the last fortnight Dundee has been favoured with a second visit from Mrs. Baeyertz, the meetings having been held in the Y.M.C.A. Hall. How much of this result is due to the united prayer that has been offered may not be known now; but night after night anxious ones have been brought under conviction of sin, and found peace in the Crucified One. Upwards of 120 have been dealt with, and in the majority of cases have come out on the Lord's side.

The addresses were all new, with the exception of one or two, which were given again by special request, and which could well bear repetition. One under the title of "The Doors" seemed especially powerful, and was blessed to many. The afternoon Bible readings also were greatly appreciated, and, in spite of the counter-attractions incident to the holiday time, a goodly number attended day by day. After a short rest, Mrs. Baeyertz goes to Glasgow, where she is to conduct a mission for Rev. Wm. Ross, Cowcaddens.

CHAMBERI MISSION, MADRID.

An occasional paper has been issued describing the return of Mr. and Mrs. Fenn to Chamberi. These devoted workers have been delighted to find many tokens of spiritual result, and some of the incidents detailed in their letter are of the most encouraging character. The school work appears to be going on well, in spite of considerable opposition.

"Mr. Nisbet and our son have worked happily together for the past ten months, two Spanish gentlemen also helping in public meetings. Mr. and Mrs. Nisbet have also visited some of the villages around, scattering the good seed. He has just returned from a ten days' visit to a village in the province of Guadalajara, 180 miles across country, the journey by train, coach, horseback, and on foot, occupying nearly two days. He was entreated to go by one who had heard the truth and got tracts and the Bible eight years ago at Yuncos, where he goes annually to press olives. Many of the villagers were anticipating the visit of the 'Protestant Pastor,' and a sick woman asked again and again, 'When is he coming?' 'Will he come before I die?' She read the Scriptures, and the old man thought she had laid hold of Christ before she died—six weeks before the visit. An intensely interesting visit it has been, preaching and speaking to the few and the many all day till ten in the evening. He believes he could do much more in the provinces with a bicycle or tricycle, also with a companion."

"Our sisters who give themselves to visiting, cottage-meetings, mothers' meeting, Bible-classes, and special meetings for young women, are doing a most important work. The sisters speak, too, of encouraging visits to neighbouring villages, and have spoken to groups of women sitting at their doors—well scattering gospels and tracts."

In a private letter, Mr. A. R. Fenn writes:—"You will be glad to hear that we expect to have the joy of receiving some ten persons into fellowship to-morrow. Two are old scholars, two from our country station Yuncos, and the rest from the district and thank God there are more to follow."

THE MEN in the Victorian Navy are said to be nearly all total abstainers.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER, you have entrusted to your care a number of children, who, if you fail in your duty, and allow them to pass out of your hands unwarned, and untaught, may fall victims to the enemy, and their blood will be required at your hands. —Charles Garrett.

SIR ANDREW CLARK says the drinking habit is difficult of cure in men; it is all but impossible in women. When taken early in hand, cures are obtained in both sexes; but even then the proportion in women is painfully small. Referring to his own practice, he said:—"I have had a singularly large experience of private dealings with drunkards. I do not think that I could look back upon five recoveries in women, but I can look back upon hundreds—I am within the mark when I say hundreds—in men."

CHILDREN AND BAD LANGUAGE.—A conference of Sunday-school workers, held last week in Clerkenwell, passed a resolution deeply regretting the rapidly increasing use of profane language amongst all classes, but especially amongst children, and affirming that steps should be taken to warn children of the danger into which the use of such language brings them. An adjourned meeting will be held on Friday, July 7, at City-road Congregational Schoolroom, at 8 p.m., to consider how best to bring this question under the notice of scholars

The Book World.

Some July Magazines.

The little folk will find pictures and stories in abundance in Our Darlings. (3d. Shaw & Co.), a real children's treasury of delight and interest.

The Children's Special Service Mission set forth the Gospel simply and sweetly in Our Own Magazine (1d.). Well calculated to win many young hearts.

Sunday Reading for the Young (3d.), is an admirable monthly. The reading matter is varied, and the pictures numerous. Little folks may well speak well of "Sunday's." (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

The Countess of Aberdeen keeps Upward and Onward (1d. Partridge) fresh and pleasing for young women, while her daughter, Lady Marjorie Gordon, provides in Wee Willie Winkie a wonderfully bright magazine, vivid and lively, and all for one halfpenny.

In The Clergyman's Magazine, Canon Tristram continues his valuable series of articles on "Eastern Customs in Bible Lands," and deals with agricultural life. The general contents of this monthly are thoughtful and useful. (6d. Hodder & Stoughton.)

The Expository Times is a comprehensive repository of matter bearing upon the Bible. The July issue has useful and attractive articles alongside critical studies that will not help scholars, and can be of little service to the ordinary reader. (6d. T. & T. Clark.)

All the World is an attractive and ably-collated review of the doings of the Salvation Army work in different parts of the world, with striking exhortations interspersed. It bears the Army stamp of enthusiasm and couleur de rose. (6d. 101, Queen Victoria-street).

The English Illustrated Magazine, among other illustrated articles, describes somewhat of "The Romance of Modern London." Bagshot Park, the residence of the Duke of Connaught, is dealt with as one of the "Historic Homes of England." (6d. Edward Arnold.)

The chief interest of The Sword and Trowel still circles around its late editor, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, whose utterances, or facts relating to him, fill a considerable part of the bill of fare. Dr. Pierson discourses on "Unction in Preaching," and Pastor Usher expounds "The Truths needing Special Emphasis to-day."

The Parents' Review is a high-class monthly magazine of home-training and culture. The July part opens with a capital paper by C. Russell, on "Some Aspects of Slojd." Herbert D. Geldart writes on "The Pleasures of Collecting Plants," and the autobiography of Madame Tel Sono is continued. (6d. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.).

The Quiver. (6d. Cassell & Co.) A choice family magazine, containing, besides the stories, much delightful reading, as, for instance, the first article, admirably illustrated, on "A Buried Town in England," referring, of course, to Silchester and its Roman remains. "A Talk with Principal Reynolds," by R. Blathwayt, is also very interesting.

Good Words (6d.) has a finely illustrated paper on "Suffolk's Moated Halls." In The Sunday Magazine (6d.), a very appreciative character sketch of the late Bishop Phillips Brooks appears, with portrait. "Dr. Newman Hall at Home" is another item of personal interest. An English Resident in Russia begins an account of Russian dissenters and their treatment by the Government or Czar. (Isbister & Co.)

The Century Magazine (1s. 4d.) maintains its well-established fame for literary and artistic excellence. Every earnest reformer will turn this month to the article by Mr. George Kennan, written in reply to the official defence, in a recent number of the magazine, of Russian despotic action towards Jews and Stundists. Mr. Kennan scatters to the winds the statements of the apologist,and strengthens his indictment of Russian official intolerance. St. Nicholas (1s.) is a truly wonderful production. A charmingly-illustrated article on Chicago is a timely feature in the current issue. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

The Religious Tract Society's budget is rich in varied interest. The Sunday at Home (6d.) has an article by Dr. Green, on "A Sisterhood of Hymn Writers," with nine portraits of lyrical ladies. The coloured frontispiece of an old warship being tugged to her last berth has a melancholy interest, in view of the recent naval disaster. The Editor writes in The Leisure Hour (6d.) of some "Curiosities of Gout"—not based on experience, we hope; and there is a varied table of contents. The Girl's Own Paper (6d.) caters admirably for its special clients. Lilywhite (6d.), the summer issue of the G.O.P., contains a touching plea for "Fresh Air for City Girls."

Mr. Atkins's trio are this month full of present inte rest. The Young Man (3d.) has sketches of R. L Stevenson, and Mr. J. Clarke, editor of The Christia World. Major Seton Churchill takes a rosy view o "The Army" as a profession. In The Young Woma (3d.) the leading place is fitly taken by Princes May, who is pleasantly sketched by Miss Freiderick as she has been wont to appear "at home." Mr Meyer contributes a paper on "Mary Magdalene, and there are many other interesting papers. Amon the chief articles in The Home Messenger (1d.) ar "Beautiful Bournemouth;" a peep at Mr. Thoma Spurgeon as a popular preacher; and "Why I Signe the Pledge," by Mr. Robert Rae. (Partridge & Co.

Wedding Bells and the Royal Weddings, b Rev. C. Bullock (1s. 6d. Home Words Office), is timely compilation, prepared in the author's chatt and loyal style, with many illustrations.

The Midsummer volume of Little Folks (3s. 6d Cassell and Co.) is a rich mine of instruction an entertainment for the children; those young peopl who take it to the seaside with them need never hav a dull day.

"Pansy's" stories are always wholesome. We therefore, welcome the addition of three more (4d each) to Messrs. Partridge's cheap illustrated series —Household Puzzles, The Randolphs, and Zu Lewis and his Lamp.

Leaving the Manse, by Kezia (1s. Nelso & Co.), is a pretty story of the Scottish Disruption o 1843, and all the loss and self-sacrifice that followe in many a Christian home. Young people will follo with interest the fortunes of the leading character and will also learn in pleasant guise the course of notable event in modern church history.

Homespun (1s. 6d. Hutchinson & Co.) is Mis Annie Swan's latest story of Scottish life, and it i second to none of her works in real human interes The characters are "simple folk," but the portrai ture is so realistic and faithful that we follo the development of the story with unabated interes "Dod Aitken," and some of the other character must certainly become classic in Scottish folk lore.

The Story of the English Separatists, b Rev. Dr. Mackennal, has been written to commemo rate the tercentenary of the martyrdom of Greenwoo Barrowe, and Penry in 1593. The pages afford stimulating glimpse of the heroism of men wh counted not their lives dear to them when it becam a question of suffering for loyalty to conscience an zeal for God's will as they understood it. No matte how we may read history or understand duty o controverted ecclesiastical questions, this attractiv illustrated work is a useful explanation of a gres assertion of civil and religious liberty. (Congrega tional Union Publishing Offices, Memorial Hall, Fa ringdon-street, E.C.)

Bunyan Characters. By Dr. Alex. Whyte. (3 6d. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.) These graphi commentaries on the creations of the renowne tinker show Dr. Whyte at his best. He is perhap the best living exponent of the theological views o the Puritan allegorist, and these glowing chapter will do much to renew the literary life and usefulnes of the classic "Pilgrim's Progress." It enhance our sense of the profound worth of Bunyan's wor to read these interpretations of it; but it also make us thankful that we have among us such a preache for the times as the eloquent pastor of Free S George's. It is a book that will bear repeate reading, and we could give it no greater praise.

Cassell's Book of Health (Part 12, 6d.) dea sensibly and sympathetically with the developmen of growing children, and the proper method of treatment. The Illustrated History o England (part 79, 7d.) has arrived at 187 and treats of the Alabama arbitration wit America, the agitation for the ballot, and othe interesting topics. Cottage Gardening is an exce lent monthly (3d. each part). The information dea with poultry, bees, allotments, food, house, windo and town gardens. This very practical magazin deserves a large circulation. The Sunday-schoo Teacher's Bible Manual is a series to be con pleted in about twelve parts. (6d. each). Part IV begins with "Embroidery," and ends with "Gospel. Illustrations and maps add to the utility of the wor

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Rev. Dr. Rigg, President of the Wesleyan Conference.

We are thankful to hear that the North Africa Mission has just received from a new donor the generous gift of £500. It was much needed.

The letter from the students at Morija, Basutoland, to our zealous Jewish brother, Hermann Warszawiak, will be read with interest. The donors are being trained as catechists and teachers. Our readers will, we are sure, unite in prayer that they may become useful ministers of Christ to their own people.

"Familiarity breeds contempt." How very deplorable is the increasing use made of Scripture phrases in political leading articles in the secular press. The misapplication of deep Gospel doctrines is painfully lessening reverence for the Word of God. How desperate are Satan's various "devices" against the Divine weapon he chiefly dreads!

Our limited space does not admit of our giving at length the excellent addresses delivered by Principal Dykes, Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., and other speakers, at the meeting of the Armenian Christians' Defence on Monday night. They were worthy of the occasion, and the meeting will, we doubt not, prove influential.

Archdeacon Farrar has in The Contemporary another vigorous assault on the Romanising party in the Church of England, which he entitles "Undoing the Work of the Reformation." The article is marked by a firm grasp of all the bearings of the question, and evinces a warm resentment of the meanness of certain Churchmen in betraying a cause which they profess to uphold. This is a grave and damaging charge. "It is now notoriously a common practice of Anglican priests, many of whom derive their stock-in-trade of catchwords and formulæ from Romanising manuals, to ignore the clergy and the churches of their own communion on the Continent as schismatic, and to go to Mass in Romish churches." Such men will not, of course, acknowledge any Nonconformists as brethren.

Archdeacon Farrar deals with the pretensions of ministers to be priests. "Events," he says, "have proved the wisdom of Hooker's opinion that 'presbyter' is a truer, more Christian, and more fitting name for English ministers than the misinterpreted and much-dishonoured name of priest." He claims that "the Magna Charta of the Reformed Church of England is the sixth article, which points to Scripture as the sole, final, and supreme authority on matters of doctrine. And the voice of Scripture on this matter is absolutely decisive. It cuts away the very taproot of the whole sacerdotal system." "Sacerdotalism is always allied to the doctrine of transubstantiation, and transubstantiation is one of the heresies which the Church of England at the Reformation most decisively and most emphatically repudiated." The utter futility of Romanism to hold in its keeping the minds of thinking men is shown by the facts that "in the third generation, the Romanists lose almost all hold over Romish immigrants," and that "only 100,000 out of the 2,000,000 of Paris go to mass." Is this action against High-Churchism to end with newspaper letters and magazine articles, or is it to go forward to something definite and positive—say, to separation from it?

Rev. Thomas Green, M.A., ex-chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, says that what he seems to see looming in the future more distinctly than anything else is not a conflict between Evangelical religion and science and Evangelical religion and either higher or any other kind of criticism, but a conflict between Evangelical religion, such as our fathers held, and the insidious, widespread, and in the end infidel-producing, spirit of Ritualism. He is not afraid of the infidel or the scientist, of the Socialist or the Labour Church; he believes that Protestantism will have a hard fight for it in the days immediately before us. The position will have to be met, not by scholarship only, but by the patient and steady grounding of the average men as good pastors and good preachers. This is a forcible and timely utterance from the Nonconformity which has never had a particle of sympathy with Romanism as a creed and a church, however it may have pleaded for equal political rights for Roman Catholic citizens. We hope it is awaking to the peril of our age and country.

The Apostle Paul warned the saints at Ephesus that of their own selves would men arise teaching perverted things to draw away disciples after them. We affectionately warn all, especially our younger brethren and sisters, against new teachings—particularly such as bring into prominence the names of those who disseminate them. We hear of notions such as this—that it is one thing to be born again, and another thing to be born of God, and other distinctions equally puerile and without foundation. The tendency of all perversions of Scripture is to mystify those who are attracted by them; to produce dissatisfaction, discontent, and even despair, in those who do not attain to a knowledge of them; and self-conceit and spiritual pride in those who think they do. And last, not least, to separate Christians into cliques and parties; to divide those who should be united together in one mind and one judgment; and to foster a desire to seek strange things in Scripture—nuts to crack—instead of feeding upon the manna from heaven; the old corn of the land; the Bread of God, whose flesh is the true food and whose blood is the true drink.

It is well that there are those in high positions in ecclesiastical circles who are concerned at the signs of the times in relation to departures from "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, at the last meeting of the Upper House of Convocation, presented a petition against the rationalistic teaching so common among the clergy in these days. It is sad that such words as the following should have to be spoken of any who claim to be the ministers of Christ, yet they form part of the Bishop's protest:—

> It is generally known that certain clergymen of the Church of England, in positions of influence and authority, are deliberately undermining by their teachings and public writings the faith of the Church in this country in the trustworthiness of the Holy Scriptures, and are also repudiating the common faith of Christendom.

It is not only of one Church or section of the Church that this may be said. The Lord grant such a tide of pentecostal grace to return as shall soon lead to a revived faith in the verities of the inspired Word on the part of those who have in any way departed from them.

Miss E. March-Phillips contributes an article to The Fortnightly on "The Progress of Women's Trade Unions," which is full of painful facts, and yet has a side of brightness and hope. The total number of women workers in the kingdom is not given, but some idea of it may be formed from the fact that 800,000 women are engaged in trades other than the textile manufacturers and shops. There appear to be at least 600,000 employed in shops, there are 300,000 milliners and dressmakers; of laundresses there are 176,670. There is a remarkable lack of organisation among them, some large unions formed in times of pressure and excitement, having dwindled almost entirely away. The National Society of Shop Assistants has only 500 in all its branches, one out of 1200. Wages are falling, except in places where the women have banded together to defend their rights, and the fall among them is dragging down the men's wages also. Homes are neglected by the workers, children are uncared for, and husbands get into a way of depending on their wives' earnings, and are satisfied if they pay the rent and the bread bill.

The hard work of some women seems incredible, and is a reproach to the age and country. Miss March-Phillips names, among others, the "fish-curers of Aberdeen, toiling as even slaves have scarcely done, in open sheds, exposed to all weathers, wet through, pushing and lifting immense weights, starting so early from home and returning so late that they constantly do not see their families from one week's end to another. When great takes of fish come in they often work thirty-six hours at a stretch, while men in the same city are clamouring for a forty-eight-hour week. The women earn 12s. a week, and nothing for overtime, and this is far from being the only industry where women sometimes work all day and all night and all the next day." The difficulties in the way of any reform are three. 1. Fear of employers, some of whom threaten and intimidate, though there are some who encourage the formation of unions. 2. Home employment. 3. The characters of the employed. "More often than not they are timid, indifferent, frivolous, excitable, and for a new Sunday hat, or a walk with the Tom or Dick who happens to be in the ascendant, would sacrifice the best interests of all the women in the world without a pang."

Few records of modern travel equal in interest that which Miss Annie Taylor has to tell of her journey through Thibet. No greater instance of tact and intrepidity has occurred in this century. Young, and previously unaccustomed to hardship, she has succeeded in urging her way through a region never before explored by a European, and that without any one of her own race to accompany her. Amid perils and difficulties almost unparalleled, Miss Taylor pursued her way until within a few hours' distance of Lhassa, the Thibetan capital, and residence of the Grand Lama. But for the perfidy of a Mohammedan guide whom she relied on, and supplied with funds, enabling him to attain his object in visiting the country, she would have entered the city. She was, however, arrested, and sent back, the fear of the English Government probably being the only motive for sparing her life. But she had first mastered different dialects of the language, made herself acquainted with the condition, habits, and aspects of the people, and now has returned to tell her tale.

Latest accounts from Uganda seem to indicate that permanent possession has been taken by the English, and that the country is being composed again. Sir Gerald Portal has the credit of being a splendid organiser, and is said to have set the people to work in every direction. Whether they will continue for any time in the ways of industry remains to be seen. Sir Gerald is seeking to make peace between the rival factions of Roman Catholic and Protestant by appointing one of each party to fill the highest offices, and by assigning certain districts to the Catholics. Nothing is said as to the country where the Protestants shall live. It appears that the high officials are to exercise their office separately, the Protestant Minister of Justice acting for the Protestants, and the Catholic for the Roman Catholics. Everyone will rejoice if success attends the effort to end strife, but we hope it will not also be an effort to curtail the liberty of preaching the Gospel.

The spirit of bitterness against the Gospel of Christ, and of persecution, increasingly prevails. Romish malignity is developing side by side with Mohammedan spite, and general hostility to the Spirit of God. North Africa, the official record of the North Africa Mission, calls attention this month to the cruel action (already described in our columns) of Spanish priests in Tangier toward Christian converts. By false and infamous charges alleged against them, and by accusations of disrespect to the Virgin Mary and the priests, imprisonment is secured, expulsion decreed, and all possible pains and penalties enforced upon those who have come out from Romish error, and confessed the name of Christ as their only trust. Wherever the Gospel comes into contact with priestism, bitter enmity is soon aroused, and intolerance manifested. Giants Pope and Pagan still live, and even in our boasted age of liberty and progress the signs of decrepitude, which Bunyan allegorised, appear to be giving place to a renewed vitality.

World-wide Evangelisation.

At this season, when so many conferences of beloved Christians will be gathering together and praying for the missionaries of the world—many of whom have sacrificed health and worldly positions, and not loved their lives even unto the death—I would, nevertheless, call attention to the great undeniable fact that the love and labour of those now thus in the field will never evangelise the world. I do not undervalue their efforts, but it is quite plain, by looking to the New Testament, that the Church of Christ is now too often following its own methods instead of Christ's for the evangelisation of the world. See Acts iv. 24.

"And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said . . . . (ver. 29.) 'And now, Lord, behold their threatenings: and grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy word.'"

The marvellous manner in which this prayer was answered shows how well pleasing to God it was. See verse 31: "And when they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the word of God with boldness."

The very venerable Principal Brown, of Aberdeen, in his commentary says, "The Spirit rested upon the entire community, first in the very way they had asked, so that they 'spake the word with boldness' (ver. 29, 31); next, in melting down all selfishness, and absorbing even the feeling of individuality in an intense and glowing realisation of Christian unity."

The Lord Himself said we must look to the Lord of the Harvest to thrust out labourers, and if we thus pray for "thrust-outs" let us look for the answer at the coming conventions.

For the Lord of the harvest Himself has not lost his power to "thrust out" labourers into his harvest. Commensurate with the world's need, let not us tremble to make such request.

God thrust out John Bunyan, and man thought he had thrust him in. Then he had only one tongue, now he speaks over the world in many tongues. Should not this encourage praying ones in every country to which your paper will go?

In accordance with the Saviour's form of prayer, we are still, in this day, to look for labourers thrust out by the Lord of the harvest.

Peter and John were both truly designated "unlettered and unlearned" men, and though Paul, thrust forth with an iron grasp, had been educated, yet it is very striking that he is the very apostle to write "Christ sent me . . . to preach the Gospel, not with wisdom of words" (1 Cor. i. 17), and says to the Corinthian converts:—

> For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen; yea, and things which are not to bring to nought things that are: that no flesh should glory in his presence. (1 Cor. i. 26 to 29.)

One of the editors of The Missionary Review, Dr. Gordon, of Boston, lately had a most telling article in that Review, describing how a candidate to go out to the heathen, being unable to come up to the standards, was asked if there were ANYTHING he could say why he should be sent. The poor fellow replied that he knew the Holy Ghost would have him to go, and he was allowed. Dr. Gordon declares how marvellously and speedily this poor thrust-out was used amongst the heathen. May loving one-accord praying ever continue to be very manifest at Keswick and the coming kindred conferences throughout the world.

Not by Doing, but by Dying.

Our redemption was accomplished not by doing but by dying. With his nailed hands Jesus took out of the way the handwriting of ordinances that was against us and nailed it to his cross. By being crucified in weakness He spoiled principalities and powers. When put to an open shame He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in Himself. Through death He rendered powerless him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and "delivered them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

The Prophets had foreshown this in their own graphic and inspired way. "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death; O Death, I will be thy plagues; O Grave, I will be thy destruction." Our fathers delighted in these mighty truths, and sang—

> When I tread the verge of Jordan,
> Bid my anxious fears subside;
> Death of death and hell's destruction,
> Land me safe on Canaan's side.

But we, their children, find these battle-songs of the Kingdom of God too vehement, and we warble our ecstasies in milder lines.

Isaiah, with the same prevision of the cross as Hosea, his predecessor, said, "He will swallow up death in victory." "Moab shall be trodden down under Him, as straw is trodden down for the dunghill; And He shall spread forth his hands" (see John xxi. 18, 19) "in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim, and He shall bring down their pride together with the spoils of their hands."

> Through weakness and defeat
> He won the meed and crown,
> Trod all his foes beneath his feet
> By being trodden down.

This is the divine and only way of victory.

> This is the way the Master trod,
> Shall not his servants tread it too?

We have been baptized into his death, that we may walk in newness of life. But the faith of this generation holds very feebly this privileged position. We are not willing to die. Instead of "always bearing about in our body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in our mortal flesh," we are exceedingly alive to our own comfort, our own opinion, our own reputation, our own ecclesiastical position, our own religious views, our own Christian work, our own earthly politics.

"I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with Me; for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment." In the old time this was interpreted of the cross. Recent commentators say, "He treads the wine-press here, not as a sufferer, but as an inflictor of vengeance." But it was on the cross the victory was gained. We never read of Jesus executing vengeance alone, elsewhere than when He died.

> Sing, my soul, the glorious battle,
> With completed victory rife,
> How the world's Redeemer conquered
> By surrendering his life.

The hymns above quoted, and the declaration of Heb. ii. 14, show that the place of suffering is the place of vengeance: "That through death He might bring to nought him that had the power of death."

We live rather in the Old Dispensation than the New. Like Old Covenant saints, we are all our lifetime in bondage through fear of death. But Jesus died to bring that bondage to an end, and to give to us eternal life: "and this is life eternal, to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." They of old complained, "For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter." "Nay," says the Apostle, "in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him that loved us." "Wherefore, if ye died with Christ from the elements of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances,. after the commandments and doctrines of men?"

Possibly, in the estimate of Heaven, the strongest position in the Kingdom of God on earth just now is not in the ranks of advanced theology, or among the apostles of human progress, or in the Conference at Lucerne, or among the advocates of civil and religious liberty, or in the Evangelical party in the Church of England or in Nonconformity; nor even in the numerous conventions which are meeting to confer about holiness and power: but in Turkish prisons; in Stundist families torn asunder; among Christian exiles on Russian steppes and in Siberian mines. The keep of the Kingdom is Calvary. Its heroic periods have been days of unleavened bread, when the Civil Power has slain apostles with the sword, and because this pleased the Hierarchy, has cast others into the prisons of the Inquisition, or burnt them at the stake. Its mightiest men have not been men of renown, the adulterated progeny of the sons of God and the daughters of men: but holy ones, who have been the offscouring of all things for Christ's sake, by whose cross they were crucified to the world and the world to them; their manifesto, "Henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the stigmata of the Lord Jesus"; their work, to preach, by life or death, this Gospel of the Kingdom in all the world for a witness of the grace of God to all the nations, and thus to hasten the coming of the Day of God. Smedley Memorial Hospital.

THE late Mrs. Smedley, of Matlock, devoted much of her time and income to helping poor sufferers. There were always a number whose poverty did not permit them to enter even the cheapest of the hydropathic establishments at Matlock. These had been provided for at a free hospital, founded forty years ago at Lea Mills, and continued till the death of Mr. Smedley in 1874. Hampered by unforeseen circumstances, Mrs. Smedley was unable to keep open the free hospital at her own cost. It had not been closed long, however, before the pressure of applications determined her to seek the assistance of others for carrying on the work, and for many years the present place, opened under the title of the Smedley Memorial Hospital, had been her delight. From twenty to twenty-five patients have been in residence all the year round.

Since the lamented death of Mrs. Smedley the work has been carried on by Dr. Sharpe, the junior physician of Smedley's Hydropathic Establishment. The committee are now most anxious to put it on a permanent footing, not only on account of the valuable work carried on in it, but as a memorial of the Smedleys. Prompted by these considerations, a lady has promised £500 if £1500 more can be raised; £2000 is the sum necessary to obtain possession of the present hospital (now in the market through the death of the owner). With this, and a few hundreds more if possible, the committee could maintain the institution. Mr. J. H. QUILLIAM, Holme Bank, Matlock Bath, is treasurer for building fund.

The Royal Wedding.

HISTORIANS have repeatedly told the story of the making of England. And their narrative is wet with tears and blood. Intrigue and crime, war and murder, high-handed wrong, have played so prominent a part in the constitution of our nation. But in these later years, other elements have been called into play, and have contributed more genial influences; as when spring sunshine succeeds to the stern winter frost in the making of the year.

It is impossible to exaggerate the good effect of the policy pursued latterly by our gracious Sovereign the Queen. Instead of shutting herself up with her sorrow, and immuring her family life behind her palace walls, she has unveiled the secrets of her home-life, and has invited her people to share her sorrows and her joys. There has been one model-home open to the gaze of the entire land, and from it influences have issued through the last three decades which have greatly though insensibly raised the standard of our home-life, and made the nation conscious of the breathing forth of a nobler, purer ideal.

The unity of the nation is also necessarily cemented by such an event as that in which we all took part last Thursday. For once, we forget our differences in religion, and politics, and social life, and found a common ground for interest, loyalty, and patriotism. As Tennyson sang, thirty years ago, in his welcome to the mother of the present bridegroom:—

> For Saxon or Dane or Norman we,
> Teuton or Celt, or whatever we be,
> We are each all Dane in our welcome of thee,
> Alexandra!

It was a marvellous spectacle within the chapel: the sunlight and colour, the flashing jewels and splendid uniforms, the beautiful faces of the women, the noble bearing of the men, the gathered representatives of all that has made our nation great and our age illustrious. But still more marvellous was that vast crowd of people, of all ranks and classes, that filled the Park and waited in dense patient lines throughout the long miles of route. As we looked down on them from our lofty vantage in St. Paul's, scanning the whole extent of Ludgate Hill, it was a stirring spectacle to see those packed and eager crowds, intent on one object, and waiting to join in one shout of congratulation. But it was overwhelming to think of them as representative of the entire nation, which for the day lost interest in the wrangles of St. Stephen's, and gathered around its Royal Family with sympathetic and kindly interest. Nothing could so deeply entrench the Royal Family in the national love, or make the English people so absolutely loyal.

Some of the incidents, as related by the daily papers, were very touching and natural. The intense delight of the Duchess of Teck, at seeing her daughter advancing to the lower steps of the throne. The Queen's welcome to the new-made bride, as she lovingly drew her head down, and kissed her affectionately on each cheek. The motherly solicitude of the Princess of Wales, as for a second time she called her only son to her side and kissed him again, while the Duke kissed her hands and cheeks. The farewells waved by the Queen and Princesses from the balcony of Buckingham Palace as the young pair drove out of the quadrangle amid a shower of rice. These may seem but pieces of sentiment, but those who look beneath the surface will probably discern in them those touches of nature which "make the whole world kin," and think of them as the shuttles of the loom swiftly speeding between warp and woof, and making the national fabric one.

The Archbishop was very happy in his brief address. It was wise to remind the newly-married pair that their simplest ways could not be indifferent, that the highest must do common duties better than all, and that the first element of society is the family. It is for lack of the family life that France is dying by piecemeal. And as long as our Royal Family perpetuate the traditions of the Anglo-Saxon people, in their love for the home, they will not only greatly endear themselves, but they will earn our highest gratitude, and contribute, though perhaps unconsciously, yet very largely, to the moral health of the entire community.

It is good to read the testimonies given from different quarters of the interest taken by our future Queen in religious and philanthropic movements. Many remember her visit to the Mildmay Conference, others her presence on one of Dr. Barnardo's gala-days. The venerable George Holland tells of the cottage at Coombe Warren, within easy reach of White Lodge, where the Princess Mary and her mother have entertained many of the poor women of his mission. The practical interest shown towards the Princess May Village Homes is also a striking evidence of the business-like principles, the tact, and the earnest philanthropic purpose, which are of priceless worth, and go far to indicate the strength and simplicity of that young heart, who through dark seas of sorrow has passed into a summer land of joy. And may we not interpret her gift to a friend of Sir Arthur Blackwood's little book, "Forgiveness, Life, and Glory," as an indication of appreciation for spiritual religion which we do not always expect from one so young and so richly dowered?

And so, amid "the world's glad sympathy," these two young lives, mingling their currents, inaugurate their one career. They have a noble opportunity. They may cement all classes to the throne. They may set a great example of simplicity and purity. They may do much to bridge the gulf between rich and poor, high and low. They may incite the noble and high-born, with whom they associate, to appreciate the true worth of rank, as affording an opportunity of such large service to man as shall soften the asperities and ameliorate the conditions of human life. That God may bless them abundantly, and supply their every need, and, after using them for his loftiest purposes, bestow on them a crown of glory, is the heartfelt prayer of all thoughtful Christian people, who count their loyalty as an integral part of their religion.

SAILORS' REST, OPORTO.

FOR seven years this Rest has been open, but our work is much hindered by the want of suitable premises. My wife and I have resided for over two years in the house, under very insanitary conditions and it has been decided to leave in September. The rooms of the Y.M.C.A. have been taken by the school authorities, so that they also have been vacated.

As the Sailors' Rest is connected with the Y.M.C.A. work, it would be mutually helpful if both were carried on under one roof. At our special prayer meetings in this crisis, it was unanimously resolved to ask the readers of THE CHRISTIAN to join us in praying that "God would guide us to the place we need, opening the way, which is to us blocked."

Of necessity the premises must be near the river, and here arises our difficulty, suitable houses being so scarce.—On behalf of the committee,

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

THE HEAVENLY PLACES.

In his conversation with Nicodemus, while the night-breeze played over the sleeping city, coming and going as it would, our Lord spoke of Himself as being already in heaven. His bodily presence was evidently in the chamber of that house in Jerusalem, robed in the simple peasant garb which his mother had spun for Him; but in spirit, he was much more really in heaven than there. So, according to the teaching of the Apostle Paul, the Church, consisting of such as believe in Christ, is really less a denizen of earth than of those heavenly places which have been entered by her Lord. They are not heaven but heavenlike.

Eph. i. 3. All spiritual blessings are stored there.—Human speech could never tell the infinite variety of blessings which are required for the life of the saints. Grace to endure what God sends or permits, as well as to do what He commands. So destitute are we of natural qualities and powers that we need to receive all things that pertain to life and godliness. Everything that Christ asks of us must be received from Him before it can be yielded to Him. It is therefore a source of deep heart's-ease to learn that God has stored in Jesus every spiritual blessing. As all colour lies hidden in sunlight waiting to be drawn off by the flowers, so does help for every time of need reside in Christ.

The tense denotes a definite past act. The Apostle does not say that God does or will bless, but that He has blessed. He carries us back into the eternal ages, in which we were created in Christ, so far as the eternal purpose is concerned, and assures us that then every conceivable blessing which we should need in our earthly pilgrimage was stored up in Christ Jesus our Lord. We have not therefore to plead for these things, as though God were unwilling to give, but humbly and reverently to lay claim to them by faith. All things are thine, oh Christian soul; by which thou mayest become partaker of the divine nature, and escape the corruption that is in the world by lust.

But since these spiritual blessings are in the heavenly places, we must live upon that plane. This is where so many mistake. They know that all the land is theirs, but they do not put their foot down on it. We cannot inherit the treasures of the everlasting hills, whilst we are satisfied with the heavy air of the valleys. Our daily life must be spent in fellowship with the living Jesus, our thought and heart must not only ascend to Him but continually dwell with Him, we must experimentally sit in the heavenly places ere we can claim or possess the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him.

Eph. i. 20. Christ sits there.—It is not wonderful to find the second Person in the Holy Trinity seated far above all rule and authority and power and every name that is named. But it is wonderful to find Him there as man, wearing our nature, identified for ever with our race. The Mediator between God and man is Himself man (1 Tim. ii. 5, R.V.). The vision of Ezekiel is a literal fact—upon the likeness of the throne, which is like a sapphire stone, there is the appearance of a man, robed in fire.

We need not, therefore, anxiously inquire what "the heavenly places" are, or where. It is enough to know that they are where Jesus is, and that they are open to us, just in proportion as we live in communion with the Lord. Abide in Him, and you are by necessity an inhabitant of these heavenly places, wherever your earthly lot may be cast. They are the hallowed meeting ground, where the saints of earth come to the spirits of the just made perfect. It was of them that Bunyan spake, when, describing the land of Beulah, he said, "Here they were within sight of the city they were going to; also here met them some of the inhabitants thereof, for in this land the Shining Ones commonly walked, because it was upon the borders of heaven." Only we need not locate them as always just preceding the river.

Eph. ii. 6. We sit there in the purpose of God.—What Canaan was to the Jewish people, that the heavenly places are to us. When the twelve stones were taken from the bed of the Jordan and placed on the hither side, the whole people were deemed to have entered upon the possession of their inheritance, though, as a matter of fact, two and a-half tribes had elected to settle on the farther side, and their wives and children would probably never cross the Jordan at all. So when Jesus passed to the throne we passed with Him.

Was He raised? So were we. Was He made to sit at the Father's right hand? That is our place. Was every foe made his footstool? Then not one of them can overcome us so long as we are in abiding fellowship with our risen Lord. If the "together" of the inner life is maintained, the "together" of victory is secure. Oh, to tread in the power of the Holy Ghost on these high places!

Eph. iii. 10. Multitudes of holy beings are there.—We know little of them. The vague term principalities and powers in the heavenly places veils as much as it reveals. But we shall know them one day, and be known by them. And we shall make them know the manifold wisdom and the eternal purpose of God. Here is the ministry that shall engage our redeemed energies in the land of the unsetting sun, where the flight of time is not marked, because time shall be no more.

Eph. vi. 12. Hosts of wicked spirits are there.—Never in this life can we escape from temptation. The holier we get, the more subtle and vehement will be the assaults of the dark legions, though they may wear white over their dusky armour. The nearer we get to our Prince in thought and fellowship, the more shall we be put to it. It is from under the open heaven that we are driven to the wilderness to be tempted. There is no such fighting as in the heavenly places themselves. Here we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against the world-rulers of this darkness.

But the issue cannot be doubtful. In the thought of God they are beneath our feet and conquered; and He waits to realise His purpose in the weakest of the saints. Having done all, stand; God will fight for you and you shall hold your peace.

Let it be the one purpose of our life by faith to enjoy this blessed experience. The life hidden with Christ in God! The rest of faith! The life of abiding fellowship!

SIR ANDREW CLARK speaks very strongly of the difficulty of curing inebriety in women as compared with men; he has seen hundreds of recoveries in men, not five in women. He regards occupation as one of the prime methods of cure. He would prefer State management of the institutions, as he thinks that when retreats are in the hands of private persons their interests continually lie in conflict with their duties. Sir Andrew Clark is not only in favour of compulsion, but he states that he has the strongest possible conviction that nothing but compulsion will succeed.

CHRISTIAN LIFEBOAT CREW.—At the last muster of the Christian Lifeboat Crew, held at Miss Child's Welcome Home for Sailors, Ratcliff Highway, the Honourable Miss Waldegrave gave a graphic account of a revival which took place in the northern part of Scotland, specially among the fisherfolk, the result of which was that the prison got deserted. Miss Waldegrave also referred to the sad disaster to H.M.S. Victoria, and with thankfulness was able to say that several of the crew had come out on the Lord's side shortly before being called upon so suddenly to face death. Miss Murray gave an effective address on the words, "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." The text for the month, given by Miss Child, "Fear thou not, for I am with thee," formed the keynote of the meeting.

PREACHING TO THE "REDS."

From Lovedale there go out every Sunday small parties of native students, belonging to the theological, evangelists', and teachers' classes, to hold religious services among the heathen natives in their own kraals, distant from two to eight miles. These "reds," as the heathen natives are called on account of their wearing blankets dyed with red clay, and smearing their bodies also with the same substance, will not attend church, so the Gospel is carried by the Lovedale men right to their very doors.

Last Sunday I had the privilege of taking part in one of these services. The young man who was to act as my guide and interpreter came round for me at 8.30 a.m., and we started on foot. At the end of a two hours' march we reached the kraal we were bound for. The native hut was shaped like a huge beehive. It would probably measure about 20ft. in diameter, by 15ft. high to the dome, and one low narrow door had to serve also for window, chimney, and ventilator. The framework of the hut was of branches of trees, the thick ends of which were stuck into the ground, the tips meeting at the crown of the dome. After the framework is completed, the sides are plastered with mud, and the dome thatched, so that a fairly warm and dry dwelling is the result. Ant-heaps are used for a floor, and when well trodden it becomes almost as hard as a sun-dried brick.

We entered to find a few "reds" inside, and others came straggling in until the congregation numbered forty. They ranged from babies with innocent faces, to old men, sad, haggard, and degraded-looking. Some more of the Lovedale men, who had already been to another kraal, joined us, and I was greatly struck with the contrast between the faces of the "reds" and theirs. A Kaffir hymn was given out, and sung to a tune familiar to my ears, and one could venture to join in, for the hymn was printed in Roman characters, and phonetically spelt. During the singing one woman, who was not dressed as a "red," broke down, and sobbed as though her heart were breaking. Prayer followed the hymn, then a short address, spoken in English, and interpreted sentence by sentence into Kaffir.

The service lasted about two hours, several short addresses being given, and all listened to with the greatest attention and respect—at least outwardly. At the close I noticed tears in the eyes of one old man, and was told that he had recently thrown off heathenism, and had accepted Christ.

Here is a work in which many a Christian in the homeland could readily bear a part. Are there not those who could be well spared from their Scotch or English homes, who, having a small private income, could come to a station like Lovedale as voluntary workers? There are here a good climate, all the comforts of civilisation, an inexpensive place to live, and grand scope for work. Almost all these kraals can be reached on horseback or in a buggy, with but little fatigue, and the simple Bible teaching such as would be suitable for a class of children at home is what is needed.

Then there is the grand sphere of influence in the institution itself, where one comes into touch with so many of the pick of Africa's sons and daughters. If all these 700 or 800 were enthused with a missionary spirit, what bright hopes there would be for the speedy evangelization of this continent.

PRAYER FOR CENTRAL AFRICA.—Dr. W. Fisher, writing from Central Africa, says: "Urge friends to further energy in the matter of prayer for the spread of the Gospel in these dark lands. We must be united in this matter if we are to see God's mighty power made manifest." In compliance with this appeal, arrangements have been made for those who know and pray for brethren labouring in foreign lands to meet together at 186, Aldersgate-street, each Monday afternoon, from 3.30 to 4.30, for prayer.

HOWARD-STREET GOSPEL MISSION. — The report of this mission in the crowded Wandsworth-road shows that the Gospel work, open-air services, Gospel temperance, Bible classes, Sunday school, and other efforts have been well sustained and not a little blessed. Several cheering incidents are mentioned, in which those who had deeply fallen have been saved and reclaimed. The report may be had of the secretary, Mr. N. A. Soames, 3, New-road, Wandsworth-road, S.W.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

By Sir S. Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B.

XVII.

THE FIRST AND SECOND TRUMPETS.

In considering the series of visions heralded by the blasts of the seven angels which stood before God—the series into which the seventh opened seal expands—it is impossible to avoid thinking of that other succession of trumpet peals, sounded for seven days, and then on the last day seven times, which preceded the downfall of the giant fortress that blocked the way to the onward march of the hosts of the Lord in days of old.

The frequent periodical use of the tabernacle trumpets on the recurring sabbaths, new moons, feasts and fasts of Israel can, moreover, hardly fail to occur to our minds. These uses of trumpets in that dispensation may throw not a little light on the purpose for which they are introduced into the Apocalyptic vision.

For one thing, it is reasonable to suppose that as the successive trumpet blasts by the priests round Jericho heralded the downfall of that doomed city, accursed of God for its sins, so the soundings from the angelic lips, seven also in number, were meant to signify the existence of some great power, hostile to God, which in due time was to be overthrown by his supreme might. And, for another thing, we may conceive that as each peal from the ram's horns constituted a note of time, to which Israel was to pay heed, so that at exactly the right moment, with triumphant expectation, they might raise the grand and united shout, at which the walls of the fortress were to crash to the earth,—or, as the blasts from the silver trumpets warned the people of their weeks and months and years,—so the trumpet voices heard by the Apostle, one after the other, and each preluding a scene of judgment, were to be, as it were, a stroke on the divine chronometer, indicating to those who had ears to hear, the march of time in the great drama of the dispensation. Such, indeed, appeared to be one of the specific objects of the trumpet soundings, since we are told that it should be "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel when he should begin to sound, that the mystery of God should be finished as he hath declared to his servants the prophets."

We do well then to give more earnest heed to these mysterious, yet deeply instructive, chimes of the great horologe of prophecy, in order that "knowing the time," and that "it is high time to awake out of sleep," we may stand with our "loins girded about," and our "lights burning" "like unto men that wait for their Lord," "for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed."

In that spirit let us take our stand with the seer in Patmos, and beholding the scenes that passed before his eyes, endeavour to interpret the visions, first by the aid which the employment of similar symbols in prophecies already fulfilled affords, and next by such light as history lends us.

"The first angel sounded, and there followed hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were cast upon the earth; and the third part of trees was burnt up, and all green grass was burnt up." We are looking upon that miniature representation of the Roman Empire, with its continents and islands, its seas and rivers, its mountains and plains that, in relievo, lay stretched out before the Apostle's view. And it is across a third part of this vast territory that a tremendous tempest, black with clouds from the hail-generating countries of the North, and with lightning-fire running along the ground, burning in wide-spreading conflagration country and town, trees and pasture, bursts in all its fury. A fearful destruction of life accompanies it, for blood is mixed with the hail and the fire; the desolation that is left on all sides is terrific; "a fire devoureth—a flame burneth; the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness."

The picture presented to us is too graphic to be misunderstood. The symbols employed are well known. It is impossible to quote the numerous instances in which the fire and the tempest, the lightning the thunder and the hail are used in Old Testament prophecies to set forth the destructive character of hostile invasions, and the infliction of divine judgments by providential means, the trees and the grass denoting the peoples thereby affected. But among a host of such passages I may refer, as well-known illustrations of similar symbolic language, in cases where the predictions have been confessedly fulfilled, and the meaning of the symbols thereby definitely ascertained, to Is. xxx. 27—32; xxxiii. 9—14.; xxxiv. 5—9; Ez. xxxi.; Amos vii. 1—4. Thus interpreted, it is clearly some terrible scourge of war that is seen to be inflicted upon the trumpet clang of the first angel, and one specially affecting "the earth" or land, as distinguishing the scene of judgment from those which follow.

"And the second angel sounded, and as it were a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea; and the third part of the sea became blood; and the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life, died; and the third part of the ships were destroyed."

A volcano, vomiting its streams of lava and clouds of stones and ashes, upheaved from its base, falls into the Mediterranean, and on the coasts and islands of that "third" portion of the empire its destructive results are at once visible. Ships are set on fire at sea and in the harbours, and light up the waters with their conflagrations. Blood marks the loss of life accompanying. Over the whole maritime scene of devastation whatever is habitable appears desolated, whatever has life, destroyed.

Again, the symbolic language of Old Testament prophecy fixes the meaning of the vision. A great, a burning, a destroying mountain, denotes some overwhelming, desolating power. Thus was the might of the Medes figured, which, as "the weapons of the Lord's indignation," was to destroy the whole land of the Babylonian empire (Is. xiii. 2, 4, 5, and passim). And Babylon itself is described in Jer. li. 25, in almost the very words of our text, as the "destroying mountain which destroyest all the earth," which was to be "rolled down from the rocks" and become a "burnt mountain." So again, the power which was opposed to Zerubbabel in his work of rebuilding the temple, is addressed as "a great mountain" (Zech. iv. 7).

The interpretation of the symbols being thus defined by their ascertained meaning in prophecies already fulfilled, we have now to ask whether history records any events of such a character as will fairly and reasonably correspond to the scenes of the vision. The answer is direct and clear.

The period of ominous calm having ended, "the threatening tempest of barbarians hitherto suspended on the frontiers," burst upon the Roman Empire, i.e., upon that "third part" of it which was the result of its tripartition in A.D. 311, between Constantine, Licinius, and Maximin, when to the former was assigned the western third, consisting of Gaul, Spain, Britain, Italy, and Africa (Elliott, vol. i. pp. 328—336).

First there descended from the Alps on to the Italian plains, Alaric, King of the Visigoths, made Master-General of the Eastern Illyricum by the infatuation of the Emperor Arcadius. His course, as he afterwards told an Italian monk, was directed by "a secret and preternatural impulse—to the gates of Rome"—a course marked, as historians tell us, at each step by ravage, conflagration, and blood. Almost at the same time Rhadagasius, from the far north of Germany, with a host of Vandals, Suevi, and Burgundians, burst "like a dark thundercloud from the Baltic," as Gibbon describes it, first on the Swiss and Italian valleys, and then on the fertile provinces of Gaul and Spain. "The consuming flames of war," he writes, "spread from the banks of the Rhine over the greatest part of the seventeen provinces of Gaul. The scene of peace and plenty was suddenly changed into a desert, and the prospect of smoking ruins could alone distinguish the solitude of nature from the desolation of man." "The passage of the Rhine," he adds, "may be considered as the fall of the Roman Empire in the countries beyond the Alps." Then, in A.D. 410, Alaric, having accomplished his destiny, dies in Brutium, on the southernmost coast of Italy, and is buried in the bed of the river, the secret being concealed by the massacre of the prisoners who built his sepulchre. How marvellously does the history correspond to the Apocalyptic vision! Is it possible for symbolic language and scene to depict the events more accurately or more graphically?

Next appeared the Vandal Genseric, who, in A.D. 429, transporting his hordes from Spain to Africa, took and burned, first Hippo and then Carthage, thus severing the province from the Western Empire. Then his fleets, issuing from the port of the last-mentioned city, claimed the command of the Mediterranean. Sicily, Sardinia, and the other western isles—all that was in "the third part of the sea"—were conquered by them,—a part which included all of the western sea that lay between Gibraltar and the further shores of the Adriatic. Thus were the coasts of Spain, Gaul, and Italy ravaged by him. When asked by his pilot what course to steer, "Leave the determination to the winds," was Genseric's reply; "they will transport us to the guilty coast, whose inhabitants have provoked the divine justice."

Twice were the Roman navies, with vast preparations, collected to oppose the Vandal power. But in the harbours of Carthagena and Bona they were utterly overwhelmed, so that, in the very words of the prophecy, not only was all that was habitable in the maritime third of the Western Empire destroyed, but "the third part of the ships" also.

Can we doubt that these were the events, so fateful and pregnant in their effects upon the Roman Empire, which were shown to the Apostle by means of the almost speaking imagery of the visions heralded by the first two angelic trumpet-blasts? The periods when they occurred, the Scriptural use of the symbols employed to represent them, and the narratives of secular historians, themselves sometimes disbelievers in Christianity, combine to attest the truth of the saying, that the key of history alone avails to open the lock of prophecy.

A DIVINE DIALOGUE.

"I stand at the door and knock."
"Who art Thou, Lord?"
"One whom the proud priests mock,
Deaf to my Word.
But loving thee, thus late
With thee I plead and wait
For kiss and rest."
"Enter, O Guest."

"'Tis I, be not afraid."
"And who art Thou?"
"A Covert and a Shade
For throbbing brow:
Yea, in a weary land
Of summer heat and sand,
A Rest am I."
"There let me lie."

"Lovest Me more than these?"
"But who art Thou?"
"A King to whom all knees
Shall one day bow:
But once a robe of scorn
And crown of twisted thorn
For thee I wore."
"Lord, I adore."

"Tis I! Be not afraid."
"And who art Thou?"
"A Lover who hath made
The deathless vow
To love and lead his own,
Through death to bliss and throne
And marriage feast."
"Even me, the least?"

"Arise, and follow Me."
"But who art Thou?"
"A Guide and Staff for thee,
Yea here, and now;
An arm for aid alway,
A Light upon the way,
Before thine eyes."
"I will arise."

"Tis I! Be not afraid."
"Say, who art Thou?"
"For me thy heart was made,
Thou knowest not how;
But Lord of thee I stand,
Thy Hope, thy Home, thy Hand,
Thy Sun, thy Shield."
"Oh God, I yield."

"Be watchful! Pray."
"But wherefore, Lord? for whom?"
"Light is passing away,
Soon through the gloom
Cometh Bridegroom apace
In the closing hour of grace;
And for his dear sake—"
"I shall awake."

THE MILDMAY CONFERENCE.

THURSDAY EVENING.

On the last evening of the Conference the great hall was crowded in every part. Rev. J. Hudson Taylor presided, in place of Mr. E. Trotter, who was prevented by indisposition. Having read John vii. 37-39, the Chairman pointed out that even as on the last great day of the feast, after all the privileges and blessings of the Feast of Tabernacles, Jesus knew that there were some unsatisfied hearts, so at the close of this happy Conference, in which many had been blessed, there might be thirsty and unsatisfied ones. To all such comes the sweet invitation of the Lord, "Come unto Me and drink." Moreover, He promises not simply to satisfy, but to make to overflow, so that we may become channels of blessing to others around us. The Chairman closed by quoting a word which had been blessed to himself thirty-one years ago at the first Mildmay Conference he ever attended. "My soul, wait thou only upon God, for my expectation is from Him." While we so wait, not on man but on God alone, He will give us overflowing blessing. A season of prayer followed, led by Dr. M'Killiam and Rev. J. S. Fox.

The Restoration of Israel and Universal Blessing.

BY REV. JOHN WILKINSON

This address opened with the words of Isaiah xliii. 21, "This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise," intimating the Divine purpose in the election and preservation of Israel. Instalments of that purpose had already been given, as (1) a knowledge of God—"Ye are my witnesses, saith Jehovah"; (2) A Bible—"He showed his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel; He hath not dealt so with any nation." And "To them were committed the oracles of God"; (3) A Saviour—"Of them, as concerning the flesh, Christ came." These precious instalments of the purpose of God in Israel were now historic facts. The purpose of God in Israel is not yet completed, for Israel is preserved at the cost of miraculous power, and God does not waste miraculous power. So we infer there must be for Israel in the future some mission commensurate in its importance with the magnitude of the miracle exercised in their preservation. That mission is that Israel shall be a channel and an instrument of blessing to the whole world.

The Gentiles can neither absorb nor annihilate Israel; but in seeking to crush Israel they not only fail, but they bring down the mischief intended for the Jew directly on their own heads, as witness Egypt, Babylon, Persia, Russia. "I will curse him that curseth thee"; "I will punish all that oppress them"; "I will take the cup out of thy hand, and will put it into the hand of them that afflicted thee"; "His mischief shall return upon his own head."

Some say that Israel's mission is fulfilled, so that future restoration to Palestine is neither desirable nor possible. Israel must be understood spiritually of the Church. This, however, holds only in the case of blessings promised. The curses under Israel's name for Israel's many sins are still to be understood in a literal sense! Is this kind of interpretation just? Others say that all the promises of restoration to Palestine were fulfilled on restoration from Babylon.

Let us carefully notice that we can know nothing about the restoration of the Jews or their future mission beyond or apart from

WHAT GOD HAS TOLD US.

All we can know is inside the Bible, and is God's revelation. All that is outside the Bible on these subjects is human speculation. Then, to the simple Word of God, five points in proof of a future restoration:—

(1) Israel (the whole twelve tribes) is to be restored a second time. "The Lord shall set his hand again the second time to restore," etc.

(2) "From the four corners of the earth." Isaiah xi. 11-12.

(3) "No more scattered." Amos ix. 15.

(4) The promised land is still the Land of Promise. 30,000 square miles—Dan to Beersheba—was actually possessed; but 300,000 miles are within the boundaries of the land promised, i.e., twice and a-half as large as Great Britain and Ireland.

(5) The land is to be differently distributed, and the tribes differently located, according to the latter chapters of Ezekiel, than was the case in any part of Israel's past history.

Before the time of universal blessing the purpose of the present dispensation must be completed in the gathering of the Church; the restoration of Israel, and "the time of Jacob's trouble," followed by the destruction of Antichrist, the cessation of war, and the conversion of the surviving remnant of the Jewish nation. In the present dispensation the Holy Spirit is doing for the Lord Jesus Christ what Eliezer did for Isaac—fetching and preparing a bride; and during this same period the Church is to evangelise the world by preaching the Gospel "to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile." But the world will no more be evangelised without the Jew in this dispensation, than blessed without the Jew in the millennial age. The Jew stands first as an individual now as really as he stands first as a nation then. After the restoration of the Jews we have "the time of Jacob's trouble." See Jer. xxx. 6, 7; Dan. xii. 1; and Matt. xxiv. 21.

In this trouble Antichrist will make a supreme effort to destroy the nation, probably saying, "Come, let us destroy them as a nation, that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance." And why? Because the existence of to the universal acceptance of the creed of Antichrist—a denial of the Father and the Son. At this moment Christ returns to Olivet, his Church having met Him in the air, and returns with Him. Antichrist is destroyed, war ceases, the Jews look on Him and acknowledge Him; He takes the throne of David, and reigns over the house of Jacob; He reigns "in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously," "and the Lord is King over all the earth; there shall be one Lord, and his name one."

The geographical portion of Israel in relation to the world was described as the most central, and arranged by Divine appointment for universal blessing, and confirmed by Deut. xxxii. 8; Act xvii. 26; and Ezek. v. 5. God's position in relation to Israel is to be in the "midst of them." Palestine in the midst of the earth; Jerusalem in the midst of the nations; Israel in the midst of Jerusalem; Christ in the midst of Israel; and God in the midst of Christ. The Jew has now found in restoration and conversion his geographical and moral centre, and is now in the best place and state for blessing the world. "Sing, and rejoice, O daughter of Zion; for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith Jehovah." "Cry out and shout, thou inhabitants of Zion; for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee." In Ezek. xi. the glory in vision departs from the midst of the city and stands on Olivet—a picture of a rejected and departing Lord; but in Ezek. xliii. 1-7, we have a vision of Christ's return. "I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever."

Israel will be the channel and instrument of universal blessing. "I will bless thee": "Thou shalt be a blessing." To what extent? "In thee, and in thy seed, shall all the families of the earth be blessed." What is the blessing? The Gospel. "The Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the Gentiles by faith, preached beforehand the Gospel to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." "Happy art thou, O Israel, who is like unto thee, a people saved by Jehovah?" Deut. xxxiii. 29. Psalm lxvii. opens in prayer and closes in faith with reference to the blessing of the world through Israel. "Thou shalt arise and have mercy upon Zion . . So the nations shall fear thy name and all the kings of the earth thy glory" (Psalm cii.). The Word of God is just flooded with and of blessing to the world through Israel. Isaiah ii. and Mic. iv. tell of Israel restored, the rebuilt Temple, universal peace, the house of Jacob walking in the light of the Lord, and all nations flowing to Jerusalem for blessing and from Jerusalem with blessing. "Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isaiah xxvii. 6). "Moreover, the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days; when the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound" (Isaiah xxx. 26). "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem, for the Lord hath comforted his people, He hath redeemed Jerusalem." Now see the next verse: "The Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God" (Isaiah lii. 9, 10). "For thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will extend peace to her (Jerusalem) like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream" (Isaiah lxvi. 12). "In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the earth: Whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance" (Isaiah xix. 24, 25).

The name "my people," specially belonging to Israel, is to be given to the Egyptians, and is also to be applied to other Gentile nations, for when the Lord comes and dwells in the midst of Israel, then "many nations shall be joined to the Lord in that day, and shall be my people" (Zech. ii. 11). There is yet a glorious passage which throws all these promises into historic facts. "He hath remembered his mercy and his faithfulness towards the house of Israel; all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God" (Ps. xcviii. 3). Thus prophecy becomes history, and our blessed Lord sees of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied with the result of his atoning sufferings and of his glorious reign.

It is high time the Church in her missionary enterprises turned her attention to Israel; but she can still hold conferences and write pamphlets about the evangelisation of the world, and leave the Jew out of account, as though he had been wiped from the face of the earth. All went well so long as the Jew had his right place in the opening years of this dispensation. Since the Divine order, "To the Jew first," has been reversed by the Church, but never reversed by God, we have had the dark ages; and at the end of nearly two thousand years we have to report eight hundred or a thousand millions unevangelised. Humanly speaking, the world might have been, and ought to have been, evangelised hundreds of years ago. A most striking passage of Scripture is found in Psalm lix. 13: "Consume in thy wrath, consume, that they be no more; and let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth." God will have his own work done in his own way. In the presence of so much truth about Israel's restoration and universal blessing through Israel, "Serve now the Lord your God, and his people Israel." (2 Chron. xxxv. 3.)

Col. Morton read a variety of requests for the suffering Stundists and Armenians, the banished Jews, the fresh party of missionaries for Uganda, and priest-ridden Malta. The invitation sent to Messrs. Moody and Sankey to come to London at the end of 1893 for a prolonged mission was also made a special matter of prayer. These petitions were laid before God by the new Bishop of Western Equatorial Africa (Rev. J. S. Hill) and Dr. Moxey.

COMING JUDGMENTS.

Rev. H. Grattan Guinness, D.D., said: I am much impressed with the fact that unintentionally the programme entirely omits the judicial aspect of the subject. We have considered—The establishment of His dominion, the manifestation of His glory, the satisfaction of His desire, the reception of His saints, the glorification of His people, the transformation of His people, the eternal purpose which He proposed, and the restoration of Israel and universal blessing. In reading that programme we observe that, wise and excellent as it is, it unintentionally omits one of the principal aspects, in which the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ is viewed in the Gospels, Epistles, and Apocalypse. In the teaching of Christ Himself, as in the Sermon on the Mount, in Matt xiii., and in his great prophecy, Matt. xxiv. and xxv., the judicial aspect is very prominent. So in the writings of the apostles James, Peter, Paul, and John the judicial element of that coming is placed first; therefore we may not omit it.

Before that coming, before the righteous can shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father, every single tare must be taken out of the field in which the tares and the wheat are now growing side by side. In Matt. xiii. 30, the statement is perfectly clear—

FIRST, THE TARES.

"Let both grow together until the harvest; and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my barn." It is not ours to root up the tares; it is the angels who are to do that. So again in verse 41: "The Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire." Compare 1 Thess. v. 2, 3, and Matt. xxiv. 37-39. Again in 2 Thess. i. 7-9, where the apostle describes in detail that solemn advent, he shows us Christ coming "in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel." I remind you also that in Rev. xix. the millennium is introduced by "the treading of the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God." It is the day of his vengeance, and his vesture is dipped in blood, as also in Isa. lxiii. 1-4. Thus the millennium opens, and it is closed by another phase of judgment, the judgment of the Great White Throne.

I return to that simple formula — first the tares, first the tares. The tares are among us and around us. The tares mean, I believe, all in Christendom bearing the name of Jesus Christ, but destitute of his Spirit. Thus we learn that the Lord Jesus Christ, for whom we watch, and wait, and long, will come in judgment as well as in grace. "Who shall stand in the great day of his wrath?" Remember that coming will make a clean sweep of Christendom. The Lord will take away his own, but ere He do so He will take from among them all that profess to be his own and are not. Remember that the tares must go before the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. These are solemn truths; may God grant their application to our hearts and minds.

After a few closing words from the Chairman, the proceedings of the Conference were concluded with praise and prayer.

Communion Address.

BY REV. J. OSWALD DYKES, D.D.

WE are not come together to instruct or to exhort one another. We are come together to meditate and to worship. In a very special sense, our Lord is present with us, not quite as He is at all times present, but He is addressing Himself to us, in this solemn service, through unaccustomed channels. He is addressing Himself not to the ear, but to the eye, and to the touch, and to the taste; speaking to us very tenderly, very graciously, through these three senses, by the emblems which He has put into our hands; and not only speaking to us by these emblems, but giving Himself to us through these emblems, giving Himself to each of us, a whole Christ, in the bread and in the cup.

How solemn and how tender is this fellowship with Christ! How awful is the place of our communion! Oh, how we should seek to come with deepest reverence, with lowliest humility, with perfect penitence, each of us retiring, as it were, into our own secret heart, with the Lord alone, opening up all that is in us to his kind inspection, and yet his kind judgment; confessing sin, but accepting Him who is the cure for sin, receiving our Lord into the centre of our hearts and lives.

The word that seems to me to sum up best the exercise of the soul in this sacrament is the word communion. That means, you know, fellowship. It means that two persons share and share together in the same things. It is a very blessed communion and sharing alike that we have with one another. St. Paul, you remember, reminds the Corinthians of the one loaf which we break, and bids them see in that an

of the One Body of all believers in Christ their Head. And this sweet thought which belongs so properly to this sacrament of the unity of Christ's people in Him, is a peculiarly appropriate thought to-day—when we are assembled, not as the members of a single branch in the Body of Christ, but when we are gathered from many Churches—leading us to feel how completely all our outward differences vanish in the presence of our crucified Master, and how completely, in the unity of the common life which we share in Him, we are members one of another. That which we share with each other is nothing else and nothing less than Christ Himself.

Yes, but if this tie which binds us all to one another as members of Christ is to be realised by us at all, it must be because we realise, each one for himself and for herself, a personal tie with the common Lord. We find one another only in finding Him; and I think, therefore, we ought primarily to remember the communion which exists between our soul and Jesus Christ Himself. If I would put that into brief words—as I must be brief—I should say that what is common to us and to Jesus Christ is, first, a common death, and then a common life. The death of Jesus, by which He bids us remember Him, is that which constitutes the chief tie binding the penitent sinner to the Saviour. Not Christ our Teacher, not Christ our Example, not Christ our Master, do we think of here, primarily. We think of Him who loved us and gave Himself for us upon the cross.

And He would have us regard that death of his, by which we remember Him, which is the crown of his obedience and his sacrifice, as something of ours which He took to Himself; for the death for sin and the death to sin was our death, of our deserving, of our bringing. It was by coming into close personal union with us, bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, that, through the mystery of the sacred incarnation, in our death. When you look at the outside of it, you say that the hands of wicked men, of Jews, of Roman soldiers, put Him to death; but when you look to the inner side of the fact, must not each one of us say, "I caused his death, my sin explains his death; but for my sin, there had been no power given to Jew or to Roman to lay cruel hands on Him. Because I sinned, He must die. I am verily guilty of that death"?

HE MADE HIMSELF OUR FELLOW

And that is not all, but the soul of his dying was that inward experience and suffering of his soul, so strangely hidden from us, and into which we find it so hard to penetrate even a little. It was not the sufferings of the mangled body, but the sufferings of the soul, when He, by sympathy, entered into the sinner's place; when He took upon Himself, by sympathy, the sinner's doom; when He, realising what our sin meant and what God's attitude toward sin is, suffered, for sin, in his soul. And so, it was our death and our dying. Literally, because our sin lay upon his heart, did his heart break for sin.

The mystery of that union in which He made Himself so marvellously near to each of us, as to take all the consequences of our bitter sin upon his soul—the secret of that mystery was love. I believe that the atoning suffering of the Son of God is not intelligible, even in the smallest degree, save through this avenue of the perfect love of the Son of God for sinners. Because He loved the sinner He was able to understand what the sinner's sin had done for him, how it had robbed him of the light of the Father's countenance, and driven him away into the waste land. Through love He entered so fully into the fellowship of that experience that into his soul, too, the iron would enter. Ah! brethren, if we would understand the sorrow of Jesus with sinners, we must understand the love of Jesus for sinners. He Himself said, "Greater love hath no man than this that a man lay down his life for his friend." To speak reverently, it was a modest word. His love was greater. He did not lay down his life for his friends; for what saith St. Paul?

"WHEN WE WERE ENEMIES

we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son." It is true, greater love hath no other man than that he lay down his life for his friend; but greater was the love of this Man, who was the eternal Son of God in the flesh, for He laid down his life for you and for me when we were his enemies.

Dearly beloved, Jesus shares our death, but only that He may make us sharers in his life. Here we have the other side of this blessed eucharist. As a commemoration, it reminds us of the union and fellowship which Jesus was pleased to make with us in our sinful state, in the fruit and penalty of our sin. But, as a meal, a supper, a feast, it brings to light that mystic union by which we become sharers with Him in the power of his risen life. I do not know that I can, in the closing moments of my brief address, say anything that will help you into a realisation of this mystery; but I only remind you as an aid to your meditation of that wonderful abiding, that twofold abiding of which the Master himself spoke. "Abide in Me, and I in you"—that is the mystic unity of life between you and Christ of which I would have you think. It has two sides.

How do we abide in Him? Brethren, we abide in Him simply by surrender, for I think that word will cover the two forms of self-surrender. One is the surrender of trust, the other the surrender of obedience. The one is the surrender that opens the soul to receive Christ as our life, our light, our hope, our strength, our joy; the other is the surrender that lays all the active powers of our nature perfectly in his hand for his blessed use. So, we abide in Him, and He abides in us, by the influence, by the force, of his own risen life, inspiring and informing us. What is the secret of this communion, between two, between you and your Lord? It is the same as the secret of his fellowship with us in dying. It is love. There is no understanding that bringing of two souls, two lives, into one, so that they become perfect in one, apart from love—love that takes all and love that gives all. He took all from us when He took our sin and death upon Him. We take all from Him, when we take Him to be our all in all, opening wide our whole nature, as I pray God that we may do now, to take in, as we take these emblems into our bodies, to take into us, body, soul, and spirit, the whole living risen Christ of God. He gave Himself to us. When He gives us his body and his blood, He means that He is giving his whole self to us, his very self, to work in us, to educate us, to enlighten us, to gladden us, to use us, to reward us, to bless us. And we give ourselves to Him when, in an act of supreme consecration and dedication, we give up our being to his service and his use, abjuring other lords, forswearing other ends, that we may be wholly and solely his.

THIS FELLOWSHIP OF LIFE,

So may we receive to-day the whole Christ. As Christ's love prompts Him to give Himself, so let us give to Him our whole selves, with a consuming love which answers back to his; that, He abiding in us, and we abiding in Him, there may be henceforth no severance at all between us, but a perfect union that should be consummated in the everlasting blessedness of the Father's house.

A Missionary Farewell.

ON Tuesday week, in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, 186, Aldersgate-street, a well-attended meeting was held to bid farewell and "God speed" to Mr. G. F. Gale on his departure for Natal to take up mission work. Rev. F. H. Baring, M.A., presided. After prayer and praise, Pastor W. F. Gooch bore testimony to Mr. Gale's earnestness and his fitness for the work in which he is about to engage, and added that he felt confident that Mr. Gale was going out because the Lord had called him, and that he could not do otherwise. He was not going in the interests of any sect or party, but simply with the view of winning souls for Christ. Mr. Osborne Morgan spoke from personal knowledge of the scope there is for mission work among the natives as well as Europeans. Mr. Gale then briefly addressed the meeting, speaking modestly yet hopefully of the vocation he is about to enter upon. Rev. F. B. Meyer and Mr. Robert Burn also took part in the proceedings. Mr. Gale goes out under the auspices of the Missionary Bureau.

SPITALFIELDS LODGING-HOUSE.—An earnest band of workers hold services in five common lodging-houses, and they have lately been much blessed. Special efforts in the way of breakfasts and teas are organised, and those who give evidence of a genuine desire to escape from the awful surroundings of the common kitchens are helped so far as possible The superintendent is Mr. Millership, 87, Old Montague-street, E.

HOP-PICKERS, ALTON.—The hop-picking season will soon be here, and thousands of people will be in the neighbourhood. Six large tents were erected last year, one outhouse was fitted up for services, and all were well filled. We want to repeat these efforts, but shall be unable unless friends will help us at once. Contributions may be sent to the Capital and Counties Bank, Alton, Hants, or direct to me.

HOW A DARK WAY WAS LIGHTENED.

Charlie and his mother were in trouble. I will tell you what it was about, and how it disappeared. Charlie's father had been very ill, but he had gradually recovered, and had gone into the country for change of air. It was the very day they were expecting him to return home that Charlie and his mother were in trouble.

They were standing in their little kitchen, and the mother was talking to her son. "Charlie," she said, "what shall we do? I find I have only three-halfpence in the house, and that won't buy much supper for your father to-night. How I wish we had something nice for him when he comes home! Let us tell God about it."

And so they did. All day long the mother and her son were carrying about in their hearts a longing that God would send them in a good supper to welcome the tired father on his return home.

Charlie had to go to work. The mother turned from hers, which had already begun, to bid him good-bye. Then all through the day she was called hither and thither by many a claim. The little ones came clamouring for her care and attention, and her spare moments were spent in making the home look bright and pleasant for her husband's return. She looked up occasionally from her work to remind her Father in heaven of the need which was lying so heavily on her heart.

So the day wore on—a winter's day, when the darkness comes on during the afternoon. But the little gate never swung open to let any visitor in, and nobody came near the house all day.

This was sad news to tell Charlie when he came home. It was getting late. The train would soon be due which was bringing Charlie's father home. His mother called to him to come with her to a small shop where they could change the halfpence into some fish for the traveller's supper.

They were just about to leave the house, when a quick step was heard outside, and was presently followed by the postman's knock.

"Run, Charlie, and get the letter," said his mother; "perhaps your father is not coming back to-night after all." The letter was in a strange handwriting, and Charlie, by his mother's request, tore the envelope open, and read the letter to her.

You shall read it also.

"Dear Mrs. Jones,—

"It just struck me that, as your husband is returning home this evening, you will be glad to buy a hot supper for him. I enclose one shilling and sixpence. "Ever yours truly,

"Mary Browne."

Can you imagine how happy this letter made Charlie and his mother? They went out and bought a good supper, and after they had met the traveller at the railway station they all returned home together.

A very happy evening followed, in which they unitedly thanked God for his goodness to them, in having answered their prayer and supplied their need.

This is a true story. Whenever Mrs. Jones has a care, she takes it straight to her Father in heaven. What do you do when you are in trouble? Even when small troubles come—when your lessons are very difficult, when your sums won't come right, when a wet day comes and mars your pleasure, what do you do?

There are two things which we may do. We can make ourselves and everybody else very unhappy about them, or we can "show God our trouble" and receive his peace instead.

He loves to keep us, and to hear our prayers. He hears the young ravens when they cry; He sees the sparrows when they fall. You are of much more value. If you are one of those happy boys or girls who belong to the Lord Jesus Christ, if your sins are all forgiven, then God is your own Father. He loves to hear your voice, so on no account be silent to Him when you are troubled.

"Give others the sunshine, Tell Jesus the rest."

CHILD'S HYMN.

Shepherd, hear my morning prayer,
I down here, and Thou up there.
Teach me daily how to pray,
Keep me safely all this day.

Wash me, feed me, clothe me, now,
Carry me—Thou knowest how.
Keep me always in the light,
Keep my "goings" pure and bright.

Bless my dear relations, Lord!
Keep them resting in thy Word.
Bless my friends, and grant that we
One in Christ may ever be.

May I ever watchful be,
Till thy blessed face I see,
Girded loins and burning light,
Till I "walk with Thee in white."

BEYROUT ORPHANAGE

FOR MOSLEM AND DRUSE GIRLS.

I have received letters from Miss Taylor, of the above institution, giving details of a most interesting work among the scholars under her charge. The training of these children is conducted on strictly Christian lines, and from time to time the fruit of Miss Taylor's enthusiastic and self-denying labours has been manifested most encouragingly. Many of those who have been under her care are now the consistent Christian mothers of contented and prosperous households, and Miss Taylor has had children and grandchildren of her earlier pupils under her care.

She gives this account of the present awakening: "Notwithstanding all our difficulties (referring to the need of additional funds to carry on the work), we have much blessing among us, and God has answered our prayer, not only on behalf of the girls who will be leaving the school in July, but quite a number of the younger children—in all twenty-eight. For years I have been waiting for this, and I think we have been more in earnest lately, because of those who are leaving, and I have been exercised as to their future.

"It came about in this way. I had asked Dr. and Mrs. Webster to come on Sunday, the 11th (June), to our service, and speak to the children in the evening. He first spoke to the little ones before they retired to bed, while I translated for him. Then for the others he read a few verses from John x. All were so attentive. He sat down and said, 'This is enough.' I said, 'No! Let us go back to the blood.' A few sentences were added, 'If Jesus in his love has done so much for us, what should we do for Him?' They said, 'Give ourselves!' 'Who among you have given themselves, or are willing to give yourselves?' They all at once, with myself, stood up. Touched to the quick, I said, 'My dear girls, take care what you are doing: do nothing rashly: think over what this means, and before you go to bed tell the Lord Jesus what you would like to do, and come to me in the morning and tell me what you have done.'

"So in the morning D. came broken-hearted because of sin, and on her knees asked the Lord Jesus to receive her as she is, and asked Him to give her a heart full of love to serve Him who so loved her as to die for her. She receives Him as her Saviour, and asks Him by his Holy Spirit to help her to serve Him all her days, and be a living witness for Jesus among her own people. Her verse is: 'Search me, O God, and know my heart...and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.'

"I read to her what I wrote of her own words, as I did to those who gave themselves in 1885, and after asking the Lord to bless her and keep her in all her ways, and make use of her among her own people, with an affectionate kiss she left the room."

Miss Taylor gives details of nearly all the twenty-eight cases. I only quote one more, that of a little Jewish girl, whose mother entrusted her and a sister to Miss Taylor to be brought up under Christian training. This child said: "I am a little Jewish girl, and I have searched in my father's religion, and they have no Saviour. I have known since I came to you that Jesus Christ is the only Saviour of sinners, and I think it better not to wait until I grow old, but give myself now, as we learn from your teaching He receives little children, and the gentleman yesterday and you told us not to wait, but before we go to bed to give ourselves to Jesus. When I read in Matthew all the miracles that Jesus did, I believe more and more He could be no other than the Son of God?"

May I ask your readers to pray for these twenty-eight and all the previous converts? The Mission with its out-school is most interesting and efficient, and I shall be happy to send the full reports to any who send me their address, as well as to receive and forward to Miss Taylor any help offered. Funds are much wanted. Wm. Ferguson.

IN THE CHAPEL ROYAL, ST. JAMES'S.

JULY 6, 1893.

(Written during the Ceremony.)

A nation's heart doth loyally
Now throb in earnest prayer,
That Thou, O Father, King of kings,
Wilt bless the royal pair;
Oh, place Thyself a diadem,
That fadeth not away,
Of perfect love and holiness
Upon each brow to-day!

All tenderly, with whispered breath,
We pray Thee bless the bride;
And bless abundantly the one
Now kneeling at her side!
Oh, grant that their united lives
May England's joy become;
May Honour's banner ever grace
Their pure bright English home!

Whatever winds shall sweep o'erhead,
May that fair flag be seen;
May they maintain with loving pride
The honour of our Queen;
The honour of our nation's God,
The honour of our land;
Till they, through Jesus Christ their Lord,
In Higher Courts shall stand.

PROPOSED SCHOOL FOR ALGECIRAS.

Mr. William Watson, who labours in connection with the South Spanish Mission at Algeciras, writes:—"Every day the need of a day school is more evident to us, and we are persuaded that the time has come for one to be opened. All the scholars here, free and other, are under the administration of the Roman Catholics, and many parents would sooner allow their children to grow up in ignorance than send them to these schools, whereas they would gladly send them to a mission school. Our hearts are saddened to see the number of children who are growing up in utter ignorance of everything except vice, or else are being daily taught error which must bring forth fruit unto death.

"The law of the country does not permit of a day school being held in buildings used for religious purposes. It also requires that the teacher be Spanish, and not a foreigner. With these two conditions we have to comply in order to open a day school. Although in a separate building from the mission itself, yet it would be entirely under our supervision and control, and in every case an Evangelical institution. I know of a hall to let, and which is in every way well suited to this purpose. For £60 per annum we could secure the services of a good Spanish teacher (certificated).

"I shall be very glad to give further particulars to any who may wish it. In the meantime we have improvised one of the rooms in the mission home as a school, but this can only be as a temporary measure."

The hon. treasurer of the Mission is Mrs. Todd Osborne, Rysland, Newton Mearns, N.B.

THESE LITTLE ONES, fresh from the hand of God, what was their mission in this world? Made loveable, to love and to be loved, it is theirs surely to win the sad and weary, the careless and depressed back to the thought of God.—Mrs. G. S. Reaney.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, JULY 16.—JOB XVII.

Job still continues his complaint against his friends. He says that he could bear his awful sorrow, which seemed likely to bring him to the grave, if only he were delivered from their mockery. He asks that God would arbitrate between him and them. God, after all, is the supreme court of appeal, and it is He who strikes hands, i.e., becomes our security at his bar, in the person of Jesus. Let us turn from mistaken friends and open foes, and make our appeal to God, waiting quietly until He arise to avenge us, and bring on those that hate us deserved and appropriate punishment (5).

The righteous shall hold on his way. Darkness and misunderstanding may hem him in, but, if only he will keep his hands clean and maintain his integrity, he shall wax stronger and stronger. The darkness shall pass and the sun shine again. There are times in all lives when our only method is to take one step at a time, as God shall indicate his will, doing right because it is right. Sometimes the height of virtue and of faith is just to hold on; having done all things we can but stand.

The soul of man is so insatiable that it cannot be satisfied if death is extinction, even if we look to the grave as being related to us as closely as our father and mother; yet the mere prospect of death is not sufficient to quench the fever within. We pine for immortality, for the adjustment of all things at the bar of Christ, and for the everlasting blessedness to compensate for the wrongs and ills of time.

MONDAY, JULY 17.—JOB XVIII.

Bildad remonstrates with Job for counting his friends as beasts and unclean, and says that the patriarch must not expect that the laws of the universe should be altered on account of him, either the earth forsaken, or the rock removed. It is inevitable, he says, that wicked men should be punished, and become as the expiring spark of an Arab's fire; that the steps of his strength should be straightened; that his feet should be caught in a net; that terrors should chase him; and after witnessing Job's sufferings Bildad argues that something in him must have been their cause, a conclusion which as we know was false.

At the same time what a terrible enumeration of agony is given as the portion of the wicked. The observation of those days under the guidance of inspiration has catalogued the results of sin. And though in the case of Job there was no warrant for Bildad's insinuation, yet if we observe the results of sin in our own circle, we shall be able to match every feature from circumstances occurring around us. "Such are the dwellings of the unrighteous and this is the place of Him that knoweth not God." We can no more break the laws of the moral world with impunity than we can those of the physical, but all this only magnifies the marvels of that death which once and for ever put away sin, and of that grace which works through the physical and natural consequences, transforming them.

TUESDAY, JULY 18.—JOB XIX.

Job is sore vexed. He wonders that they who have reproached him ten times are not ashamed. He protests that even if he has erred, God would deal with him, altogether apart from their interposition. He appeals for pity, because, in addition to his sorrows, God had fenced up his way, and darkened his path. "Have pity on me, O my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me."

Out of the midst of his soul-anguish, there arises a conviction that God will yet vindicate him in the coming time. If not the present yet the future should see him vindicated. He wished, therefore, that his words could be preserved for posterity, to whom he appealed, to read. And then there follows the magnificent outburst which has never ceased to ring down the ages (25). Amongst the Bedouin the institution of the Goel still exists, as it did then, for the avenging of wrong, and Job believed that in heaven his Divine Goel lived, and that at last He would arise to vindicate him. Moreover, in large measure he appears to have anticipated that he would himself arise, and witness his vindication. And the Holy Ghost intended more by his words than he knew. With fuller meaning we can appropriate and repeat them. The flesh may be corrupted by long illness, yet as we arise in the likeness of Christ, from it, transformed and glorified, we shall look out upon the face of God.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 19.—JOB XX.

Zophar is hotter than ever, and tells Job that though for the present he may bear himself as innocent, yet his triumphing is short, and he will perish as a dream. He goes on to say that it always has been so, and always will be, and proceeds to enumerate the awful sorrows which are in store. A commentary on these words is rendered by this book, and by the lasting example Job gives of godly patience, whilst his friends are remembered only as flies in amber. How certainly does this fact confute their reasonings. But it is true that the prosperity of the ungodly is but for a moment. They labour for that which they do not enjoy; they save nothing of that in which they delight; they are in straits of soul amid a sufficiency of worldly goods; they are stricken by many a weapon. The heavens reveal their iniquity, and earth accuses them.

It is painfully notable that at the present day we seem to have so much less dread of the results of sin, and to be little accustomed to anticipate them for ourselves or others. This may arise partly because of the haste at which we live, and the rapidity with which we forget, and the crowd of people by whom we are surrounded, which prevents us tracing out actions and their results. Well would it be for us to ponder more carefully these statements that we may understand the exceeding peril and sinfulness of sin.

THURSDAY, JULY 20.—JOB XXI.

Job asks them to suffer him again to speak, because his complaint is not for them only, but for all. And he goes on to say that they are not justified by the facts, in affirming that wickedness always brings about adversity. On the contrary, he urges that wicked men spend their days in prosperity. In the farm, and the fold, and the home (10, 11) there are the sounds of joy. Their death is not prolonged torture, but sudden (13). Their lamp is not often put out in darkness, nor are they driven as stubble before the wind.

Job challenges the contention of his friends that the children of the wicked suffer, and denies that it would establish their fathers' wickedness, and alleges that they have attempted to instruct God in the dealings of his providence. Finally he turns from his own assertions and appeals to the verdict of passers-by. Surely, says he, it is a matter of common observation that wicked men do prosper and die in peace. The clods of the valley are sweet to him. Even after death they have their memory preserved by monuments over their grave. From all this he infers that adversity is no proof of special sin. And it is just at this point that we can build the argument for immortality. Job was undoubtedly right in his contention, and there must be, therefore, a future when the inequalities of time are adjusted.

FRIDAY, JULY 21.—JOB XXII.

Eliphaz meets his argument by saying that what Job had said could not be true, that God sent joy or sorrow arbitrarily. To say this, he asserts, would infer that to be good or bad must be a matter of indifference to God. And to avoid such a conclusion he goes back to the old charge that there must have been special sin to account for such calamities.

The crimes alleged by Eliphaz against Job (6) are such as might presumably be committed by a rich man. With the coolest effrontery he begins a catalogue of his sins. The appropriating of outer garments given in pledge; the withholding of bread and water from the poor; the oppression of widows and orphans—these must have been committed by Job. How easily we impute wrong to one another, acting on the suggestion of our own sinful hearts. In the former chapter, in which Job had argued that wickedness is not followed by immediate punishment, Eliphaz thought he detected practical atheism, and that God was too far away to take any notice of them. He goes on to say that this was the sin of the antediluvians (17), and reminds him that in their case it was awfully punished.

The last paragraph (21) should be read from R.V. margin, which shows the beautiful results of acquainting ourselves with God. All these will bear the closest consideration, for they are all true. The good which comes is not to be measured. It includes the gold of Ophir and light upon our path.

SATURDAY, JULY 22.—JOB XXIII.

Once more Job tells the story of his suffering, and longs to bring it before the face of God Himself. He has a true conception of how to pray. He would order his cause and fill his mouth with arguments. He is sure that at that bar he would meet more merciful treatment than at the hands of his friends, and whenever the suppliant soul approaches God in the extremity of his sorrow, he may be sure that God will not contend against him in the greatness of his power, but will patiently hear and strengthen him.

The difficulty of finding God near to those who loved Him, but had not heard Jesus speak of the Father, and to whom He was not manifest in the flesh, was very perplexing. They could not behold or perceive Him, but they knew that He was acquainted with the way that they took, and that at the last they should come forth as gold. It is a great comfort to feel that God does know and understand our way; only let us keep his way, and not turn aside. Let us not go back from the commandment of his lips; let us treasure the words of his mouth more than our necessary food.

We do not know how many things are decreed by Him, but we are sure that He will perform them in us and for us. Our true position is to yield ourselves to Him, prepared to work out in our daily life that which He works in by his Holy Spirit.

JULY 23.

PAUL AT CORINTH. Acts xviii. 1—11.

GOLDEN TEXT, 1 Cor. i. 18.

PAUL did not stay long in Athens, and appears to have left only a few converts as the result of his work. The Gospel does not find a ready reception among such people as the highly-educated, and polished, and pleasure-loving population of Athens.

Corinth was situated on the isthmus that united the Peloponnesus with the mainland. Its position and its two harbours, one on the east and one on the west of the isthmus, made it favourable for trade with other countries. Its citadel was the Acrocorinthus, which was 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, and was so vast that it contained a whole town, and yet was so precipitous that very few soldiers were needed to defend it. It was adorned with magnificent temples, and altars, and statues. The population of the city, according to Farrar, was about 400,000, among whom were many Jews. Its prosperity as a commercial city led to great luxury and vice. It was infamous for licentiousness and drunkenness, which were indulged under the sanction of their religious rites.

2, 3. It is interesting to note how the providence of God worked in connection with Aquila and Priscilla. In consequence of some tumult raised by the Jews in Rome, the Emperor Claudius, in the twelfth year of his reign, A.D. 52, expelled all Jews from the city, The decree did not remain long in force, for Aquila returned to Rome (Rom. xvi. 3), and many Jews were afterwards found in the city (Acts xxviii. 15). But it took effect at the right time to bring these two devout Jews into contact with the Apostle; and it is not improbable that they became Christians at this time. Their craft was possibly that of making tent-cloth from the hair of goats, or, more probably, making the tents from the cloths, and which Paul also had learned. Every detail of this story was overruled by God to bring about his own purpose. Of these two, Priscilla appears to have been the more energetic, but both were useful servants of Jesus Christ (verse 26; 2 Tim. iv. 19, &c.). It is instructive to think of Paul the Apostle witnessing for Christ on the Sabbath, and working during the week at his own trade. Be assured than labour is not undignified.

4—6. Silas and Timothy were left at Berea (xvii. 15). It is probable that they joined Paul at Athens, and returned again to Macedonia, from whence they came to Corinth, bringing with them the contribution from the Church at Philippi (Phil. iv. 15). The effect of their coming was remarkable. "Paul was constrained by the word" (5, R.V.), and testified with renewed energy and zeal and courage. The message within his heart insisted on being spoken. Note (1) Among whom he worked. "To the Jew first" was his invariable principle. Christianity is not opposed to Judaism, but is a supplement to it. The fact that the Jew had the sacred Scriptures should have made him more ready to receive the Messiah of whom the prophets wrote. (2) How he worked. He "reasoned," "persuaded," and "testified." Paul, though a master in argument, knew also how to persuade (2 Cor. v. 11). When so much is involved in men's rejection of Christ, how needful it is to use every entreaty. (3) With what result. They not only refused to receive his message, but met him with opposition and blaspheming. The action of the Apostle in shaking his raiment against them was similar to that which Jesus commanded (Matt x. 14). It declared that they were solely responsible for the doom which their rejection of Christ would involve. The aim of every Christian worker should be to be free from the blood of those who hear and reject his message.

8—11. It is probable that Paul continued to lodge with Aquila and Priscilla, but used the house of Justus for his meetings. Of this man we know nothing more than is told us here. The proximity of his house to the Synagogue would be likely to make the Jewish opposition more severe; and this would not be diminished by the conversion of the chief ruler of the Synagogue (8). Crispus was one of the few whom Paul baptized with his own hand (1 Cor. i. 14). Note the way that converts were made—they "heard, believed, and were baptized." They could not believe till they heard; and having heard and believed, they were ready to be baptized. Confession immediately followed faith. The vision granted to Paul was doubtless in consequence of the increased opposition which followed the success of his work. He appears not to have been free from fear and anxiety (see 2 Thess. iii. 2). To remove this was the aim of the vision (9). The Lord timed his manifestations to his servant with infinite wisdom. Two things were to remove his discouragement. (1) The Lord was with him. That is our portion too (Matt. xxviii. 20). And (2) the certain success of his work. Even in such a city as Corinth, the Lord would find many disciples.

The International Missionary Union.

The tenth annual meeting of the above organisation commenced at Clifton Springs, New York, U.S.A., Wednesday evening, June 14. The Union has now four hundred members, representing all the principal Evangelical denominations of Canada and the United States, and some of the missionary societies of Europe. Its constitution says;—"Its membership shall consist of those returned missionaries of Evangelical bodies, whether temporarily or permanently at home, who have signed the constitution." Its object is "to promote the general cause of missions in all possible ways, chiefly by the diffusion of missionary intelligence, the discussion of missionary topics, and the increasing of mutual acquaintance among missionaries of different churches and countries."

There were present this year at the meetings of the Union, one hundred and five missionaries, ninety-eight of them being returned from their field of labour, and seven under appointments, the largest attendance which the Union has had any year. Of these missionaries, twenty-nine were from India, twenty-six from China, thirteen from Japan, eight from Turkey, five from Africa, and the rest from various heathen, Mohammedan, or Papal lands. Of those twenty-nine were Presbyterians, twenty-seven Congregationalists, twenty-two Methodists, thirteen Baptists, six Reformed Church, and the balance with various other societies.

Three sessions were held daily at 9 a.m., 2 p.m., and 7 p.m. The first hour daily (nine to ten) was given to prayer and topics of a devotional character. The meeting began with a welcome from Henry Foster, M.D., founder of the Clifton Springs Sanatorium.

The Missionary Tabernacle was built at the expense of Dr. Foster, and by him presented to the I.M. Union. In this commodious and convenient building were the meetings held.

On Thursday, the topics for discussion and consideration were Papal Lands, American Aborigines, Turkey, Persia, and Bulgaria.

Rev. C. W. Cushing, of Italy, said: "This (viz., Romanism) is the only subject on which I cannot talk coolly. There is no land in which Catholicism has had rule, in which it has not sunk the people, not only in illiteracy, but also in morals. This is true in Italy, in Mexico, and every Papal country. I do not fear for the future of our own country, but I do say I dread the devil more in his manifestations in the Roman Catholic Church than in any other form."

Mrs. Laura Craven gave an account of the sufferings and persecutions which she passed through in Puebla, in Mexico.

Mrs. E. G. Clemens, of Paraguay: "I arrived in Assumption in 1889. There had never been a Protestant sermon there till six years before. Romanism has had control of Paraguay as fully as it ever had of any country. Nine-tenths of the Paraguayans do not know that there is any other religion than the Roman Catholic. Ninety-eight per cent. of the inhabitants are illiterates, and only two per cent. are of legitimate birth."

For over an hour Rev. Egerton R. Young fascinated the audience with his intensely interesting account of the Lord's work among the Indians of the Hudson Bay country.

Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, D.D., the founder of Robert College, Constantinople, spoke of the three-fold foundation of Protestant missions in the Turkish Empire: (1) The preaching of the Word; (2) Translation and circulation of the Scriptures; (3) Education in the vernacular languages. This venerable servant of Christ, now in his eighty-fourth year, concluded his able address, saying: "God always marvellously protected the work of the missionaries in Turkey."

Miss C. E. Bush told us about her touring in the saddle among the women and children of Van, in Eastern Asiatic Turkey. For 23 years she and Miss Seymour had been associated in missionary work in Eastern Turkey, enduring perils from robbers and fording the Euphrates and Tigris and minor rivers, while out touring in the saddle.

Rev. P. Z. Easton told of his work among the Mohammedans of Persia. Some of his converts had been associated with the Stundists in their work in the Southern part of the Russian Empire. At the request of Mr. Easton, the following was unanimously adopted:

Resolved—That this Union hereby express its sympathy with the religious sects in Russia known as Stundists Mennonites, and Mollokans, in the severe persecutions to which they are being subjected by the Government of that country, and request in their behalf the prayers of our Lord's disciples of every nation and communion.

To many of those in attendance one of the most interesting meetings was that of the Missionary ladies on Woman's Work in Mission-lands, held on Friday afternoon. Only ten minutes could be allotted to each of the many speakers.

Mrs. Dr. Foster made the address of welcome to the ladies.

Miss Crosby spoke on work in Micronesia. These islands in the Pacific are said to be 3000 miles from anywhere; 3000 miles from every yard of cloth; 3000 miles from every spool of thread we want; 3000 miles from every shop and store. We received but one mail a year, and sent but one. We found the South Sea islanders hungry for the Gospel. One came to us, saying, "Send a teacher to our island with your spirit-food." "We cannot send a teacher to the savage people of your island this year, but we will try and do it next year." "Why are you missionaries here? You say you love us. You say the people in America love us. You say your God loves us. Then why cannot my people have someone to bring spirit-food to them? Why must they die without hearing of these things?"

Mrs. Mills spoke of her work among deaf and dumb children in Shantung, China.

Mrs. May Castleton, M.D., spoke of her work as a medical missionary in Foochow, China.

Mrs. Wellington White, who had lost her husband and three children in a railway accident two years ago, just before they were to return to their field in Hainan, spoke with deepest feeling and pathos of the suffering and degradations of the blind girls in Canton and other cities of China.

Miss Houston, of the Southern Presbyterian Church, spoke of her work among the Romanists in Matamoras, Mexico.

Friday evening was devoted to India.

Rev. Edward S. Hume, of Bombay: "I will not dwell on statistics and other facts, which you can find in books. I will call your attention to certain movements lately begun in India. Twelve years ago municipal privileges were granted to the larger cities of India by Lord Ripon. And since then the educated and thinking natives of India have been agitating for greater political privileges to the taxpayers of India, and out of it has come the National Congress of India. At first missionaries and native Christian preachers stood aloof, thinking the movement to be purely a political affair; but the leaders of the movement have shown a desire to listen to the Christian preachers and missionaries, and be influenced by them, so that among the delegates chosen at Ahmednuggur in 1891 were two missionaries, and of all the delegates meeting in the Seventh National Congress in December, 1891, at Nagpore, one-fifth were Christians, and a Christian was elected president of the Congress. Another movement is that of temperance. The British Government in India sells licences to distil liquor and retail it to the highest bidder. No decent Mohammedan nor caste Hindoo would do this that a so-called Christian Government is doing in India. God is over-ruling even this now for good, and the natives are coming to understand the difference between real Christians and nominal Christians. Under the lead of Christian workers some 60,000 in Benares signed the temperance pledge.

Rev. C. A. Nichols, of Burma, spoke of the wonderful work of self-support and missionary aggressiveness among the Karen Christians in the Bassein district.

The sermon on Sunday morning, in the Missionary Tabernacle, was by Rev. Geo. Douglas, D.D., President of the Wesleyan Theological College at Montreal. It was a discourse marked by great spiritual power and unction. Dr. Douglas is in his sixty-eighth year, and for twelve years has been blind. Over forty years ago he went as a missionary to the blacks in the Bermudas. He there contracted disease, which compelled his abandonment of the mission field. "It was the saddest trial of my life to have to give up the mission," he says.

The disease has affected his whole body, so that his legs and arms are more or less withered and paralysed. As Dr. J. T. Gracey, the president of the Union, introduced him to the audience on Sunday morning, he said:—"God, who has touched his body, has also touched his soul. He is the Chrysostom of the American pulpit." Two brethren took hold of his arms and assisted him out of his chair to the pulpit. His text was Rom. v. 3: "But we glory in tribulations also." For an hour this chastened servant of the Divine Master spoke with such force, power, beauty, and pathos that all were entranced, and many bathed in tears.

In the "nugget meeting," in which each was asked to name the greatest and best thing that had come to them during the whole meeting, Oramel H. Gulick (of the historic Gulick family, his parents and four brothers all being missionaries), who has spent over sixty years in Hawaiian Islands and Japan, said:—"The uplift that came to me when Dr. Douglas was preaching on Sunday morning I shall never forget, and its influence will always remain with me." J. McCarthy, of the China Inland Mission, said: "I was wondrously helped by that sermon Sunday morning, and I bless God for it with all my heart, and I trust the effects of it will go with me all my life." Near the close the preacher said: "Pardon a personal allusion. Fifteen years ago the disease attacked my eyes. The beauties of nature grew dim, the printed page faded from me, and, greatest loss of all, I could no longer behold the faces of my friends. I was tempted to despond. But God broke the silence of my soul, and said to me, 'Thou shalt drink of the river of my pleasures,' not of a rivulet, nor of a brook, nor of a lake; not of the shaded well in the desert, but 'of the river of my pleasures.'"

The meeting Sunday afternoon was devoted to Japan, and the Sunday-evening meeting to China. The addresses were of great interest, and had The Christian space I would gladly say more about them.

In speaking of blessing received at these meetings, Mr. O. H. Gulick, of Japan, said: "I have been blessed by the manifestation of the brotherhood of all missionaries. This has been the meeting of my life."

J. McCarthy: "My views have been enlarged."

Rev. J. Saunby, of Canada, and about to return to Japan: "I think I have never so realised the presence of God as in these meetings. I had learned to be chronically suspicious of conventions and meetings of this kind, but bless God I have been disappointed here."

Mrs. E. G. Clemens, of Paraguay: "The best thing to me here is the manifestation of the unity of God's children, fulfilling Christ's prayer that they may all be one."

Several resolutions were adopted by the Union. One was in expressing its disapproval and abhorrence of the opium and liquor traffic and licensed vice, as sanctioned and carried on by the British Government in India. The strongest words of condemnation in this matter were spoken by Dr. Douglas, J. McCarthy, and Rev. A. Dowsley, of the Church of Scotland, all of them British subjects.

The International Missionary Union meets each year, the Lord willing, in the second Wednesday in June. Next year the meeting will begin on June 13, closing June 20. It meets every year at Clifton Spring, New York, which is twelve hours west of New York city, in the Auburn branch of the N.Y.C.R.R. All returned missionaries, of whatever country or Evangelical body, are entertained free of charge by Dr. Foster and his friends in Clifton, during the week of the meeting of the Union. Returned missionaries of the British and European societies are specially welcome at these meetings. The visits in other years of J. Hudson Taylor and Reginald Radcliffe are still mentioned. The central thought of Dr. Foster in founding the Clifton Springs Sanatorium was to unite with the best medical service, the influences of God's healing grace; and to offer both, without money and without price, to those in straitened circumstances whose lives are consecrated to the Master s service in the preaching and teaching of his Word, specially to those who have broken down in the foreign mission field. Scores and scores of such missionaries have been restored to health at Clifton Springs, and then have gone back to their fields of labour to do effective service for Christ. To our Lord Jesus be the praise!

PRISON SHELTER AT CARDIFF.—In connection with the Police-court work carried on by the Cardiff branch of the C.E.T.S., a shelter has been opened where discharged prisoners will be offered breakfast while the Gospel is spoken to them. The Mayor of Cardiff, Canon Thompson, Councillor Jenkins, and other well-known men took part in the opening.

PASTOR VON BODELSCHWINGH,

DIRECTOR OF "BETHEL," WESTPHALIA, GERMANY.

TO-DAY we have to speak of one of the most beautiful stories of Christian endeavour that history, ancient or modern, can supply. It will be less of the man than of his wonderful work. Something, it is true, must be said of the gracious personality round which the narrative circles; but he desires with true Christian humility to keep himself out of sight, and we shall largely respect his wish. We are wholly indebted to Miss Julie Sutter's truly charming book, "A Colony of Mercy," lately published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, for the particulars that follow. We should be heartily glad if the brief outline that is all our space can afford, should send many readers to the book itself; we know they will thank us for the advice.

The head of this Westphalian "Colony of Mercy" is Pastor von Bodelschwingh. Though not actual founder, he took up the work in its early stages, and through his sanctified, wise, and constant planning, it has grown to great and far-reaching dimensions. Pastor von Bodelschwingh is himself of noble birth, as this world reckons. He was born of an ancient Westphalian family, and had the late Emperor Frederick, of cherished memory, as one of his school companions. His father was Minister of Finance, and afterwards Prime Minister, of Prussia. A mother's influence and example did much to bring the young Baron into personal practical sympathy with the working masses. His education would naturally have led him into the public official service, like his father before him; but in the providence of God he was destined to serve the public in another and more genuine fashion. Instead of leading a life of ignoble ease he went through a course of "gentleman farming." Miss Sutter tells how, as he was one day distributing missionary tracts to his humble neighbours, the question imperatively came to his conscience as to what he was doing for the missioning of the world. He answered the question by resolving to become a messenger of the Cross, and studied with a view to mission work in India.

Meantime he went to Paris and laboured for a time among the German rag-pickers and crossing-sweepers of that gay city. Thither he brought a young wife, also of high social birth and station. His wife's health obliged him to return to Germany, and he accepted a village pastorate not far from his present sphere of service. A great sorrow came to the couple there, in the loss within a fortnight of their four children by diphtheria. Soon after, the Pastor was called to take charge of a home for epileptics at Bielefeld, a manufacturing town in Westphalia. Here he found his life-work in smoothing the earthly pathway of the sick, the suffering, and the destitute, and working out one of the most admirable programmes of practical Christianity that could be imagined.

Leaving now the personal element of Pastor von Bodelschwingh's controlling and permeating guidance, we must endeavour shortly to indicate the nature of the work that is done for suffering and sorrowing humanity in this quiet German retreat. When the good Pastor took charge of the institution at "Ebenezer" (as it was then called, but later changed to "Bethel") there were twenty-six male epileptics being cared for; while three hundred patients of all classes and kinds were wanting admittance. Under his sympathetic and Spirit-taught management the work quickly developed, not only in its compass, but in its methods of treating those afflicted by the mysterious and painful complaint of epilepsy. Instead of huddling a large number of these distressed folk in one huge institution, the plan was adopted of hiving off the sufferers into smaller houses, each having a "house father" or "house mother," as the case might be. The great prescription for ameliorating, if not curing, this subtle ailment is such light and suitable occupation as the patients have a liking or capacity for, and an overflowing "stream of true helpfulness" on the part of the attendants and of one towards another. The results that are achieved in this German colony seem to be wonderful. The names of some of the houses betoken the spirit that animates the work and the workers throughout:—Sarepta, the deaconesses' house: Nazareth, the home of the male nurses: Little Nazareth, the abode of the carpenters; Peniel, the tailors' home; Horeb, for the shoemakers; Gilgal, for the smiths; Sharon, for the gardeners; Bethphage for the printers; Bethlehem for the bakers: and so forth. A large trade, it appears, is done with many distant places in providing pure bromide of potassium, which is the only drug used for coping with the ravages of the epileptic malady.

It is a real treat to accompany the author of this striking record in her "Walks about Bethel," and to note the many interesting developments that have sprung from the parent idea. One of the most attractive of these offshoots is the "Labour Colony," which in its inception had quite a romantic interest. It not only provides healthy occupation for many afflicted ones, but keeps the whole colony well supplied with edibles. The varied ages and classes of patients find appropriate lodgment and care under consecrated overseers and attendants, and suffusing all is the sacred and healing atmosphere of loving sympathy and help.

One extract we must here make from the book; it will give some insight into the secret of the success which has attended the labours of Pastor von Bodelschwingh and his assistants,—

> It was not only the Pastor's idea, it was the main principle laid down by Pastor Bost, who was the first to gather in epileptics at La Force, in South-western France—a principle he laid great stress upon—the epileptic patient must first of all be brought to Christ. There is little help for such in the body, but One can heal the soul; and while very faithful to all that pertains to the body, this soul cure is the main object at Bethel. Bodelschwingh says he considers a patient "doing well" when he has learned to bear his cross meekly; that he considers him "cured" when laying down his poor tabernacle he can die in the faith of the Saviour. There is no religious over-dosing at Bethel. The patients are simply surrounded by the influences of the sanctuary, and many of them are true children of peace. The Word of God is ever in their midst, and the voice of prayer about them; but they are not driven, they are loved, they are nurtured. They are every day taken to Christ, and they know it. There are classes of religious instruction; there is a Y.M.C.A. among them. There is such an environment—so many about them who can help them on.

Among the other beneficent agencies that have clustered around this modern Pool of Bethesda, there is a labour colony solely for repentant inebriates. Those admitted pledge themselves not to leave of their own accord, and to stay a year or more till time and treatment work out a cure. All wages are forfeited if a man breaks his abstinence pledge. The little colony is named "Friedrichs-Hütte," after the late Emperor, whose silver wedding brought out many gifts that were applied by the Imperial couple to the furtherance of this branch of the work. Many of the patients are of good social antecedents, but "submerged" through the fatal cup; all have to conform to the rules and put their hands to honest daily toil if they would share in the benefits of the place. Such a rational and Christian method of dealing with the inebriate victim may be commended to those in our own country who are striving to wrestle with the great drink fiend that seems to pursue our sinful race everywhere.

The many who have lost their way in life, otherwise than through drink, are also thought of, so that this ancient verse forms the heading of one of Miss Sutter's chapters: "Every one in distress, and every one in debt, and every one discontented, gathered themselves unto him, and he became a captain over them." From which it appears that it is possible to erect and manage a Christian "Cave of Adullam."

But we must stay our pen and pass by fascinating chapters on Deaconess' work, on "Baby Castle," on German tramps, etc., etc. In a closing chapter the earnest author discourses on "The message of Bethel to ourselves." She exhorts England and Scotland to consider well this German illustration of what they also might do for their thousands of wandering tramps and of unemployed generally; turning them from a source of national peril into builders-up of the national strength.

With a repeated and final commendation of this most remarkable volume we quote its closing paragraph: "There is a science which says, 'Survival of the fittest,' and Capital, that awful power, says so too. But Bethel says, and the Spirit of Christianity says, 'Salvation of the least.'"

Soldiers' Institute, Gibraltar.

Notwithstanding many hindrances, the Lord is blessing the work among soldiers carried on at this Institute. Ensnarements abound on every side; drink, gambling, immorality, are pitfalls which beset many a young soldier. Only a few days ago a superior and intelligent man gave his heart to the Lord. It has come to our knowledge since that he was the most notorious gambler on board the ship that brought him out from home. Another young fellow who has been attending our meetings decided for Christ whilst "on guard" last Sunday.

To the genuine sorrow and regret of everyone, General Sir Lowthian Nicholson, K.C.B., Governor of Gibraltar, died on Tuesday evening last. He was greatly esteemed, and was a warm friend of the Institute. Any who may wish should apply for last year's report to our hon. sec., Colonel H. S. Clarke, "Essendene," The Downs, Wimbledon.

Wm. Ogilvy, Superintendent.

Ratcliffe Strangers' Rest.

At the monthly Workers' Meeting on Friday last, Mr. W. R. Lane gave a helpful address on "Christian Labour." Founding his remarks on 1 Cor. iii. 4—10, he drew the teaching that all true Christians are God's labourers, but that the labourers are of themselves nothing. Success is God's gift, and God rewards for the labour, not for the result.

Mr. J. T. Isaac, hon. sec., pleaded for additional workers on Sundays, Mondays, Thursdays, and Fridays; also for Scriptures in Russian, Portuguese, and Dutch. Miss White, who has been labouring in the North of Spain, gave some very encouraging instances of awakenings there. Miss Fuller, who has been engaged in the North-west of Spain, represented her work as down in the dark mine of moral depravity and the degrading superstition of Roman Catholicism.

THE SITUATION IN UGANDA.

Dear Sir,—Allow me to comment briefly upon the statements of The Times correspondent in Uganda regarding the C.M.S. Mission there.

1. The Times correspondent states that, while the French missionaries have reaped the benefit of a long course of [special] training in their colleges at Algiers," the C.M.S. missionaries "in the majority of cases have been drawn from ordinary commercial avocations," and "after undergoing a short course of training in religious subjects, are dispatched to the mission field with a very imperfect knowledge of the difficulties attendant on the work." I need hardly remark to the readers of The Christian that if the correspondent's statement were accurate it would not necessarily discredit the C.M.S. Mission. The grace of God is not tied to those who have gone through a long course of special training in colleges. But, as a matter of fact, the statement is inaccurate. The fact is that of the sixteen members of the Mission, including the Bishop, eight are graduates of Oxford or Cambridge, and two are qualified medical men. Of the twelve, who, so far as we know were in the country at the time, seven were graduates, and one a qualified medical man.

2. The Times correspondent lays great stress upon the road-making and bridge-building which the more numerous body of French missionaries had accomplished, but he says nothing of the translation into the language of Uganda of the whole of the New Testament, which has been done by our missionaries, and in which, I need not say, the French missionaries had no share.

3. The Times correspondent complains that "the position and responsibilities" were "not clearly enough defined to the missionaries before leaving Europe," and that they have been "left far too much discretion and freedom." On this I may observe that had the Society given more detailed instructions, there would have been some ground for the very common complaint that home committees tie the hands of their missionaries too much. But if it is true that any of our men have not rendered "deferential obedience" to Bishop Tucker, this is greatly to be regretted, and would be entirely disapproved by us.

4. The Times correspondent says: "The position of the French priests is very much above that of their converts, and I observe none of that familiarity or desire for equality on the part of the natives which does so much harm, and which is so essentially out of place in this country. . . . It is, I think, a great error to imagine that by conforming to native simplicity and lowering one's own social status, a greater hold is thus obtained over such people." This needs no reply in The Christian. We are very thankful if our missionaries have laid themselves open to such a complaint.

5. The Times correspondent admired the French priests "officiating in full vestments before the high altar," &c., &c., and deprecates the C.M.S. church being made use of for various meetings. I do not think it is necessary to answer this.

I confess I look back with regret to the days when our missionaries were in Uganda at the risk of their lives, and the country was not occupied by British officials. Difficulties never then experienced will be multiplied now. At the same time, when the British had once gone in, it would have been a disgraceful thing for the nation to retire, and leave the country to the anarchy produced by these political conflicts. Therefore we must accept the position, and I would ask the prayers of your readers that much wisdom may be granted to all our brethren in the extremely difficult circumstances in which they are now placed.

FRIENDLESS AND FALLEN.

The thirty-sixth annual report of the London Female Preventive and Reformatory Institution is the first complete official record issued since the death of the founder of the Institution, the late Mr. E. W. Thomas. There appears to be no falling off in the efforts made for the rescue of fallen and degraded women in our great cities. One marked feature stands forth, however, very prominently, the increased efforts made on behalf of what is termed "preventive" cases—that is to say, the many young girls who arrive in London friendless and unprotected, and who are not only open to the snares of wicked and designing people, but who are also made a special mark by such for the purpose of alluring them into a sinful and abandoned life. Of this latter class no fewer than 695 young friendless girls were admitted to the benefits of the Institution during the year.

Special satisfaction is found in this circumstance, from the fact that not only are the young girls themselves "prevented" from entering upon a life of shame, but society at large is spared the baneful effects of increased immorality. Equal success has attended the efforts made for the rescue of those who have already fallen into a life of sin. The report shows that 531 of the latter unhappy class were admitted into the Home specially designed for their reception, and where spiritual and moral influences were brought to bear in support of the efforts judiciously made to inculcate habits of industry and honest self-help. The instances of reclamation under the head of "Rescue Work," give some very interesting illustrations of the power of God's grace to raise up the most abandoned, and to sustain them in the path of virtue and respectability. Another feature of the report is an article entitled "In Memoriam," written by one of Mr. Thomas's oldest friends in the work, together with an admirable portrait.

In common, unhappily, with many others, this Society is experiencing the effects of the widespread depression, and is in need of increased support in order to maintain the Homes in a full state of efficiency. The secretary, Mr. Wm. J. Taylor, 200, Euston-road, N.W., will be happy to forward a copy of the report to such as may wish to read it.

Gathered Gold.

Rest assured, tried believer, that though you have your troubles you are saved from swarms of worse ones which infest the homes and hearts of the servants of the world's prince. The Lord has put a division (Ex. viii. 23); see to it that you keep up the division in spirit, aim, character, and company.

GAZING UPON CHRIST.

The glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ yields us heaven below, and it will be to us the heaven of heaven above. But seeing does not end it. We are to be changed into that which we gaze upon. Faith sees God with a transforming look. The heart receives the image of Jesus into its own depths, till the character of Jesus is imprinted on the soul (Ps. xvii. 15).—C. H. Spurgeon.

TRUE PROGRESS.

True progress consists, not in getting beyond Jesus but in getting more deeply into his ever fresh truth. The problems of this generation will find their solution where those of past generations have found theirs, and the old commandment and the old Christ will be the new commandment and the new Christ. As long as we have an abiding Spirit to teach the endless fulness of his words, for loving obedience, we need not fear, though the things which can be shaken are removed. The world will not outgrow Jesus Christ. All change will but make more plain his inexhaustibleness, and reveal new treasures in his familiar and enduring words (John xiv. 26).—Dr. Maclaren.

THE LORD IS A JEALOUS GOD.

God will not accept from us the same measure of trust only that we give to the creatures, and we perhaps offer Him a less hearty trust even than that. He will not accept the same tribute of love we offer to those nearest to us, and we perhaps insult Him by bringing something less. "The Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God." (Ex. xxxiv. 14). He will put disappointment into your life, and the cruel gap into your relationships, and bring frustrations into your plans, and the apples of Sodom into your parched lips, if you suffer a rival to compete with Him in your hearts; and the rival will inevitably be there if your love is less than a passion, and your service short of an entire devotion.—Rev. T. G. Selby.

At the World's Fair.—5.

Nothing could exceed the warmth with which Americans, as a people, welcome visitors to their shores from other lands, unless it be that with which the sun has been shining upon the evil and upon the good in Chicago the past few weeks. Indeed, had it not been for the refreshing variety of an occasional heavy thunderstorm, the heat might have proved monotonous in its intensity. As it is, however, the glories of the American summer are well upon us, and serve only to swell one's sense of the thoroughness which characterises everything with which our "cousins" have to do.

But high temperature and large meetings of a religious character do not ordinarily go hand in hand. When eleven people occupy a row of seats which only professes to accommodate ten, it would generally be inferred that the thermometer should not show a much higher reading than 60° or 65° Fahr. But no such prosaic ideas obtain when it is a question of hearing Mr. Moody and his confrères or going empty away. At least so Chicago residents and visitors have indicated by the earnestness with which they have thronged to many of the meetings held.

The force of speakers upon the field just now is exceptionally strong, comprising Mr. Moody, Rev. John McNeill, Rev. Thos. Spurgeon, Rev. B. Fay Mills, Mr. Merton Smith, Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea, and Rev. Dr. Wharton, of Baltimore, who, being distributed in tent, theatre, church, and hall, in various parts of the city, are able to secure in the aggregate a very extensive hearing for the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The present stay of Messrs. Mills and Wharton is, unfortunately, of very brief duration, but they hope to devote more time to the city when the season is more advanced.

Not unnaturally, for his revered father's sake, Mr. Spurgeon has been heard with especial interest, and it is hoped large accessions have been made to those who are being saved. It has been Mr. Moody's custom, as far as possible, to introduce new preachers at his own meetings. Thus they receive a "send off," so to speak, after which they are able to draw and hold their own audiences. In some cases the meetings in a given locality have at first been only moderately attended—for which no doubt the atmospheric conditions have been to some extent responsible. But day by day has seen an increase in attendance, in interest, and in practical result, which has been

FULL OF ENCOURAGEMENT.

The occasions which stand out as being most noteworthy have been those upon which an enormous circus tent was pressed into the service of God on two consecutive Sunday mornings (June 11 and 18). English readers who recollect the reputed magnitude of "Barnum's Show," as the "biggest show on earth," will be able to estimate the size of an audience which can fill another "the same as his, only bigger," for that is practically what is claimed by the "Forepaugh" proprietors. With no less than ten thousand seats placed round a vast arena capable of holding as many more, it will be readily conceded that a gathering such as would be the envy of every secular entertainer in town could easily be made comfortable. Whether the Gospel was ever before preached under such circumstances I know not, but it was wonderful, to ear and eye alike. In the centre of the arena a platform was erected sufficient to seat the speakers and a few of the singers, the rest of whom were ranged immediately around it. Overhead were trapezes and similar paraphernalia appertaining to the show, while close at hand in another tent, forming an annexe, were caravans containing a variety of live animals, fierce and tame, slim and unwieldy, some pleasing to the gaze of such small boys as could steal a peep through the tightly-drawn curtains, and others who could only boast of such beauty as lay in their innate ugliness.

But what a crowd! Men, women, and children; eighteen thousand of them, and on a Sunday morning, too! By half-past nine the choir took their places in front of an audience already vast in extent, although tickets were available for half an hour, yet before that entrance was free to all comers. Be it understood, however, that tickets were not in use to keep people out, but to get them in. In other words, they had been placed in the hands of all who would accept them in train or street car, road or sidewalk, store or hotel, wheresoever the feet of willing workers had been able to gain admittance for the purpose.

After nearly an hour of singing, individual and congregational, which swept like the voice of the ocean across the field of heads, Mr. Moody rose before probably the largest audience he had ever been called upon to face, and delivered one of those addresses, burning with earnestness, pathos, and love, which, owned by the Spirit of God, have drawn so many not only under the sound of the Gospel, but also under its power.

Following him came Mr. McNeill, and he, too, in his own characteristic way, presented the truth of Christ from another standpoint, but directed to the same goal. And thus, in the mouth of two witnesses, and by the fervent prayers of hundreds of hearts, was that truth established before a throng which, for diversity of appearance, incongruity of the surroundings, but at the same time closeness of attention, stood, perhaps, unique in the annals of Gospel work. A similar service was held the following Sabbath, addressed by Messrs. Moody, McNeill, Schiverea, and Torrey, the last-named being the director of the Bible Institute. This occasion, having only been advertised for two days, was not so largely attended, but that nine thousand persons should have heard the powerful presentation of the love of God which his servants gave was much to be thankful for.

Many other forms of work, lesser in scale but hopeful in result, are being carried on all the time, each needing equally the prayerful support of those who delight in the extension of the Saviour's kingdom. Some of these I will now describe.

Not a few Christian people throughout the States have been gravely exercised as to the moral influence upon Chicago and its residents, and possibly further afield, of

THE FAIR AND ITS ASSOCIATIONS.

Such concourses of great multitudes seeking enjoyment naturally afford especial inducements to the establishment in the vicinity of entertainments, some more and some less objectionable in form, and the Western capital has been no exception to the rule. Hence it was feared, and not without reason, that while the Exhibition might contain much or all that was elevating and instructive within its own precincts, a serious moral danger menaced the visitors in the city itself. In the expectation of large "takings," amusement caterers have engaged almost every suitable building that was available in which to organise entertainments of various kinds, to be open on Sunday and weekday alike. But the plan has been overdone, with the result that only one or two theatres are paying at all satisfactorily, and last week Mr. Moody could have had his pick of three of them for his Gospel meetings. People who come to Chicago for a few days only, come to see the Fair, and find it takes all the time at their disposal. But this cuts both ways. If they have no time to patronise places of amusement, it might fairly be surmised that religious exercises would form a fractional part of the programme of the crowd. Yet this is the most noteworthy point of all, that with secular entertainments failing of audiences on every hand, immense crowds throng those buildings in which the plain Gospel of Jesus Christ is being preached. That is once more being demonstrated, and those whose eyes have been toward Him are beginning to see "signs of abundance of rain."

> The ways of God's good Providence
> Are not the ways of man,

But not only does this apparent success attend the labour of the preachers, singers, and workers who are themselves only temporary sojourners in the city. Pastors of churches, inspired with the hopeful prospects before them, have relinquished their well-earned summer holiday, in order to stand in the front of the battle, and as a result their congregations show a marked increase in attendance and interest.

Yet another gleam of light shines forth from the once dark outlook. The "Open Sunday" question (which has been bandied about from court to court, each reversing the decision of the one below, until heads are muddled and hearts are sick, while lawyers alone rejoice) has had at any rate one really good effect. It has consolidated those all over the country whose desire it is to honour the law of the Lord, and brought out many, whose profession had been but partial, to declare themselves openly on the side of God as against the world. And some of these are identifying themselves with various forms of aggressive Christian work.

All this is very encouraging, and while, no doubt, excrescences of evil will grow upon the original creation of the Fair and so far justify the fears that have been entertained, the and stimulates with renewed energy those who labour in the field. While the working man has been ostensibly made the stalking-horse of Sunday opening, he has turned his heel on the Fair and gone to "hear the preachin'" in circus and theatre instead. And the daily Press, which has bolstered up this flimsy plea, gives away its own cause when on each succeeding Monday morning it expatiates not only upon the "orderly and respectable," but also the "well-dressed" nature of "yesterday's crowd at the Fair." And not to be left behind, the authorities include in the day's total the 40,000 employés, who would only too thankfully be elsewhere if they could!

Take, for instance, last Sunday (June 25). In addition to the regular churches (and they are rising well to their opportunities), the Gospel was put forth in its Evangelical simplicity in two theatres, two tents, and several other buildings to audiences totalling up to over 30,000. First of all, the Haymarket Theatre, one of the largest in Chicago, was crowded out before 10.30 a.m., and, as on previous occasions, it was said that hundreds were turned away. Mr. Moody engaged the spacious "Empire" to accommodate the overflow. At eleven o'clock the sidewalk was blocked. "Isn't the door opened yet?" asked a new arrival. "Opened!" was the reply. "Yes, half-an-hour ago, and shut again because the place is full!" And there, as in the Haymarket across the road, and in the great circus the two Sundays before, and in the Haymarket again the three Sundays previous to those, there were the working men occupying tier after tier of seats, and forming a good proportion of the male element, which on each occasion formed nearly eighty per cent. of the entire audience.

Messrs. Moody, McNeill, Fay Mills, Wharton, Schiverea, Merton Smith, each preaching not himself but Jesus Christ, are the men whom men throng to hear, because they speak as men to men, from heart to heart, and, if need be, hand to hand, to strengthen that which is weak and raise up that which is bowed down. After every meeting there come forward in large numbers those who earnestly desire to tread the narrow way, into which, from the Scriptures, Christian workers strive to lead them. And this is taking place Sabbath by Sabbath and night by night, all over a city given up to the pursuit of pleasure to an abnormal extent.

While writing of the meetings for adults, I must not overlook special efforts put forth on behalf of the children of high and low degree. Earlier in the spring a mission was held for them by Rev. Payson Hammond (dear to the hearts of many an adult Christian worker to whom he was blessed years ago, when, as little ones themselves, they heard of Jesus from his lips). His services, held in Mr. Moody's church, were attended with very hopeful results. More recently, in the same building, ten consecutive evenings were devoted to a survey of the life of Christ by Mr. Geo. D. McKay, of New York. This may be considered of which a few descriptive words may be of interest. Mr. McKay having travelled a good deal, and having an artist's life, became impressed with the possibility of utilising the genius portrayed in many of the old masterpieces in foreign galleries. Collecting copies of such as depicted events in the life of our Lord, he has had prepared a beautiful series of plates suited to the purposes of the "magic lantern." Provided further with a lantern of the most approved type, and with the latest appliances, he presents a series of dissolving views which are probably unequalled, at any rate in the particular line of subjects chosen. With very little descriptive talk, not more than is necessary as explanatory, he reads from a "harmonised" edition of the Gospels portions which bear upon the scenes presented, as they are recorded by the four evangelists. Thus, evening by evening, the juvenile audience is led from the cradle to the ascension of Jesus, familiarised with all the incidents which marked his earthly walk among men, and taught those lessons of life and doctrine which form the basis of the Christian faith. As in the mission held by Mr. Hammond, so in this, the Spirit of the Lord honoured the presentation of the Word, and among adults as well as children there appeared a laying hold of the things that pertain unto salvation.

The pastor of the church in which these gatherings were held is Rev. T. B. Hyde, an athletic young Irishman, who, in company with his friend, Mr. W. C. Stevenson, has been greatly used in evangelistic work in many parts of Ireland. Speaking of Irishmen, it will gratify our good friend Mr. William Fry, of Dublin (who holds an honoured place in the hearts of many readers of this paper), to know that the Irish "boys" whom he passed as apparently suitable for Gospel work and sent out (in response to Mr. Moody's appeal for young men last winter) to the Bible Institute, are well buckled to harness and proving themselves efficient and earnest in the Master's cause. Some of them have, in union with their American brethren, undertaken work of a particularly arduous and trying character, but the free and hearty Hibernian nature comes well to the front in dealing with the drunkard, and those whom sin has brought to an end of all things but suicide or God. One splendid characteristic of "Mr. Moody's boys" (of whatever nationality) is their readiness to go at the word of command into church or slum, among poor or well-to-do, thieves or church-members, just wherever, at a moment's notice, they may be required. And a finer training for practical Gospel work at home and abroad than is given at the Institute would be hard to find.

I conclude this in Northfield, Mr. Moody's beautiful native "town," among the hills of the Connecticut valley. This week has been occupied with a convention for young ladies from the various American colleges, similar in kind to the annual summer school for young men, which begins to-morrow. Reports of these will follow in due course, with such general notes of progress in Chicago as I can obtain from reliable correspondents on the spot. Mr. Moody is here for a few days, but as soon as the young men are "in full swing" he will rejoin his forces at the Fair. Elastic as he is, he cannot occupy two places at once, much as he would like to, and much to his regret. G. E. M.

"GOD GIVETH THE INCREASE."

Occasionally in the subscription columns of The Christian there appears a donation to the British Syrian Mission. It will interest the kind sowers of the seed, whether the seed be God's Word sown in the hearts of the children, or the money which friends in England give to the work (2 Cor. ix. 5—15), to hear how God gives the increase even in the uttermost parts of the earth. A young lady, daughter of Rev. H. B. Macartney, has just sent me the following account of the fruit of the teaching in the schools in Damascus. E. A. B.

I was visiting in the Melbourne Hospital one day last year in connection with the Flower Mission, when I noticed a new case, a woman with a dark skin and very dark hair. Thinking she was asleep I passed on, but on coming down the ward again she opened her eyes and stretched out her hands for some of my flowers. I gave her some, and found that she was one of the Syrian women who carry about small things for sale in the streets. When I asked her if she knew my Saviour her face lit up so brightly, and she said, "Oh, yes!" Then she told me that she had heard about Him first, and learned to love Him as a little girl in a school at Damascus, and she was now teaching her children about Him too.

I left her one of my favourite texts, "Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty," and the following Wednesday, directly she saw me, she said so eagerly, "I remember the text you taught me, and I have been saying it over to myself, 'Mine eyes shall see the King in his beauty!'" She soon got better and left the hospital, and I have not seen her since, but I have her name (Babea Keamy) in my Bible; she wrote it herself, that I might remember to pray for her.

The House of Rest.

The monthly meeting on Friday was addressed by Rev. H. G. Thwaites, who spoke on Paul's prayer for the Ephesian converts (iii. 14 and following verses), pointing out how the realisation of that prayer might be the experience of every true follower of Jesus Christ.

Praise was given by one of the inmates for the Aged Workers' Home, and for its close proximity to the House of Rest, and for the opportunity thus afforded to the occupants of sharing in the privileges of the periodical meetings.

In the evening Dr. Montague Miller spoke on practical salvation and the necessity of glorifying God in everyday life.

Just now the accommodation of the House of Rest, both in London and at Eastbourne, is being taxed to its utmost, and many workers are finding much-needed rest within its hospitable walls.

THE CONDEMNED ARMENIANS.

As publicly announced at the close of the week, the two Armenian Professors, unjustly condemned to death at Angora, have been pardoned by the Sultan and expatriated. This, so far as it goes, is satisfactory; but it cannot be forgotten that fifteen equally innocent Christians still lie under sentence of death; while about forty more are sentenced to an imprisonment which must be worse than death. In these circumstances it was felt that the meeting called for Monday evening, in Exeter Hall, was still necessary and must be held.

In opening the proceedings, Dr. Evans Darby outlined briefly the history of the case, expressed thankfulness for the release of the Professors—who are expected in London in a few days—and read the following important letter from the Principal of the Marsovan College, whose intimate acquaintance with Turkey and Armenia lends peculiar weight to his words. It was written to the secretary of the Evangelical Alliance:—

My Dear Mr. Arnold,—Am I satisfied with the result reached in the case of the teachers of Anatolia College? Most certainly not. "Pardoned" and exiled! And how about the Gemerek pastor and others?

Let alone the wrong done to these men and to the College, the Ottoman Government has done itself a still greater greater wrong. It is the presence and influence of just such men in Asia Minor that would do most to preserve peace in those provinces.

It is of the utmost importance that British Christians correctly apprehend the exact problem that now faces them. It is not simply "Religious Persecution" or "Moslem Intolerance" on the one hand; or "Political Uprising" on the other. It is natural, legitimate, loyal Christian aspiration and enterprise rudely repressed—sometimes by the ignorance or greed of under officials, criminally repressed—till, here and there, it bursts out in extreme and dangerous forms, which everybody deplores.

It is, thank God, still possible to preserve peace in Asia Minor, but there is not an hour to be lost. The will of Christian Europe must be uttered at Constantinople, unmistakably and decisively. Drastic measures of coercion are fraught with peril, even to Europe, in the present state of feeling in Asia Minor.

Reliable information up to the 24th ult., from different places in the heart of Asia Minor, shows persistence in imprisoning innocent and loyal men—a course which is inviting disaster.

Till very lately I am sure a policy of confidence towards Christians in those provinces, even to putting educated Christians into the Civil Service, would have met the response of unswerving loyalty. Even now I would fain hope it may not be too late to preserve the peace of Western Asia and South-Eastern Europe by a considerate and just administration of Government in Asia Minor.

We Americans have no political interests in that country. Our interests are philanthropic and Christian; our work is, in the widest and truest sense of the word, educational.

Those who know Turkey best are best aware of the gravity of the present situation, and of how critically necessary it is that the strong and united influence of Christian Europe be brought to bear without delay. And let it not be forgotten that this influence will signify nothing if merely sporadic and impulsive; it must be determined, continuous, and effective.

Every human interest in Turkey needs the steady aid of Christian Europe.

Faithfully yours,
(Signed) George F. Herrick.

Mr. Albert Spicer, M.P., who presided, said:—We are not here to interfere in any way with Armenian or Turkish politics. We are here as English Christians to ask the Sultan that justice should be done to our fellow Christians. We believe they are perfectly innocent of the charges brought against them. We base our demand on the fact that the trial was a mock trial, and the evidence mainly forged documents. While the Professors have been released others are under sentence of death or of imprisonment, accompanied by cruelties we can hardly understand. We demand the release of these innocent persons. We demand it further on the ground of common humanity and of rights secured to this country by the Cyprus Convention. The Chairman supported his plea by reading an extract from a letter received describing the abominable tortures inflicted on one young man in order to induce him to confess. When brought before the Court he simply pointed to his horrible scars, saying, "These wounds speak for me: They are my tongue."

Rev. J. Oswald Dykes, D.D., moved the first resolution:—

That this meeting, representative of the Protestant Churches of Great Britain, has heard with profound regret of the arrest, imprisonment, and condemnation of members of the Armenian Christian Church, on charges of alleged complicity with political movements, and hereby expresses its horror at the injustice and cruelty meted to people who have been abundantly proved to be innocent.

We have, said the speaker, every reason to believe that our Government has done its best in this matter, and we are thankful for the results so far. We do not wish to interfere in the administration of justice in Turkey, but we demand that the charge of treason should not be used as a cloak for hatred of religion. The hostility of the Turks against the ancient Church of Armenia is nothing new, and Turkish dislike of the Evangelical Church is peculiarly strong. This may be seen in the destruction of the College at Marsovan, the mock trials, and the crushing blow inflicted on the work going on. Now we say we have a twofold right to let our voice be heard in this respect. First, in common with all the Great Powers and by virtue of Article XXI. of the Berlin Treaty; and secondly, by virtue of the Cyprus Convention guaranteeing reforms in Armenia. Under this Convention we are called upon to interfere in case of injustice and cruelty to the innocent.

Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., seconded the resolution, which was unanimously carried.

Mr. R. C. Morgan moved the second resolution:

That this meeting heartily thanks Lord Rosebery and the Foreign Office for the strenuous efforts they have made on behalf of the condemned Christians of Asia Minor, which it thankfully recognises have been so far successful in securing the release of MM. Thoumaian and Kayayan. At the same time, it exceedingly regrets the unjust banishment of these men, and earnestly appeals for the exercise of the same good offices on behalf of other condemned, but equally innocent, prisoners who have not been released.

He said: I feel that letter from Dr. Herrick is exceedingly important, because it had been said that the American missionaries had withdrawn their support from these Professors, whereas it is now made clear that they have not. The speaker proceeded to read extracts from a letter just received, giving details of some of the prisoners still under sentence of death, or of an imprisonment which really is far more terrible than death. Anyone who knows the nameless horrors of a Turkish prison will feel that death is to be preferred. One of these prisoners (condemned to fifteen years' imprisonment) is the pastor of Gemerek, who has been remarkably used of God in the work of revival. His labours have been wholly of an evangelistic nature, but the blessing which has attended them seems to have aroused the jealousy and awakened the fears of the Turkish rulers. Other cases were cited of less-known but similarly devoted men, and one woman; and the speaker maintained that these testimonies afforded ample reason for the passing of the resolution. We have sufficient evidence that the punishment of these people is entirely unjust and unmerited.

Rev. G. D. Matthews, D.D., in seconding the resolution, showed that the alarm felt by the Turks was due to the awakened intelligence of the Armenians. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson moved:—

That this meeting urgently reminds the Signatory Powers to the Treaty of Berlin and the Cyprus Convention of 1878, of the obligations binding upon them through these instruments, and it respectfully appeals to the British Foreign Office to take such steps as may be necessary to secure the fulfilment of the pledges given by the Turkish Government to grant religious freedom to all classes of its subjects "throughout the Ottoman Empire," and to introduce necessary reforms in Asia Minor "into the Government, and for the protection of the Christians and other subjects of the Porte in these territories."

This was seconded by Rev. W. Mottram, and carried unanimously, after a slight verbal amendment on the suggestion of a gentleman in the audience, familiar with the state of things in the East.

Dr. Darby moved, and the Chairman seconded:—

That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary, and the representatives of the Signatory Powers.

The proceedings, which had been commenced with prayer, were then concluded with the Benediction.

YOUR CHILDREN are pieces of fine gold. You are the die stamper. See that the image of the King is clear on each one of them.—Rev. George Woodcock.

AMONG YAHGAN INDIANS.

MRS. HEMMINGS, who has laboured with much success among the women of Ooshooia, Tierra del Fuégo, recently rehearsed the story of her work to an English audience. She said: "Having recovered from a very serious illness, through God's love and mercy, I had a desire for some special work for Him. I placed myself under training as a nurse; and I was led step by step in answer to prayer. Just at the time when I had taken my diplomas the door was opened in an unforeseen manner, and I was accepted as one of their agents in the South American Mission. In 1884 I sailed from Liverpool. On landing at Ooshooia I had to encounter much difficulty and disappointment; for, whereas I went out as a sick nurse, I found myself practically 'maid of all work' in a family of fifteen boys and girls such as I cannot describe.

"In consequence of the terrible mortality contingent on an epidemic of measles, which raged some months before my arrival, I could get no help of any kind, and the work of feeding, clothing, and training this family of genuine savages fell on me —work for which I was physically unfit, and wholly unaccustomed to, particularly the washing. I had, however, to learn that, and many other things as well, by teaching my rough charges. Over and over again has my heart failed, but good Mr. Bridges kept me up with words of cheer and encouragement; and as I daily felt more interest in my family, difficulties smoothed down. But my first years at Ooshooia were too overburdened for the broadest back to bear without bending, and at last I became seriously ill, but the Lord had work for me to do, and I was restored.

"Making and baking bread for this family, cooking all meals, teaching them to wash and scour, and at night when they were asleep, making or mending clothes, seemed enough with endless household duties, but soon came and the sad trial of seeing one after another of my brightest and most promising children sicken and die. This was hard to bear, night after night watching the young lives ebbing away, and then alone performing all the last sad offices, and in the silence of the night carrying out the dead, to return to the house, perhaps to sit again the solitary watcher by another dying child. These poor children died of tuberculosis, so common and fatal a disease amongst the Fuegians. Their piteous moanings were sad to hear, and we grieved sorely as we saw one after another, eight one year, five the next, and so on, dying off as they became civilised, and as we rejoiced to believe also Christians.

"But now we can trace our Father's tender and loving hand in this trial. Many of these children bore living witness to Christ on their happy deathbeds, whilst all accepted 'the story of the love of Jesus' in child-like simple faith, because the missionaries, their kind and faithful friends, had told them of it, and it must be true! Indeed, none ever seemed to question the truth of God's love to them, when they understood it. Surely we can now thank God for calling home these our dear children when, in recent years, we see that the tide of emigration has reached even our destitute shores, gold having been discovered, the miners and others introducing amongst our simple and weak Christian natives the evils of their civilisation.

"Having been much struck by the aimless, useless, idle lives led by the women, squatting in the wigwams all day except when out fishing in the canoes, the thought came to me to gather a few together and

TEACH THEM TO KNIT.

I started a sort of mothers' meeting in my kitchen with eighteen members. Even hopeful Mr. Bridges gave no encouragement to this scheme. 'You will never teach these women to knit,' said he to me. Certainly it was not an easy task. The counting of the stitches seemed an insuperable difficulty, as the Yahgans only count up to three. Having set up, say, 100 stitches, I would give a piece of stick the length of the plain part of the stocking, which they would have to bring to me when so long. I devised the plan of giving them, say, eighty-eight beans in a bag, and when they had done the narrowing they had a stitch for each bean.

"They are wonderfully quick in imitation, and quickly took up the idea of turning and goring the heel. I give them a shirt or a jacket for knitting one long pair of stockings, and a complete dress for two pairs. They are very proud to carry home, too, a shirt for their husbands for knitting a pair of stockings, and as I can sell any number of the coarse men's sea-boat stockings at £1 for six pairs, you see my knitters not only can benefit themselves and their people, but are a source of income to the Mission. This profit I hope to increase when have taught them to

SPIN OUR OWN WOOL.

It is my ambition, if God will, to establish this industry in Tierra del Fuégo before I die. Wool is there in abundance, and although our poor Yahgans are fast dying out, there are the Onas and the Alaculoofs."

Mr. W. W. Tuckniss, 3, Hillside Grove-hill, Woodford, informs us that during her recent visit to Great Britain, Mrs. Hemmings showed specimens of the socks knitted by the Yahgans. The work was greatly admired, and not least by those who remembered that it was done by the fingers of people whom the late Charles Darwin once declared to be incapable of moral or intellectual elevation. Our correspondent says: "This devoted lady, on coming to England for a holiday, determined to go to Cork to learn the art of carding, dyeing, spinning, and weaving wool, in order to take out a loom, and teach the poor natives of Tierra del Fuégo this useful industry. I think you will agree with me that this is a unique but most interesting feature of missionary work. Mrs. Hemmings has mastered the art to which she applied herself, and on July 5 she sailed with her loom for Ooshooia, where, I trust, the Lord will permit her to establish this lasting boon to the poor women of the region."

Some further information regarding the work is given in the July issue of the Juvenile Gift, copies of which may be had from the offices of the South American Missionary Society, 1, Clifford's-inn, Fleet-street, E.C.

A STUNDIST'S FAITH HONOURED.

THE following incident has just reached the writer from an authentic source. Quite lately, a large number of Russian criminals were standing in the courtyard of their prison, chained together, and about starting for their long sad journey into Siberian wilds. Amongst them was one Christian man, a Stundist, sharing their banishment and punishment, simply because he had spoken to his fellow-workmen about the faith which made him count all things as dross for Christ's sake. His fellow-prisoners were jeering him about it, saying, "But you're no better off than we are. You are wearing the bracelets (handcuffs) as we do; if your God is of any use to you, why doesn't He knock off your chains, and set you free?"

The man replied reverently, "If the Lord will, He can set me free even now, and though my hands are chained, my heart is free!" At that very moment a voice was heard calling him by name, and telling him that a paper had just been received granting him a full pardon. He was then told to stand aside, and his chains were struck off. At the same time the prison gates were thrown open, and all the rest of the convicts filed out, the Stundist alone remaining behind, with permission to return to his family and friends.

It is said that the prisoners were perfectly awe-stricken and solemnised with the impression of what they had witnessed. It transpired afterwards that a Christian lady in a high position, who took interest in this poor labouring man, had asked and obtained his pardon. But how marvellously God was glorified in its arrival at such a moment; and who can tell what blessings may have been born for the spiritual emancipation of the poor criminals, whose chained bodies were trudging wearily to their exile home? PHILADELPHIA.

AT ALL THE RACE MEETINGS held at Newton and Aintree the Liverpool C.E. Temperance Society is represented by its Racecourse Mission. On Friday and Saturday the Newton Races were attended by several missionaries of the Society and of the Manchester City Mission, who distributed 2500 illustrated temperance and anti-betting narrative tracts. Conversations took place between the missionaries and the frequenters of the course. Several meetings were held, at which the arguments of the workers were well received. The Vicar of Earlestown, Rev. T. R. Matthews, and his curate, Rev. E. W. W. Kaye, gave every facility and encouragement to the missionaries.

BASUTOS AND ISRAEL.

The following letters have been forwarded to Mr. Hermann Warszawiak, missionary to the Jews, New York:—

Morija, Basutoland, S. Africa,
June 7, 1893.

Dear Mr. Warszawiak,—

You will like to hear that even here in South Africa there are some that think of you and pray for you. I send you a letter that has been written by our mission band. We meet once every month and talk about missions. Your conversion and wonderful work among your own people in New York has interested us all very much, and we praise our God that He has chosen you to tell about our Saviour. Our boys can well appreciate the difficulties you have encountered, as many have passed through the same experiences, having had to suffer persecutions, and forsake either parents, wives, or children to follow the Master.

At our last meeting before the holidays we made a plan of collecting some money in order to send you part of it, to get New Testaments for those that could not buy them, or to use it in any way you would think fit. We send you £1. It will have some value in your eyes if you think that many of our boys have had to deny themselves in order to give threepence or sixpence. I shall tell you some of the ways the boys got money. One said: "While at home I took a few planks, made a stool, and sold it to father for sixpence." Another: "I had made beautiful plans about getting money, but could find no work, although I wished so much for it. Just as I was leaving home, a little boy gave a shilling to buy a box of sardines. I was so glad, and said, 'Lord, this is for thee!'"

I could tell you of many more, but this will show you that you are loved here. We shall be very thankful to hear about your work if you can spare us a few moments. You will like to know that my dear father is a great friend of Israel, and prays very faithfully for their conversion on every Saturday. He also teaches his church to do the same.

May the Lord bless you and use you to bring many souls to his Son Jesus. We are so glad to hear that your wife is anxious to come to Jesus. She will find Him.—Believe me, dear sir, yours very truly, EUGENIE MABILLE.

[Translation of Letter addressed to Mr. Warszawiak by the Students of the Bible School at Morija.]

Morija, Basutoland, S. Africa,
June 6, 1893.

Servant of Jesus Christ, whom we love,—We wish to tell you with what joy we have heard about you from our missionary. We praise God for the light which has shone in your soul, and for the zeal and love which has made you wish to be a faithful witness of Jesus Christ amongst your countrymen. God has chosen you, like the Apostle Paul, to work for Him among your own people.

We, the young men of the Bible School at Morija, rejoice over you. We also have been brought out of darkness to the wonderful light of the Gospel. We are getting instructed, and are preparing to go out into the darkness of heathenism, which is still so great in our country, to tell of the great love of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

It is through the missionaries who came from France that we learnt that there is no other way of salvation but through Jesus Christ. The same power which has worked in you has worked in us. We send our little mite to help on your work of love. It is very little, but we pray for you and love you through having heard of you through our missionary, Rev. A. Mabille.

This is our salutation to you—contained in 1 John iii. 1—3 and 16.—For the Bible school:

THE SHEFFIELD BOARD OF GUARDIANS have resolved that the whole of the pauper children under their charge shall be removed from the workhouse, and brought up in such a way as to be free from the workhouse taint.

TARSUS BIBLE-TEACHING MISSION.—The London Committee formed in support of Mr. Krikor Behesnilian's work for the evangelisation of Cilicia feel greatly the need of more liberal aid. At present £70 is required in order to meet the expenses of the mission to the end of October. The hon. sec. is Mr. Charles Perrott, 10, Essex-road, Watford, Herts.

Letters to Dorothy.—8.

'Tis the last letter of this series, Dorothy, and now I'll gather up for you the joys of such a life as I've begun to live, as I would place a great bunch of roses in your hand.

First of all, the great crimson-hearted celestial rose without a thorn—acquaintance and companionship with Christ. Who knows its sweetness as the Christian worker? In the beginning of miracles, where "He manifested forth his glory and his disciples believed on Him"—as I would rather have been a servant at that feast than an invited guest, so would my soul desire the servant's part in the banquet of life.

Sooner or later our hearts must learn that in the sweet command of the gentle mother of Jesus, "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it," lies their only possibility of joy. "Fill . . . and they filled them up to the brim; draw out now, and bear . . . and they bare it." Hidden in that sweet parenthesis, for the eyes that shall find it, lies the pearl of reward, "But the servants which drew the water knew."

"The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him," also with those who work for Him.

I would miss all else in Christian experience rather than those choice revealings which come in busiest moments while serving others at his command.

"And where I am, there shall also my servant be."

The servants of the story had to be within the reach of Christ's eye and voice to help Him. In such close companionship 'tis only natural He should tell them something confidential which He could not to an idler.

In an afternoon when we go from house to house to tell what we know of our dear Lord (alas! we can never tell more than we know), He often whispers to us some happy secret how He purposes to make us an answer to some poor soul's prayer.

"I am among you as one that serveth."

"The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life."

How his yearning over the unshepherded multitudes momentarily wore upon Him, only those midnight hours of communion can measure.

He felt that virtue had gone out of Him. Until we spend ourselves to that point of exhaustion, which compels us to go to the Lord to renew our strength, we are not as our Master. "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master. For the Father loveth the Son, and showeth Him all things that Himself doeth."

Another rose, my dear. Fold back the petals, the fragrance lies within its very heart—this Word of God: "Whoso is wise and will observe these things, even they shall understand the lovingkindness of the Lord"—our opportunity to study God's wonder-workings in the lives of others.

"Look also upon the things of others." With that look spiritual discernment grows and yields precious fruit.

As we carry the "word in season to him that is weary," we learn to watch well the lips and lives of those whom we would help; often through them the Spirit would send some lesson of high courage, unselfishness, or patience.

Those who ask comfort give teaching. Eyes that have wept much see clear. Those who have been without things have certain soul-strengths to bestow upon us who have not known life's struggle.

As we learn the histories of families, we can illustrate our Bibles with pictures from the experience of others.

I'll give you one full-page illustration from mine. As I became acquainted with a family of whom I have told you before, each member of it at different times told me in a very impressive way a particular something that had happened in their family life. "Do you know," the youngest boy said, "that once two young ladies dressed all in black and with white strings to their bonnets, came to our house? They talked to us all the afternoon about heaven and God and beautiful things. My mother asked them to stay to tea. Do you know them?"

In his thought they remained a vision—as a sort of angel-visitants, to whom everyone who spoke of "God and heaven and beautiful things" must be related.

"Two lovely young ladies came to the house one day," another day the mother told me; "they were dressed in black with white bonnet strings; they talked just as you do. I asked them to stay to tea, because they seemed lonesome like, and I thought they'd enjoy it. They made me want to turn round and be good again then, but afterward I was so hurried with my work washin' and all comin' in so fast that I didn't. Then we moved, and I haven't ever seen them again, but I never forgot them."

"That's like what one o' them young ladies in black told us, ain't it, Jimmy?" another little brother said one day.

Even "Sister Sally," when I called upon her one day, at once began the same tale of the ladies in black.

Those "ladies in black" have become such a living reality in my mind that I could almost write a novel about them à la Wilkie Collins's "Woman in White."

After all, this being something to somebody else never to be forgotten, is a wonderful thing.

"Sow beside all waters"..."for thou knowest not..." Dear young ladies in black! the "alchemy" of their influence extends to me.

To that precious afternoon, perhaps forgotten now by them, must have been due the ease with which the seed I sowed sprang up in these prepared hearts.

To be a link in a chain of influence is privilege. Some one speaks a true word that rouses our heart at the time, sinks deep down, is "snowed under" by and by, as experiences fall upon us, and almost forgotten. But another comes our way some day, and speaks another true word in the same strain; instantly that other truth awakes and stirs to add its force to the new word, and so it goes ad infinitum. The latest one in the procession of those God sends to influence a certain soul can have the accumulation of all these former good impressions for his help.

"What you say reminds me of a young fellow who used to work for me," a poor drinking man said to me. He straightened up as he remembered that he once employed men. "He was a Christian, that young fellow was. The others used to laugh at him, but I always stood up for him, and at that time I really wanted to be like that young fellow, I did."

Here comes the same lesson.

Blessed to be allowed to remind anybody of the good already stored within, and to add more to help the next.

"Observe" again. Join with other forces to change the environment of a soul, find a new boarding place, a church home, inspiring friends for some lonely young girl, then watch the miracle of transformation under new conditions.

When we used to read Ruskin's "Modern Painters" for its art criticism we must have skipped a place where he tells us that the black mud or slime of the footpath—the absolute type of impurity—is composed of four elements; clay mixed with soot, a little sand, and water. Separate these—the clay particles, left to follow their own substance, so set that it can deal with light in a wonderful way, gathering out of it the loveliest blue rays only, refusing the rest. We call it then a sapphire. The sand arranges itself in mysterious parallel lines, which reflect the blue, green, purple, and red rays in the greatest beauty. We call it then an opal. The soot exchanges the blackness it once had for the power of reflecting all the rays of the sun at once in the vividest blaze possible to any solid. We call it then a diamond. Last of all, the water becomes a dewdrop and a crystalline star of snow. I read it now as a sermon on my parish.

Now a white rose—of comfort. Is the heart sorrowful? Whence more naturally does consolation flow than from such heart-to-heart work for souls?

"Son of Man, behold I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke."

"And at even my wife died; . . . and I did in the morning as I was commanded."

Often in the very rising up to do the bidding comes the instant consolation.

Surely in the great thoughts which flow from out the heart of God to his workers, in the lessons such work naturally brings, and in the comfort of comforting others "by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God," lies that "blessedness which is better than happiness."

These are only a few of the choicest from my rose-garden of joys.

But is the path all strewn with roses? No, indeed; but we call our trials spurs to prick us on towards the "goal."

Do not think I have told you half of either joys or difficulties. I have written to you in this way partly as a review lesson for myself. There is a sadness in it, too, as I realise more when stopping to think it over, that I have not yet attained.

What afterwards? God knows. Many of these students look toward definite missionary work in the home land or beyond the seas. I could go home and live to do the small duties of every day with a happier heart now that I see life out of these new spectacles Bible Institute people wear.

If I go, I carry with me treasures which I shall never lose. I have gained a new conception of the Holy Ghost, as witnessed in the sweet life of this student family as a whole, and in the life of our dear mother and her helpers, or as revealed through the life of each one finding her work and dispensing her spiritual life, and through those special baptisms of service bestowed upon many consecrated hearts. I have found a deepened realisation of the power of prayer and communion with God. "Take time to be holy" might almost be called the motto of this house; and I rejoice in a new-born expectation of the coming of our Lord. How delightful to have lived in such a family of busy students, where everyone was a Christian. I have not told you of our Saturday-night prayer-meeting, because it is untellable. All here know its influence. But to-day in the happy Christmas season as I went among my people, and imagined how I should feel were it for the last time, my heart realised how much they are to me.

While I was greeting a new little baby who had come into one or my poorest homes, and the children crowded around me to listen in wonderment to the story of baby Jesus born in a manger—the half-drunk father eagerly listening, too, to this echo of forgotten Sunday-school teachings and promising to let the children go this winter where they can hear such stories every Sunday—I could not help praying: God, let it be thy holy will that I stay here with these my people, and lead them and their little ones to Thee. Those people really love that baby boy. When I see how his coming has bettered them in every way, I understand why the Christ came to us.

Sometimes in vision I see your little Edith seated in a pretty home, which please God should be an object-lesson for coziness and comfort, right in the midst of that weary dirty street—the little children gathered round me, their fathers and mothers welcome to come at will, to share all my "things," and I a friend to them all, their "for keeps." What think you? "Forget not to show love unto strangers." "Remember them in bonds as bound with them."

These sentences have become a pleading voice, which takes on at times the pressure of command. If I heed, shall I not heed that other word? "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me."

THE LORD IS MY PORTION.

I love Thee, I love Thee, my Father, my God;
I love Thee, I love Thee, Christ Jesus, my Lord;
I love Thee, I love Thee, blest Heavenly Dove:
Most humbly I bring Thee my heart's deepest love.

I trust Thee, I trust Thee, my Father, my God;
I trust Thee, I trust Thee, Christ Jesus my Lord;
I trust Thee, I trust Thee, O Guide of my soul:
As safely I journey beneath thy control.

I praise Thee, I praise Thee, my Father, my God;
I praise Thee, I praise Thee, Christ Jesus my Lord;
I praise Thee, I praise Thee, great Fountain of Light:
To sing to thy praise is my spirit's delight.

Draw nearer, draw nearer, my Father, my God;
Draw nearer, draw nearer, Christ Jesus, my Lord;
Draw nearer, draw nearer, O Spirit of Grace:
And make my whole being thine own dwelling-place.

Oh! use me, oh! use me, my Father, my God;
Oh! use me, oh! use me, Christ Jesus, my Lord;
Oh! use me, blest Spirit, Christ's love to proclaim:
And draw weary sinners to trust in his name.

Then take me, oh! take me, my Father, my God;
Then take me, oh! take me, Christ Jesus, my Lord;
Then take me, oh! take me, great Spirit of Love,
To praise Thee and serve Thee for ever above.

Sketches from Sicily.

BY REV. O. GOLIA-MAURO, GIRGENTI.

THE CHURCH OF GROTTE.

Grotte is a little country town of 12,000 or 13,000 inhabitants; it formerly bore the name of Erbesso. This large mass of drab-coloured huts, placed one above the other in great disorder, extends from the top of a hill to the base of the little valley beneath, with monotony and sadness. Here it was that, last October, I arrived with my wife to take the direction of the church which, for the last eight years, has been in the midst of this population the light which shines in the darkness.

The foundation of this little church was owing, under God, to the courage and zeal of the elder Stephano Dimino. Notwithstanding his fifty-four years, and a large patriarchal beard which descends over his chest almost entirely white, he is the most energetic member of the congregation. He was born in 1838, and his father placed him in the seminary of Girgenti to educate him for a priest. But the young man had other intentions, for this career was repugnant to his conscience. As soon as he had finished his studies, with the rights of mass and confession, without abandoning his post he worked among his colleagues, in view of persuading them of the errors of the Romish Church, with the result that for a certain time they all declared themselves openly against confession, purgatory, etc. Thus, guided only by the voice of conscience, for seven consecutive years, from 1872 to 1879, in company with the church of Grotte, at the head of which he was morally placed, he warred against the Pope, declaring that he refused to recognise him as supreme head.

The Sovereign Pontiff excommunicated the clergy of the place. This excommunication had the effect of frightening the new Protestants, who saw themselves all at once deprived of mass—their means of gaining bread. On account of their financial position, almost all retired from the combat, and again made their act of submission to Pius IX. But our Stephano Dimino, more resolute than ever, did not waver in his principles; although they offered him ecclesiastical titles of honour, he continued alone the opposition, and had recourse, in order to justify and sustain his principles, to the public press. In 1875 he resolved to influence workingmen especially, and to give to his reform a more popular character. He founded a workmen's society, which he designated "Truth and Justice"; that society prospered so much that the newspapers called Grotte the S. Martino of Sicily (S. Martino, a little republic of 8000 inhabitants between Urbino and Pesaro).

Little by little the journals and the society became insufficient as a scope for his activity, and he made use of the market place and public streets to hold discourses against the errors of the Pope. Then it was that the municipal authorities—incited by the bishop—wanted to put him under the special surveillance of the police. But our revolutionist at length came to triumph over his accusers, and even to conquer the affections of the people.

In the month of August, 1884, an artist from Catania arrived in Grotte for the purposes of his profession. He was evangelical, and filled with zeal for the truth; having heard of the combat taking place against Romanism, he begged to make the acquaintance of the priest, and made known to him the Bible. To the voice of conscience thus was added the light of the Word of God, until then unknown to him, and the scales fell from his eyes. The Gospel came to renew the strength necessary for the combat which followed, when his clerical colleagues had become even more enraged than ever, but all was in vain. He resolved to send his resignation to the bishop; this he did by a telegram openly announcing to Monsignor Turano that he for ever quitted the Romish Church.

The bishop excommunicated him immediately, and had it put in print. This simply made the excommunicated one laugh; so one bright day he took the decree and burnt it publicly in the market-place, in sight of all the people. A short time after, he sent to affix to the door of the Cathedral of Girgenti, a notice declaring himself excommunicated, according to the Word of God, from which he cited proof passages. From that time dates the great patriarchal beard of our venerable elder, who even by his face would make known to the world that he had for ever ceased to be priest.

To public declarations against error must be added the propagation of the Truth. Man of action as he is, he questioned himself how he could best win souls to Christ. The response came—by means of night-schools. But where to get the means? Although belonging to a family of very good circumstances, he was not independent, and his people made opposition. He took planks, manufactured tables with his own hands, and in a house of his own opened the night-school. How was the light to be provided? A thought came into his mind. "I spend every day 2d. in cigars; if I ceased to smoke, with these twopences I could buy petroleum." No sooner said than done! and there stood the school filled with workmen, to whom he announced the Good News. The priests, as always, were not behindhand in damaging this new-born work, whose pupils sometimes diminished, sometimes increased, but a great number always remained faithful.

Being no longer priest, Signor Dimino was obliged to think of his own future; therefore he embraced the career of his father, and gave himself up to the exportation of sulphur. His mine became the first nucleus of the actual church, for often in the open air and in the bowels of the earth he assembled all the workmen together, explaining to them the Gospel, singing and praying with them, and—unheard-of thing in this country—very often of an evening ten or fifteen of these first adherents traversed the town singing hymns in the frequented streets, and charming all by such beautiful words and melodies.

It was necessary to push forward. He applied to the Waldensian pastor of Caltanisetta, who, in a room at the municipal Palazzo, lent by the Syndic of Grotte, came to hold the first great public meeting. Later on the work was regularly founded with fourteen catechumens, amongst whom were the brothers, the sister, and the sister-in-law of the founder. Vincenza—for thus is the sister called—was a nun, and as such in convent, but as soon as Stephano had his eyes opened to the Gospel she came out, and returned home. Although still a Roman Catholic, she secretly took the books which she saw read by her brother. One afternoon the brother, going into the room, surprised her bending over the table, with her head on her hands, pensive, and in despair. Seeing who it was, she cried indignantly, "Then the mass is not true! Confession is useless! Purgatory does not exist! That was what I believed in?" From that time she embraced the Gospel. The mother also, after many tears over the future of her well-beloved son, at the age of seventy-four years was converted, and received salvation.

Such was the commencement of the little church of Grotte. The narrative of its actual life and great influence in the midst of the population must be told another time.

CENTRAL INDIAN HILL MISSION.

A short sketch of the origin of this mission, which was started about three years ago, is published with the annual report for 1892. The mission has for its special object to reach the Kurkus and other hill tribes that inhabit the Sathpura Hills in Central India, and those who are working in connection with it are determined to live amongst the people as simply as possible, in order that they may quickly win their confidence. These poor degraded peoples, of whom the Kurkus alone number more than 100,000, hidden away in the dense jungle, are still, after more than 3000 years' oppression, waiting to hear and read in their own tongue the good news of the liberty which is theirs in Christ Jesus.

Already twelve missionaries are in the field. Wherever they meet the natives, they find them willing to listen, and grateful for any kindness shown them, and work is being actively carried on in many ways at their four stations of Ellichpur, Bhaisdehi, Thallar, and Bithron among all, both men and women, who can understand Hindi or Hindustani. The missionaries who went out in 1890 and 1891 have for a long time been holding meetings in the open air and in their houses, and of those who went out last autumn, some are already able to make themselves understood in a short address. The mission hopes to send out two more missionaries this autumn to meet the urgent call for labourers. One young man, a Sepoy, has already publicly declared his faith in Christ, and the prayers of the Lord's people are asked that he may be but the firstfruits of an abundant harvest. Further information may be had by addressing the hon. sec., 10, Drayton-park, London, N.

A PRIEST ON HIS CREED.

Whilst travelling in Italy some days ago I chanced to meet with a French priest, and the following conversation took place. He asked me, "Do you speak French?" "Yes, but I prefer speaking in Italian." "Have you been long in Italy?" "Three years." "Are you a Catholic?" "I belong to the Catholic Reformed Church, but your creed and mine are alike."

"What more do you believe?" "I believe we ought to pray to God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, but I do not pray to angels or saints, though I respect them." He answered, "Some people feel themselves too sinful and unworthy to draw nigh to the throne of God; they prefer seeking the intercession of saints on their behalf." I said, "We have access unto the Throne of Grace through Christ. Can you tell me whether the Jews ever asked Moses, Abraham, &c., to pray for them?" "I never heard of their doing so, I do not think they did." "The earliest Christians addressed all their prayers to God, did they not?" Yes, he agreed to that.

"Then when did the worship of saints begin?" "I cannot say, but very early indeed," he added. "I, too, prefer to go direct to God in prayer." I continued. "A Roman Catholic lady asked me what I thought of the Madonna of Loretto. My Madonna is in heaven, she is not in Rome, or in Florence, or at Loretto, but in Paradise." A Roman Catholic lady who had just entered the train exclaimed, "Ha raggiéne" (that is "You are right)". I said the Blessed Virgin would not recognise those images covered with ornaments as representations of herself." The priest said, "Her images are decked out in silks." "I said, "The humble lowly Virgin cared nothing for dress, pomp, and vanities of this world." "The votive offerings are acceptable." "I believe that if money were spent on the poor it would be more acceptable, for Jesus said, 'If you do it unto one of the least of these, ye do it unto Me.'"

I turned to the lady next me, and said, "Have you ever read the life of our Lord; Martini's translation, of course?" "Never." "What, never read about the birth, life, and death of Jesus?" "Never." The priest smiled. I said, "This pains me." He said, "It pains me too; they love newspapers, novels, but not that kind of reading. Do you carry God's Word about with you?" "Of course I do," and I drew out an Italian Gospel. He took it, and said, "This is St. Matthew's Gospel." The lady remarked, "I saw that little book once in the hands of a boy, and I took it and read it, but once one has read it over one cannot go on and on reading it over again." I said, "I read the Bible every day, and always find something new in it, more and more to learn." I also said, "I believe your Church has done wrong dividing the sacrament; one of the early popes said it was a sacrilege so to do." He said, "It is no sacrilege; it was so ordered because of certain abuses or difficulties in the way of receiving the cup."

I further asked, "Suppose a person robs his or her master, and confesses to you the theft, will you give absolution ere restitution is made?" He said, "I will give absolution first, but direct the person to restore the goods stolen." "But if the goods are not restored, is the person then absolved?" "Oh no, of course not."

Our conversation was then interrupted. Many of the priests are yearning for a reformation, and bewail the errors and superstitions around. A Roman Catholic English priest, lately come to Italy, was so horrified at seeing a tawdry dressed-up image of the Virgin placed over one of the High Altars in Venice, that he could not help exclaiming, "Who dared put that dressed up doll over the High Altar?" God's Word is being circulated far and wide, and where it penetrates light chases out darkness. Alas! it cannot find its way into the convents. We are living just opposite one where the nuns never come out, and never see their relations again. One of them has died raving mad; her screams were terrible to hear, and, as a Roman Catholic said, "No dog could have died a more terrible death." I commend them to the prayers of the readers of The Christian, that He who came to give liberty to the captives may give them light and freedom. I. M.

DEBT: A TESTIMONY.

A letter has been received by Rev. J. E. Linnell, the writer of the article on "Debt" which recently appeared in our columns, from which we extract the following:—

Allow one who read your article on "Debt" with interest and gratitude in The Christian, to testify to the truth of your sound advice to old and young, especially to those who profess to know the will of God. My husband, being Swiss, was sent to the port of London to work amongst foreign sailors in the year 1863. On account of his unusual knowledge of languages he worked there with pleasure and success for seven years, four of which I spent with him. After this we went with our two children to the port of Havannah, and in that splendid harbour, where no other missionary had been before, we had a never-to-be-forgotten time with the sailors of many nations.

It pleased God to take away my dear husband by yellow fever, leaving me, a lonely widow, to pass through the fever, and yet to be spared to my two little ones, aged three years and ten months, and two years. The loss meant simply everything but our three selves and clothing. I arrived in England because no vessel just then went to any other country, and I had to leave; my strength was gone and also my sight. Having arrived, I had to go into lodgings. I possessed a few pounds, which were given to my children on the passage home, and these I used. But in these days I made a covenant with God that I would never go into debt. Twenty-one years and a-half have passed, and I never did. I do not owe a penny to anyone in the world to my knowledge. I praise and adore the God of all grace; He left me often with ample opportunity to trust Him in the dark, but never did He withhold his grace to succour me. All those years my only income was £7 10s. per annum.

I worked many days and nights till three in the morning on such work as I could do, and did anything that God gave me to do. I visited in hospitals, prisons, and workhouses. I travelled with ladies, put my son and daughter to school, both at home and abroad, but never before I had every prospect of paying for them. Had I not made a covenant with my God, the God of the widow and fatherless? One night in August, 1877, I was on my knees, because of this very thing, till the sun rose over the hill opposite. Another time, when my son had finished school in 1885, we met in my bedroom every day at 8.30 p.m. all through August, to inquire of the Lord what to do. The door was opened, and in January he left school, and began to study his profession. He passed through the hospital, and since the age of twenty-three has not only kept himself and bought all his instruments, but he maintains me and his sister, who came ill from the place where she had been governess for two and a-half years. We are all provided for in a most comfortable manner. We have, praise God, no debt.

Once, in early schooldays, I had not the full amount to pay the school bill; so told the children why I did not send them. They persisted, and I found them praying in the garden every time I looked after them. This made me at last confess to them that I had had a remarkable dream, and they insisted that it would come true. I had really dreamed that I passed by a house in a certain road. This house only interested us because of the Norwegian sailors, of whom we knew so many. I dreamt that as I passed there a gentleman (he is still living) passed me and gave me exactly the sum required. My boy said, "Mother, if you go there and he does not come to you, I will be good and stay at home; but if you will not go, I shall be very sorry." I went the most roundabout way, and entered that road on the other side to where the house was situated; but imagine how I trembled when that very gentleman met me exactly on that spot, greeted me, and said: "I have been wanting to know your whereabouts, as I have a note for you in my pocket." So saying, he laid in my trembling hand the very sum required! The joy in our midst after my return, and the voices of these children giving thanks to their Almighty Father, will never be forgotten.

I do pray to the Lord that your article in The Christian may be brought home to many tried and unwise Christians, and so yield fruit to the glory of God.

SAILORS IN ROTTERDAM.

English sailors are numerous in Rotterdam, as I have found during a mission just held in the Norwegian Church. The week's mission was a time of joy and gladness, and the closing Sunday evening was a time of power and refreshing. The Dutch Christians rallied around the work splendidly. An important part of a seaman's missionary work is visiting the hospital several times during the week. So one afternoon we went to the hospital, which is certainly a splendid institution, wards clean and cheerful, nurses bright and respectful, and doctors skilful and kind. We found one lad from Bristol, who had lost his thumb, and after a little talk with him about better things, the missionary promised to send him some books and papers, for his stay in the hospital is likely to be prolonged. Sometimes many English sailors are found here, and this all means work for the missionary.

AT THE CEMETERY.

"An English sailor missing," such was the information given to the police, soon followed by "A dead body found." In one of the havens the body of a man had been found, which proved to be that of the missing man, a steady, active young fellow of twenty-eight, a widower, leaving his little children in England. The captain asked if we would conduct the funeral service, and accordingly we drove out to the cemetery, a little way from the city; here we met some of the messmates of the young man, and then from a shed the coffin was brought out. One of the men placed the English colours over the remains, and slowly we moved to the graveside. But, oh! what a spectacle met us there; no real grave—only the coffins placed at the end of a ridge of earth, and then covered lightly with a little sand. There were at least twenty coffins exposed to view, and in an overpowering stench and tropical heat we stood and conducted the service.

WITH THE MIDNIGHT MISSION.

At eleven on Sunday night we met the brethren appointed for night duty at the Y.M.C.A. rooms. After a time of earnest prayer we started forth. Mr. Hensing, the energetic president, had much of interest to tell us—how that the police resented them when they started, but now they have their hearty support and co-operation. We have seen midnight in London; but, oh! what a fearful revelation is a night in Rotterdam. True the evil does not come to you, you must go to the evil, and this will produce a revenue to the country. During our night's walk we saw scenes to make even devils tremble and shudder. "You see yonder house, sir, that's where they deal in young girls for this infamous market; when they fall sick or die these people will replace them with girls from Belgium, Germany, and sometimes England. That house with a policeman standing back and front is kept by a woman who has mere children as inmates. The police cannot close the house, for the woman has a licence, but by posting a policeman by the doors they thus starve her out, and hope in time to close the den of wickedness."

Next we meet a group of young men dangerously near a bad house. Mr. Hensing at once deals with them, with the result that they walk away with him, and make for their homes with many thanks, and this occurred many times during the night, and several young Englishmen were induced to turn aside from these dens. And then the walk through two streets which shall be nameless. Remember it is the Sabbath; here are shows, dancing-rooms, half-dressed women running out into the streets and inviting men to enter. Organs, drums, trumpets, screaming women, and cursing men. The whole a pandemonium of sin and vice in its worst form. Boys and girls crowding around the doors of the saloon and learning the way that leads to hell. Then how good it was to see the sturdy Dutch Christian plunging into the thick of the fray, warning here, pleading there, at one time taking a lad by the arm and leading him away, with women cursing and swearing, and men threatening and scowling. Bravely did our friend lead the lad away, and did not leave him till he was out of harm. One night two English lads were found on the brink of evil, and twice saved, once from a brothel as they were about to enter, and in getting them on board they fell in the water, and the good friend had to pull them out, having previously pulled them out of the fire. Every night this good work goes on. May God bless our Dutch brethren in their noble work. During the midnight walk one of the workers was charged as follows: "You are no Catholic, or you would not do this work, robbing us of our bread." Just so, it is because our brethren love the truth as it is in Jesus they do this work. One thing in Holland saddens us, when we remember what they have suffered from Rome and the Inquisition, and how grandly the Dutch stood for God and his truth. It is indeed sad to see the place overrun with priests and Romish institutions. The streets of Rotterdam have run with the blood of the saints, but now may God's people, remembering the past, be faithful, be true to the cross of Christ and his atoning blood. May God give them the spirit of three hundred years ago to banish the evil from their land and triumph over Rome and iniquity, and may England hear the voice saying, "Go thou and do likewise."

TO PARENTS AND TEACHERS.

Do not try to break your boy's spirit. By nature he is not clay that falls and flattens, but an india-rubber ball, that springs up every time it falls.

Ah! God is other than we think;
His ways are far above,
Far beyond reason's height, and reached
Only by child-like love.

No one goeth about a more godlie purpose than he that is mindfull of the good bringing up both of hys owne and other men's children.—Roger Ascham.

"'Tis education forms the common mind;
Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined."

A child, more than all other gifts
That earth can offer to declining man,
Brings hope with it, and forward-looking thoughts.

The Nonconformists of Bradford have made a complete house-to-house visitation of the town. Children in 50,000 homes were invited to attend Sunday-school.

Mother, please, do not worry yourself to mind about the mannerless boy next door; rather study the nature of the young hopeful whose jacket you brushed this morning.

There is no greater art than this of education; for what is equal to the power of disciplining the character and moulding the understanding of a youth?—St. Chrysostom.

When taught in the form of a command, a law is apt to remain dead words; but when a human being brings it home in the form of a tale, it is found to take root in the young receptive heart.

The first faculties which become strong in us are our senses. These, then, are the first that should be cultivated. We find that the young child wants to touch and handle everything.

When a mother looks upon the face of her new-born child, and sees there only human possibilities, I believe that such a mother is a curse; that the child may become a curse to the world.—B. Fay Mills.

Many a mother sees her own youthful shallowness, frivolity, untruthfulness, deceit, and parsimony in her daughter, for whose morality and religion she would willingly give up her own soul.—Dr. Alex. Whyte.

There is an habitual criminal class which it is almost hopeless to reform. What we have to do is to prevent the children of the habitual criminal from following in their parents' footsteps.—Rev. J. W. Horsley.

Everything combines to make the workhouse a bad place for children, especially, I say, for girls; though we must not forget that true domestic life should also be an essential in the case of boys.—Rev. J. O. Bevan, M.A.

You fathers cannot make your boy a constant companion if you drink. You cannot have him with you when you go to drink, or when you are drunk. So self-discipline is the step to have a worthy son.—Archbishop of Canterbury.

When Abraham Lincoln was ten years of age he was left motherless. But in those ten short years of his infant life she so moulded his character that in all his after days it was his delight to testify, "All I am I owe to my mother."

Among the objects of charity, conscience points to none more plainly than the suffering child. Young birds dropped from their nests are suffering children—helpless, pitiful; that man needs mercy from God who shows no mercy to them.

Be ye followers of God as dear children. Children are so imitative. Intuitively they follow the example of their parents. How carefully they watch the sayings and doings of their elders. The Apostle noticed this, and he commended the habit to parents in their relation to God.

NORTHFIELD BIBLE CONFERENCE.

"By the good hand of our God upon us," we are enabled to issue our call for another General Bible Conference, to be held at Northfield, Mass., from August 1 to 13, 1893. The ten conferences past have been so manifestly marked by the Divine favour, and have so richly abounded in blessings to multitudes of grateful hearts, that we cannot doubt our privilege and duty to go forward another step on the same line of service.

It is to me a great joy to issue this year's call, with the prospect and expectation of being myself permitted to share the services and the blessings of the Conference with my friends. I have returned to my own dear native land, from fourteen months' labour in the Old World, with an ever-growing conviction that nothing but the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, proclaimed with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, and exemplified in the holy lives and devoted service of Christian disciples, can ever meet the needs of this lost world, and prevail against the powers of evil. And I rejoice to see that, at home and abroad, the Lord is raising up increasing numbers of consecrated workers who are not ashamed of this old Gospel, and who glory only in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.

It shall be our highest aim, at the coming Conference, as heretofore, to advance the interests of the kingdom of God, seeking a closer union of Christian hearts in faith, hope, and love, that we may have "fellowship one with another," and may "know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge," and be "filled with all the fulness of God."

Let us then come together, as fellow labourers in Christ, "all with one accord in one place," "with a true heart, in full assurance of faith," to wait upon the Lord, and to "consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works, exhorting one another, and so much the more as we see the day approaching," for "the night is far spent, the day is at hand."

Among the speakers who will be present are: Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., of Boston; Rev. A. C. Dixon, of Brooklyn; Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Albany; Merrill E. Gates, Ph.D., LL.D., President of Amherst College; Mrs. J. K. Barney, Providence; Maj. D. W. Whittle, Northfield, Mass. We also confidently expect many of the Christian workers, including several from foreign lands who are now assisting us in the Chicago "World's Fair" campaign, to be present and take part at various times. In addition we hope to have with us: Rev. B. Fay Mills, of Providence; Prof. W. W. Moore, of University of Virginia; Prof. Robert Thompson, Lake Forest University; Hon. R. Moreton, Hamilton, Ontario; Rev. John McNeill, Scotland; and others whose names will be announced later. The singing will be under the direction of Messrs. Ira D. Sankey and Geo. C. Stebbins.

Accommodations may be obtained at the Seminary buildings during the time of the meetings for one dollar and fifty cents per day. The Betsey Moody Cottage will be open, as last year, for the accommodation of any who may desire more quiet and retirement than is possible in the larger buildings; rates will be two dollars and fifty cents per day for room alone, or two dollars per day in room with another person. Parties wishing to tent can have a suitable place on the Seminary grounds free of charge, and, if desired, board may be had for seventy-five cents per day. "The Northfield," a beautiful quiet hotel, furnishes first-class board to those desiring.

All communications in regard to accommodations at Seminary Buildings, as well as at "The Northfield," should be addressed to the Manager, Mr. Ambert G. Moody, East Northfield, Mass.

Northfield is on the New London Northern Railroad, which connects with the Fitchburg Railroad at Millers Falls, the Central Massachusetts Division of the Boston and Maine Railroad at Belchertown, the Boston and Albany Railroad at Palmer, the New York and New England Railroad at Williemantic, and the steamers of the Norwich and New York Transportation Company at New London. It is about two miles from South Vernon on the Connecticut River division of the Boston and Maine Railroad, which connects with the Fitchburg Railroad at Greenfield, the Northampton division of the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad at Northampton, and the Boston and Albany, and New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroads at Springfield. Stages are run during the meetings from South Vernon to Northfield. Reduced railway rates will probably be obtained as heretofore, and definite instructions in regard to the same will be sent later.—Yours in his service,

D. L. Moody.

Women's Prayer Union for China.

We are asked to mention that Miss Elizabeth Boyd (hon. sec.) has altered her address from Dean House, Willesden Green, to 6, Birkbeck-road, Acton, W. She would gladly receive the names of Christians wishing to unite in daily prayer for the heathen women of China, and workers among them. There are probably 150,000,000 women and girls in China. How many of these know the Lord? "Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest that He will send forth labourers into his harvest."

Letters to the Editor.

INVESTMENTS.

Sir,—Your correspondent, "A Broker," says as follows: "If . . instead of leaving some hundreds of millions on deposit at their bankers (which is scarcely of any service for promoting legitimate trading)," etc. I as a banker must point out that "A Broker" displays most deplorable ignorance. For bankers' money left on deposit by clients is just what, if used with care and judgment, so often helps the languishing manufacturers and tradesmen; and I am confident that very many flourishing business men could testify that if it had not been for the timely help of the banker they would never have been able to make their business successful.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, A Banker.

THE NAMES OF THE PATRIARCHS.

1 CHRONICLES I. 1-4.

Adam . . .	Man.
Sheth . . .	Being set, or constituted, or having become.
Enosh . . .	Wretched.
Kenan . . .	Mourner.
Mahalaleel .	The Light of God, or the Blessed God.
Jared . . .	Came down.
Henoch . .	Consecrated.
Methuselah .	(by) his death to send.
Lamech . .	to the poor, or oppressed.
Noah . . .	Comfort.

Such are the meanings of the Hebrew words here used, and they show that when God named the Patriarchs, He had reference to redemption through the precious blood of his own dear Son; for read as follows they express that blessed truth:—Man having become (a) wretched mourner, the blessed God came down, consecrated (by) his death, to send to the oppressed comfort.

The late Henry Craik, Bristol.

POST CARDS.

WITH THE VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. A. Draper, has had a busy seven days at Douglas, Isle of Man, among the 3rd Battalion Liverpool Volunteers, while they were at camp, and God used him as a means of blessing. Every tent and every individual was dealt with, and sound Gospel literature was distributed. One soul at least is believed to be truly converted by the Spirit of the Lord, and several others were deeply convinced and impressed.

LIVERPOOL TOWN MISSIONARIES.

Early morning prayer meetings are at present being held by the Liverpool town missionaries in their halls all over the city. They believe much in prayer. The principal objects at this time are the needs of their own souls for the work of God; the needs of the city in its sins; the needs of all Christian workers in the city; and an earnest pleading for "Liverpool for Jesus." Prayer is being answered, and still they are looking up.

ALPERTON, SUDBURY.

The annual meeting of Miss Hore's Holiday and Convalescent Home for Young Women was held in the grounds last Saturday. Revs. F. B. Meyer, F. Jones, Mr. Lithgow, Mrs. Starey, and others took part. Miss Hore has received 134 during the past twelve months, who have greatly benefited by the rest and change. She is anxious to receive assistance to enable her to extend the benefits of her Home to such as are unable to defray their own expenses.

ON AN INDIAN RESERVATION.

We have had a severe winter and a protracted spring, the rainy season holding on still at date of writing. Death has been very busy among the Puyallup Indians this spring—ten deaths in May, or 1-60th of the whole tribe died during that month. We ask the prayers of your readers for a special blessing upon the preaching of the Gospel among these people, so many of whom are, like the trees of the forest, marked for death. Consumption takes off the young, and strong drink some of the older ones. We shall be especially grateful if your readers will remember these people in prayer, that the seed sown during the past eight months may be watered from above by the Holy Spirit being poured out upon them. J. M. Pamment.

PRAYER FOR ISRAEL.

We have been meeting in Asbury Park, N. Jersey, every Friday afternoon this past season in Philadelphia, to pray for Israel, and several converted Jews joined us. At the last meeting a young Jew rose, saying, "I love Christ! I love Christ!" and sat down in tears. He had come from New York to escape the persecution of his father. This little meeting was greatly blessed, and we hope to continue it as we travel from place to place during the summer. There are 40,000 Jews in Philadelphia, and probably more, and we do not know how many Christians, but we do know that we need to be roused from our slumbers, and that we are sadly lacking in a true missionary spirit, for the Lord has among us in that great city many wealthy children, many young children with health, to labour for souls; and will you ask prayers for our dear city and for us all? LANARKSHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

The special tent mission of this Union in Coatbridge, N.B., closed last week, when the two evangelists, Messrs. Aitken and Cambridge, ended their labours here. The results of the Mission are satisfactory. An incident may be worth relating. A little girl of thirteen years of age, who was spoken to, answered that she had given herself to Christ when Mr. McNeill was here about the new year, but she had "broken it." She readily consented to get upon her knees, and give herself again to the Lord, and before she rose the duty of working for the Lord was pressed upon her. She undertook to tell her nearest companion that she was the Lord's, and try to bring her next night. The following evening she returned, and remained for the after-meeting, with three other little girls of eight to twelve years of age, who all held up their hands as seeking salvation. They all of them got upon their knees and yielded themselves to Christ. These again brought in others, until the number was about eight. The duty of praying and reading the Word together was urged upon them. More than a week after the first little girl was met, and asked how they were getting on, and were they reading and praying together. "Oh! yes," she answered, "we all meet and read and pray together in the corner of a field opposite our house."

THE Y.M.C.A.

Arrangements are in progress for the formation of an Association at Pontypridd.

The Railroad Associations in Minnesota have lately thrown much energy into open-air work.

The best Y.M.C.A. in Syria is at Damascus, where there is a flourishing Association with over thirty active members.

The college Association at Beyrout has been discontinued, but the town Association, which is twenty-two years old, continues.

An Association is being formed at Chefoo, North China. Workers in the China Inland Mission and a number of American missionaries are interested.

The small Association at Barry, near Cardiff, has experienced recently very great blessing, resulting in the conversion, amongst others, of one or two avowed atheists.

In the early autumn Mr. George Holmes commences a visitation of the home Associations, for the purpose of stimulating the missionary sympathies of the members in behalf of their fellow young men.

An important conference on Bible class work will take place at Exeter Hall on the evening of the 18th inst. Mr. Geo. Williams will take the chair, and discussion will be opened by Mr. A. C. Furse, Camden Town.

Mr. Patrick, the missionary in Morocco who has lately suffered such severe persecution, was formerly a member of the Lincoln Association. He has just become a Y.M.C.A. correspondent, and is doing all he can to foster young men's work in Morocco.

Chesham is anxious to form a good Biblical Reference Library, suitable for the young men who visit the country districts and Sunday-school teachers. The bookcase has been obtained, and all that is needed now is books to stock it with good Bible helps.

The Y.M.C.A.'s of America decided at their last conference that no Association which departs from the Evangelical Church membership basis shall be recognised by the American International Committee or entitled to representation in American Y.M.C.A. Conferences. The resolutions embodying these proposals were carried without a dissentient voice.

At the recent Church Missionary meeting (Leicester Auxiliary), Mr. Eugene Stock, who has just returned from a tour in Australasia and India, mentioned the fact that one of their best workers in Australia is a clergyman who is the son of a churchwarden in Liverpool. He was sent out by his father, and was converted the first day he landed at the Melbourne Y.M.C.A.

A new Association has just been formed at Newbridge (Mon.) and a provisional committee appointed to secure a suitable place of meeting and organise agencies. The hon. sec. is Mr. W. D. Davies, Brynteg. The Association recently formed at Abertillery, in the same valley, is making substantial progress, and doing excellent work among the young men of the place.

On Friday afternoon the monthly meeting was held of the English National Executive of Y.M.C.A.'s. An interesting feature of the proceedings was the presentation of a report by Mr. George Holmes, missionary secretary, who has just returned from a tour amongst the principal cities and towns of Egypt and Palestine and the Mediterranean stations. At no fewer than twenty centres Mr. Holmes either planted or revived Y.M.C.A. work. Very many young men have been gathered together for Christian intercourse and effort, and the whole journey has been fraught with much success and blessing.

The half-yearly meeting of the Manchester District of Y.M.C.A.'s was lately held at Southport. The services of the secretaries, Messrs. McCann and Holmes, who had been recently appointed to visit India, the Mediterranean, Egypt, and the Holy Land, for the purpose of forming Y.M.C.A.'s and strengthening those already existing, were dwelt upon, and the duty of the English Y.M.C.A.'s to help them for the sake of the many young men who leave England for those places. The question of summer work in the Y.M.C.A.'s, opened by Mr. W. H. Newett, of Manchester, was very freely debated, many valuable hints being thrown out. Reports of Association work were received from Ashton, Bolton, Burnley, Bury, Leigh, Macclesfield, Rochdale, Southport, and Manchester. Openings for new Y.M.C.A.'s at Lytham and Heywood were mentioned, where there seems a likelihood of good work being done.

M. GIRARD, of the Public Laboratory in Paris, recommends the use of natural lemonade as an excellent beverage at all times, and remarks that, in the case of those who find the acidity of the lemon at all troublesome, such acidity can be neutralised by adding a little carbonate of soda to the liquid after the citric acid has had a few minutes' time to destroy the microbes.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

Rev. G. Strathearn has been ordained to the ministry of Slamannan Free Church.

The Jubilee of the Forgue Free Church was held last week. Professor W. G. Blaikie and others took part.

At the laying, on Thursday, of the memorial stones of a new church at Beith, Dr. Fergus Ferguson gave a thoughtful sermon on the unity of all true believers.

The Earl of Aberdeen, the new Governor-General of Canada, has placed at the disposal of the Young Colonists' Aid the sum of £1000 to enable this recently founded philanthropic association to commence operations.

Mr. John Ross Brown, Superintendent of the Greenock Young People's Open-Air Mission, has reached Dundee on his voyage round Scotland, landing at several places along the north coast of Scotland, and delivering Gospel addresses.

Rev. James Laing, M.A., minister of the Free Church of Stonehouse, died on Friday morning, after a short illness. Although he has been in an infirm state of health for a considerable time, he was able to preach up to Sunday, 25th ult. He has been a minister of the Gospel both in Scotland and England.

It is stated that Rev. W. L. Walker has resigned the pastorate of St. Mungo Unitarian Church, Glasgow. Unitarianism, he says, through failing to recognise the presence and influence of Christ, is untrue to Christian history and experience, inadequate for the spiritual life, and in its practical outcome far from satisfactory.

Mr. James Monro, C.B., spoke in Edinburgh on Friday, under the auspices of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, with special reference to the needs of the Patna Mission station, the Scottish station of the Society. Mr. Monro, in the course of his address, said that the province of Behar, in which Patna is situated, has a population of 22,000,000 or 23,000,000, and in the whole of that large district there were only thirteen males missionaries and eighteen ladies.

IRISH NOTES.

Steps are being taken to organise a Presbyterian congregation at Howth, and also at Malahide, in both of which places there are several Presbyterian families.

Dr. Harrison, Bishop of Glasgow, preached in St. Luke's Church, Belfast, on Sunday week, and held a very largely attended open-air service afterwards—a rather new thing for a bishop.

The Belfast Female Mission is doing an excellent work in visiting the poor and the sick. During the past month the Bible-women visited 1260 families, held seventy-one prayer-meetings, and relieved forty poor persons.

The honorary degree of Doctor of Letters has been conferred by the Senate of Trinity College, Dublin, on Rev. Dr. John Hall, of New York, who is at present in this country, in recognition of his services as an orator and public teacher.

The executors of the late Sir Wm. McArthur have paid to the trustees of the Methodist College, Belfast, £15,000 for the benefit of the McArthur Hall, where the daughters of Irish Methodist ministers are being educated, and £5000 additional to provide scholarships in connection with that institution.

Rev. E. Robinson, rector of St. Mark's, Dublin, has taken a praiseworthy step in advance. He has got the unsightly wall which surrounded the graveyard of his church taken down, and a neat railing erected in its place, and he has put up a pulpit outside of his church, from which Gospel addresses are delivered in the open air every Sunday evening to large audiences.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

A Y.P.S.C.E. has been formed at Dorchester, with Rev. J. McClune Uffen as President.

Another has been formed in connection with Hereford Friends' Meeting-house, and open-air services for the benefit of non-churchgoers have been commenced.

A branch of the Y.P.S.C.E. has been formed in connection with the E.M. Church, Linlithgow; its members are increasing weekly, and God is using it as a special means of blessing to the church and community.

At the second annual public meeting of Moorgreen Y.P.S.C.E. the secretary gave a brief report of the state of the society. Mr. Dickson delivered a very earnest address on the subject for the week, which we feel sure will result in spiritual profit.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY NOTES.

About sixty missionaries, mostly new workers, are leaving the States for various mission fields in the autumn. Some twenty of these are going to China.

A new mission is to be opened in Hupeh Province, with a view of reaching Hunan eventually; the writer, and Pastor W. F. Gray, of Indianola, have been asked to begin the mission. They will be reinforced by new men, as suitable spheres of service are opened.

I have just returned from the annual meetings at Denver, Col., U.S.A. The centenary committee of the American Baptist Missionary Union report the sum of 1,010,341dols. as the special offering of the Baptist churches of the Northern States. Strong resolutions as to the Chinese Exclusion Bill were adopted by the delegates.

The anti-opium agitation is attracting much attention in the States, and has the very prayerful sympathy of many American Christians. The Wesleyan Conference of Ontario, Canada, recently passed a resolution condemnatory of the traffic, and praying Her Majesty's Government to abolish it. Other religious bodies are preparing to take concerted action.

Young Workwomen.

Joyous and free as the birds for the time being were those poor working girls who last summer escaped from their dingy cages of workroom and factory, to breathe for a while the pure air, and revel in the bright sunshine of our southern shore. Daily drudgery and monotonous toil, the pinch of poverty with its attendant hardships, all these were forgotten by the happy girls as they sat chatting by the sparkling sea-waves, or gathered for a merry picnic in the green woods. The beauty of earth and sky filled their hearts with gladness—it was enough to be alive and to draw in health and vigour with every breath. And their joy was deepened by the remembrance that their happy holiday was a token of sympathy and brotherly love from the more favourably circumstanced—a proof that the wealthy West End was glad to bestow a little of its abundance upon the needy East.

Our working girls are longing for such refreshment just now, at the close of a long and an exceptionally warm season, spent by them in crowded workrooms or amidst the monotonous toil of factories, and we earnestly ask all friends of our work to give these tired girls a fortnight's rest and the refreshment of pure country air. In the majority of cases their slender earnings are quite inadequate to the expense of even a brief summer holiday. Aid will be gratefully received by the hon. sec., Miss F. M. Fraser, 30, Onslow-gardens, S.W.

The Spezia Mission.

The work which has gathered round Mr. Clarke in connection with the Spezia Mission continues to grow and increase in interest and usefulness. Considerably over 600 children throng the schools of the Mission—a number unparalleled in the history of Protestant work in Italy.

Opposition still exists, and persecution has to be faced, but interest is being widely aroused and doors of usefulness are opening. It is evident that Bible principles are awakening attention on the part of persons in authority in Italy. What is needed is that the opportunities which exist and which are so strikingly manifest should not be allowed to slip from the grasp of those who know the priceless value of Bible truths. At present the Mission possesses no building at all equal to a gathering of all the children in one place. The largest building was filled with children on the recent occasion of the visit of Mr. Edwards, the representative of the Sunday School Union, but, even then, little more than half the number of scholars could be accommodated at the meeting.

Last Sunday, five persons, three of them teachers, were baptized at the principal meeting place. God is more and more giving evidence of the solidity of the work; and the determined opposition of the enemies of the truth show that much is being accomplished. Help is needed that this great work may be in no way hampered or crippled.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Mr. Eugene Stock, Editorial Secretary of the Church Missionary Society.

We are sure our readers will unite heartily in thanksgiving for the release of our brethren Professors Thoumaian and Kayayan, while they will continue in earnest prayer for the others who are still in bondage in Armenia.

The continuation of Sir S. A. Blackwood's papers on the Apocalypse will be variously regarded by different readers. But even to those who do not see with him as to Apocalyptic interpretation, they have a high value as showing the course of history during the Christian era. And this, at the present crisis, is of extreme importance. Whether it be seen that the Apocalypse foreshadowed these events, or not, the events have happened, and it is no small advantage that a bird's-eye view of them should thus be given.

But if the Apocalypse means anything, it must mean more than any one system of interpretation can provide for. Many of our readers are content with the view of the Futurists, though there is certainly not less variety in their translation of the symbols than in that of the Historical interpreters. But we ask them to consider that the crisis for which they look could not arrive except as the climax of a previous history. And we ask the Historicists to admit that the course of this evil age must issue in a crisis. There must, therefore, be a very substantial agreement between the two; each is necessary to the other. Then as to the interpretation of the symbols—however varied this may be—there is almost without exception agreement as to what are evil and what are good. Let us try to learn from one another; and as we thus experience our mutual indebtedness, the Spirit of love, who is also the Spirit of a sound mind, will lead us into all the truth as we are able to bear it.

There is always at this season a great scattering of Christian workers, members of all our religious communities, in quest of change and relaxation, spreading themselves in all directions. Much spiritual good ought to and might result from this. If all are bent on doing something for Christ wherever they go, opportunities will spring up in every path, and, without any lessening of enjoyment, or loss of the restfulness sought, good will be done. Too often at such seasons Christian responsibility is laid aside, and the holiday trip becomes a means of spiritual declension, so that the soul is weakened in its hold on God, and the servant unfitted for the service of the King through getting out of communion with Him. We need to breathe the spiritual air which invigorates the soul within, as well as that which braces the body without. May God's loving, sanctifying, and cheering presence be realised by our readers in every scene.

Canon Fremantle's statement at the Reunion Conference at Lucerne, in reference to interchange of pulpits between Churchmen and Nonconformists, is important, as showing that the way is much more open for the practice than is commonly supposed. He stated that the best legal opinion he had been able to get went to prove that a clergyman could not be prosecuted for preaching in a dissenting place of worship in his own parish, and that he might lecture in any Nonconformist building, and accompany the lecture by hymn and prayer. The same holds good as regards a lecture in the Anglican Church by one not holding orders. The Canon might well ask, "Why, then, did not clergy and ministers avail themselves frequently of these facilities?" Undoubtedly such interchanges would have a powerful influence in checking the advance of Sacerdotalism and Ritualistic tendencies generally, as also of softening many of the asperities which prevail.

Those who still sit in judgment on the Church of Christ, and they are many, do not appear to know, or remember, that outside the Church much good work is being done which has its origin and fountain inside the Church. The work of temperance reform would have a terribly diminished number of supporters if its Christian friends were withdrawn; indeed, we do not know who else but Christians make the least effort to save our British children from drunkenness. The philanthropic agencies of the country are almost exclusively in the hands of avowed Christians, yet the Church gets no credit for them. If any of them are unwisely conducted, or wickedly abused, then, of course, the Church must bear the blame.

We believe it is a fact that offices of trust in benefit and trade societies are very generally filled by Christians. As long as all goes well we hear nothing of them, but if one of them violates his trust we are at once reminded of "the canting hypocrites." Two or three working-men, converted at a Gospel temperance mission, were allowed to form a benefit club in one of the class rooms of a Sunday-school, so as to keep men from the public-house; but that church gets no credit for its wise and liberal action which has been copied by every church in the neighbourhood; neither does Christianity get any credit for the fact that in that district hundreds of working-men can be members of a benefit club without facing the perils of drink.

While we are deploring the destructive influence of great cities, may we not also find a hopeful influence at work tending ultimately to greater purity of motive and simplicity of life? Mere neighbourliness has often, in country districts, been the reason for kindly service, and it is good as far as it goes; but in crowded populations, where men are strangers to one another, the motive for service will become more distinctively Christian love. The fellowship in the Church, if it is to have any reality and power, will also have to rest upon a purely Christian foundation. When the secondary aids fail, we must fall back altogether on the primary support of the Gospel.

The condition of Sunday evening congregations is a matter for grave anxiety on the part of many ministers and churches. Without attempting any analysis of the causes which have co-operated almost to empty some places of worship—and doubtless the causes vary with the district—there is one view of the present state of affairs on which we would lay great emphasis. Formerly the morning congregation was supposed to be largely composed of believers, to whom the minister accordingly adapted his teaching; while in the evening he addressed himself principally to the unconverted. But then, by their diligent attendance in the evening as well as in the morning, believers encouraged the unconverted to hear the Gospel and the pastor to plead with them. It was the reaping time; prayer meetings were held, and "inquirers" looked after by friends and Sunday-school teachers for the purpose of leading them into the knowledge of Christ. Sunday evening was a solemn yet joyful time. The pastor looked forward to it as does the farmer to harvest.

Now how changed in many places is all this! A small congregation almost breaks the pastor's heart; there are no crowds of unsaved souls to draw forth all his tenderness and all his power; a noisy organ "voluntary" drives away any serious thought; and the handful of people go homeward dull and heavy. The membership of such places remains stationary or positively declines. For the sake of excitement novelties are tried, which only more demoralise the place. Would it not be better to revert to the former ways? Ought not Christians to reinstitute the neglected evangelistic Sunday evening service? Would it not do them good to be in their places a second time each Sunday, and to come earnestly solicitous for the salvation of souls? Unless, indeed, they are themselves engaged in definite Gospel work elsewhere.

The example of some Y.M.C.A.'s in the matter of establishing missionary libraries is well worthy of wide imitation. Our missionary literature has been greatly enriched of late, and should be brought within the reach of all our young workers of both sexes. It is impossible to read such Lives as those of James Gilmour of Mongolia, Mackay of Uganda, John G. Paton of the New Hebrides, and many others, to say nothing of volumes dealing with other than personal aspects of Mission work, without being aroused to a sense of responsibility and of emulation in reference to the needs and claims of the world. Our Y.M. and Y.W.C.A.'s ought to furnish large contingents yet to the forces already in the field.

A recently-published volume, entitled "Life with Trans-Siberian Savages," by B. Douglas Howard, M.A., gives information of a race of people hitherto almost unknown to civilisation. They inhabit the island of Saghalien, to the north of Japan, and are called Ainus. Rev. J. Batchelor's well-known book, "The Ainus of Japan," gives us more than a glimpse of another section of this interesting people; and the communication from him on p. 19 of this issue, will be read with interest. The Ainus are devoted to their idols, and distinguished for their race pride, which leads them to despise all other peoples, and to refuse any alliance with them. Their women are not counted in numbering their population, nor are they allowed to offer any oblation or worship to their gods; their life being one of great hardship and oppression. This strange community is under the government of Russia, Saghalien being used by the Russians as a prison for their most abandoned convicts. Many dark corners of the earth are yet waiting for celestial light. These Ainus, we are told, have never yet heard the name of Christ.

We recently published a series of articles by Miss Ida Wells, late editor of the Memphis Free Speech, Tennessee, describing the lynch law horrors of the Southern States. The following paragraph from the Chicago Inter-Ocean of July 2nd, is a painful epilogue to the exposure we made:

Memphis, Tenn., July 1.—James L. Fleming, coloured, formerly manager and editor of The Free Speech and Headlight, the incendiary sheet that suspended publication about a year ago, because of the indignation aroused by an editorial in it reflecting upon Southern white women, lost one of his ears Thursday at Marion Ark. When Fleming was called to account for the article, he claimed that Ida Wells, who is now travelling in Great Britain, wrote it. His statement was accepted as true, but he elected to leave town, and so did his female associate. Fleming was the ringleader of a negro uprising in Crittenden county, Arkansas, several years ago, and was driven out of the country and warned not to return. He returned day before yesterday, and was set upon by the citizens and severely beaten, one of the crowd slicing off one of his ears with a knife. The negro escaped to the woods, but was not pursued, the Marionites being satisfied that he would not return.

The Inter-Ocean reports this barbarous occurrence in a way which only too plainly indicates a spirit of justification. That such a paper should condone savage villanies, is only too clear evidence of the need that exists among white Americans for a wholesome Christian sentiment as to their duty to the coloured population:

Groton and Columbia, two towns in North Dakota, with a small population, had each a Congregational and a Presbyterian church. This was seen to be one too many, and the wise decision was made to have only what was necessary. In Groton, the Congregationalists joined the Presbyterian church, and in Columbia the Presbyterians joined the Congregational church. The gain was manifold, chiefly in Christian influence. Shall we see similar exchanges in England? Shall we even see every denomination acting with uniform loyalty on the principle of not going where there are enough to do the work of the place, and are doing it? Our common faith ought to be more to us than our denomination.

NO GLORY OF THE ETERNAL ONE is higher than this "Mighty to Save"; no name of Godhead more adorable than that of "Saviour"; no place among the servants of God can be so glorious as that of an instrument of salvation. "He that winneth souls is wise." "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."—William Arthur.

The Woman that John Saw.

What is Rome? Is she a mere human institution? If not, whence her origin? Who directs, or direct, her action? Whose are the brains that form her plans, that carry out her purposes, that control her countless emissaries, and that hold together, like so many brigades of one mighty army, the peoples of a hundred nationalities, in various parts of the earth? It has been the fashion of many Protestants to despise her, as being but a system of superstition that must necessarily yield to the spread of education, and die away, more or less slowly, with the rolling years. Rome is not to be despised. Though, during the present century, copies of God's Word have been circulated in thousands, through the length and breadth of the earth; though science, in its many branches, has been developed with most startling force against her hold on the masses, Rome is the second greatest power in the world to-day. She is stronger than Germany, with all its battalions. Republican France obeys her behests. The Czar of Russia would not dare to quarrel with her. She manipulates "The United States of America," so as to make herself all dominant in their councils; while, as to Great Britain, including our own dear England, Presbyterian Scotland, and Nonconforming Wales, it is a humbling, galling fact, but a fact, nevertheless, that, at this present hour, when Rome makes known her will, we are not strong enough to resist it. Only the one Church of which the Lord Jesus is the Head, and all true believers in Him are the members, is stronger than she. And were it not for the Divine part of that Church, it would be as hopelessly crushed, as a whole, in less than a single year, as it was once destroyed in detail when Rome determined to sweep it from France, Spain, and Bohemia.

Nay, though the Pope possessed the mental power of a thousand of the acutest intellects of earth, all concentrated in his single brain; though his tools, the Jesuits, were a hundred times more numerous, and every one of them a hundred times more subtle than a Jesuit is generally supposed to be, no Pope could manage Rome's affairs as they are managed now, nor any combination of mortal men, however numerous, crafty, and strong, could account for her present position and power among the nations of the world. It is no secret that Italy writhes beneath her yoke. It is well known that France hates her. Austria is desperately struggling to break from her chains, while the popular parties in both Belgium and Spain are directly opposed to the priests. But it is all to no purpose.

Individuals, like Père Hyacinthe in France; parties, like "the Old Catholics" in Germany, ever and anon rise up with the expectation of weakening her power. Like Leviathan in the Book of Job, she but laughs her assailants to scorn, and regards their darts as stubble.

We must look beyond earth to understand the mystery of "the woman" who, as seen in prophetic vision, so excited the wonder of John in Patmos. There is more than the earthly in her, to any thoughtful mind, whether she be considered in her prolonged existence, in the vast extent of her power, in her consummate cunning, or in the terror she inspires among the rulers of earth. A few years ago and there was no uncertainty in either the minds or the language of Protestants when asked to give her origin and their verdict on her constitution. They simply turned to history; and there, formed wholly from its truthful details, stood before them a "woman arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations, and filthiness of her fornication; and upon her forehead was a name written—'Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and abominations of the earth—a woman drunken with the blood of the Saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus.'"

They regarded Rome as the masterpiece of Satan's constructive power, nor were afraid to say so. Such was she to our Reformers—not only to the Evangelical among them who knew she was thirsting for their blood, but to High Churchmen too. So all the Puritans regarded her. So she appeared to the early Methodists; and, in this character, all spiritual Nonconformists viewed her.

Opinions have changed with the times; and as most of the descendants of the men she imprisoned, racked, and burnt, no longer go to history to determine what and whence she is, but base their judgment on the seen part of the lives of a few of her ecclesiastical representatives, together with a few of their public utterances, the Rome of to-day is a part, yes, the most ancient, part of the Church of Christ!!! As such, the greater part of the bishops and clergy of "the Church of England" regard her—as such, the greater part of our English Nonconformists seem disposed to treat her.

But bring her to the Word of God, and where is she? Could any intellectual Romanist who might take up a Bible for the first time in his life be made to believe in her oneness with the Church of the New Testament? Would he find any approach to likeness in the government, in the ceremonies, in the doctrines, and in the claims of the one to those of the other? The secret of changed opinion is to be found in a neglected or a mutilated Bible. Two ecclesiastics were recently talking about the "Lux Mundi" controversy, when one of them remarked that as long as the authority of the Bible was maintained, the authority of "The Church" would not be recognised; therefore, the former would have to be weakened in the minds of the people. We are getting to know, at last, why Ritualists have taken it into their heads to rub shoulders with Rationalists in so-called "higher criticism." The Word of God condemns all their pretensions, and so they will have none of it themselves, or allow others, if they can prevent them.

But the question now before us is this. If the Word of God is to determine whence and what Rome is, what is its verdict? Let the Book speak, and let us receive its teaching; we shall feel then that our loved Britain is not fighting for her freedom with a mere earthly power, but that she has further arrayed against her those rulers of world-darkness, who can only be conquered by God Himself. We shall only be acting under command if we stand fast and quit us like men; but, in this case, "except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." Our faith and hope at this crisis of our national history must be in God alone, and whatever our sect or party, our earnest prayer must be that of the second verse of our national anthem—

Oh Lord, our God, arise,
Scatter our enemies,
And make them fall:
Confound their politics,
Frustrate their popish tricks;
On Thee our hopes we fix:
God save us all.

Missionary Qualification.

The Word was God. The Word became flesh and dwelt among us; was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh; was made to be sin for us, a curse for us; cried, "I am a worm and no man, a reproach of men, and despised of the people"; became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him and given Him the Name which is above every name.

Whether in the beginning with God; in the bosom of the Father whom He revealed on earth; hanging on the tree of shame; or received up in glory—Jesus was immeasurably more the superior of the most cultured product of Christian civilisation than such product is the superior of the uncivilised or dark-skinned races of the earth.

Yet Jesus, who emptied Himself of his glory; who, though He was rich, for our sakes became poor; who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister—said, when He washed his disciples' feet, "If I, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet." This lowliness of heart is an essential qualification of the servant of Jesus Christ. If he causes the naked savage, or the self-satisfied Mohammedan, or the slum-dweller at home, to feel that he regards himself as a superior being, instead of a man and a brother, he will not be an able minister of the New Covenant to him. Unless he loves his brother well enough to wash his feet, he will not reveal to him the Lord and Master, who was not ashamed to call us brethren.

For when the Son of God hid not his face from shame and spitting, when He was mocked and scourged and crowned with thorns and crucified, He was in his lowly endurance revealing God. It was God-manifested-in-flesh, who died on Calvary. It was the Word, in whom God spoke out Himself; it was the Son, who is the brightness of God's glory and the express image of his person: who through the Eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God. The three Persons of the Triune God here revealed the lowliness of God, whose meekness multiplies us, whose gentleness makes us great.

The superiority of good over evil, the contrast between God and Satan, is not revealed so much in His knowledge and power as in His love and humility. Satan has knowledge and power (though in kind as well as in degree these are unlike the knowledge and power of God). But he is absolutely destitute of love and lowliness.

Servants of Christ, at home or abroad, may have knowledge and power and other valuable qualifications, but if we have not love we are nothing. But if we have love we shall be meek and lowly in heart, like our Lord and Master, who, knowing that his hour was come that He should depart out of this world unto the Father, knowing also that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that He had come from God, and was going to God, took a towel and girded Himself, and washed the feet of those whom, having loved, He loved unto the end.

No learning, no ability, no courage, no zeal, can counterbalance the fatal want of love and lowliness. These seven graces of the Spirit—faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness—will be like the proverbial disunited sticks, unless bound together by love, which is the bond of perfectness.

With the lowly love of Christ in his heart, wherever the Lord's servant goes, in slums at home or savage haunts abroad, He will be as a dew from heaven, He will be a power for good, He will be a wise winner of souls. But though He speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not love, the root of lowliness, which gives Him such victory over self and the devil that he can wash the feet of the native convert or the negro brother, He is sounding brass, a tinkling cymbal. "And now abideth faith, hope, love; but the greatest of these is love." M.

NEW HEBRIDES MISSIONARIES.

BY DR. JOHN G. PATON.

I am exceedingly sorry to hear that in a Blue Book lately published in Britain, under sanction of the Colonial Secretary, there is an attack upon our devoted, self-sacrificing missionaries in the South Sea Islands, for "selling rum, beer, and firearms," and for being so much "away from their stations" on holiday pleasure-seeking, while the Romanist fathers are praised. In reply, I say:—

There is not a shadow of foundation in truth for such charges. The father of lies could not have invented anything more false. Not a missionary in the New Hebrides has ever been engaged in trade of any kind on the islands, or in any mercantile pursuit whatever. Each missionary by solemn engagement is bound to spend his whole time and energies in the spiritual work of the mission, acquiring and reducing to a written form the unwritten languages of the islanders among whom he is placed, translating the Holy Scriptures and other books, organising schools, and teaching the natives to read and write, etc.; and preaching the blessed Gospel to them in their own language, all arduous but much-needed work in advancing their Christian knowledge and civilisation, in leading them to love and serve Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour.

Every one of our missionaries is a total abstainer from all intoxicating drinks, and does all he can, by example and moral suasion, to lead every islander and all others to abstain from such drinks and from all evil. Instead of our missionaries to the islanders, they, and the churches supporting them, sent me to America pleading with its excellent President, Congress, and Christian people, if possible, to get America to unite in the British prohibition of intoxicants, opium, and firearms as trade—by traders—with our islanders, on account of their demoralising, ruining influence. The other nations interested, on high moral grounds, have said they will agree with Britain in this prohibition if America agrees to it. But as America has hitherto refused to agree to it, these curses of humanity—used by all traders there except the British—are causing much misery and loss of life among the remaining cannibals, who should never have firearms, particularly when maddened with rum and brandy. The whole responsibility of all these evils and murders by intoxicants, for some years now, has appeared to rest on Christian America. But her good President, and those under him, are now reconsidering the whole question, and we hope God will lead him and them ere long to enter this clamant prohibition, and lead all the Powers interested, for humanity's sake, to agree, and so save our dear islanders from extermination through the greed of gain at any cost of godless traders.

As to the second count, that our missionaries are much away from their stations on holiday-pleasure seeking, this is equally false. From the unhealthy debilitating nature of the tropical damp climate of the New Hebrides, and the ague and fever to which we and our children are all there exposed, every missionary is allowed three months' leave of absence once every five years, and twelve months' at the end of every ten years he is on the islands. Not, however, for pleasure seeking, but to work under the Mission Committee of the Church supporting him. As they arrange, he conducts meetings, pleading the cause of the mission in their congregations and Sabbath schools, and raising money for the maintenance and extension of the work. Not pleasure-seeking, but a change of work, climate, and society, in continuous work for the mission, till his furlough expires and he returns to the islands. Some of our missionaries, for fear of losing time from their work on the islands, used not to avail themselves of their well-merited furlough—I for one—but our societies found that the change was essential, to save the missionary losing far more time by rheumatic or other fevers, and they now insist on every missionary leaving the islands when his periods of furlough come round. We have now eighteen missionaries and their families in our mission, and almost yearly during the wet unhealthy season some one is likely to be absent on his legal furlough, but not one is ever absent on holiday pleasure-seeking.

With regard to the

on our islands, whom the agent praises in the Blue Book, it is an historical fact that Frenchmen and their Romish priests did not try to come and settle on our New Hebrides Islands while their lives and property were in danger. With covetous eyes they looked on at a safe distance, and left the British Presbyterian Missionaries to struggle on doing the pioneering, difficult, dangerous work, in which six of our number lost their lives, and a number of our first converts and native teachers were murdered by the savages. But when, by continued perseverance in God's work, life and property became safe on twenty islands, and comparatively safe on the whole group, and God had given us about fifteen thousand converts, the French followed, though they, backed by the frequent visits of man-of-war vessels, have gained no footing on the islands, but are hated by the natives.

They are supplied with rations and wine from New Caledonia, and by every pretence lay claim to the lands of the natives. But they do no spiritual work except if they hear of a savage dying, whom they have never seen before. They get a thick black cotton rope tied round their neck and person, to which is fastened a large black cross, and a coloured lad, probably from New Caledonia, walks before them, also carrying a large black cross, to the house of the dying person, when, if possible, they administer extreme unction to him, and such are reported as their converts! As a white neighbour of theirs expressed it to me, "Their converts are all in their graves." The natives earnestly plead for British annexation, and protection from the cruel treatment they receive on all sides by

TRADERS AND OPPRESSORS.

We missionaries also grieve over their many wrongs. What, except love to God and a burning desire to save the perishing heathen, could induce our educated missionaries and their wives to live and labour away in the New Hebrides? Our great joy is to see God use us there, in translating the Scriptures into sixteen new languages, and in teaching the savages to read and understand them, and thus by the Holy Spirit's teaching see individual after individual, family after family, tribe after tribe, and island after island, renounce heathenism, and live in the service of our dear Lord Jesus Christ; while some seventy thousand more are led so to plead for Christian teaching, as to make it clear that our whole field is white to the Lord's harvest. Evidently the Blue-book favours the old persecuting faith, with a mind closed to all good done by Protestant missions, and was inspired by Rome, believing any delusion coming from the "Fathers." But I hope the honour of Britain, and the zeal and faithfulness of our British Protestants, will not allow such false accusations to remain uncondemned. I defy the writer to produce one reliable witness to prove his statements to be correct, whereas from the best sources I could produce hundreds, yea thousands, to prove them utterly false. Should any man, so destitute of honour, justice, and truthfulness, inspired by Rome, be allowed to utter such lies under sanction of a Colonial Secretary?

A MISSIONARY CONGRESS has just been held at Saratoga, under the auspices of the Presbyterian Synod of New York. It proved a success. The addresses were inspiring, and the whole tone was such as to indicate great advance in every department of work. It was stated that of the 22,447,392 children of school age in the United States, less than 2,200,000 are gathered in the Sunday-schools of all denominations, including the Roman Catholics. Dr. A. F. Schauffler presented the needs of the Jews, and expressed his hope that the Presbyterian Church would prosecute mission work among them. Treasurer Dulles called attention to the error that still holds sway that the cost of missions is disproportionate to the results. Instead of its being true that it costs a dollar to send a dollar, it really costs only the price of a foreign postage stamp—i.e., five cents.

The Key-Notes of Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

LOVE: ON GOD'S SIDE.

One of the greatest words of Scripture tells us that man was made in the image of God. From that phrase, throbbing with hope, we gather that our moral and spiritual nature was planned on the same model as God's; and that, in our original constitution, there was an identity in quality, though not in quantity, between us and our Creator.

This thought lies at the basis of all our reasonings about God. If truth, and holiness, and mercy mean one thing when referred to Him, and another when applied to us, we know nothing of Him amid the blaze of revelation and the clear teachings of our Lord. Of course, there must always be the limitations of the finite, the shadows of mortality falling thick and dense, the wilting effect of sin; but nevertheless there is so great a similarity between God and us, that we can reason from what we know of ourselves to the nature of Him who is eternal, immortal, and invisible.

This is specially true of love. We use the term of the mysterious affinity between parent and child, friend and friend, husband and wife. It is the strongest factor in our nature, which bridges distance, defies time, triumphs over impassable barriers, and irradiates with golden light prosaic circumstances and ordinary people. We cannot explain it. We only know that when this passion takes possession, it eliminates self, and makes another's interests the pivot of thought and effort and life. Then, turning from ourselves to God, we cry, It is thus that God feels towards man. "God loved the world." "He loved me."

Eph. i. 6. God's love flows to us through the channel of the Beloved. We must not think that the Father loves us because our Saviour interposed between his wrath and us, and made Him love us. To think this is heresy indeed. We cannot separate between the Father and the Son, for God is one. As is the Son, so is the Father. It was the one purpose of Jesus to dissipate these untrue and terrible conceptions of the Father, and to make man see that his own life and love were a true reflection of the depths of his Father's heart.

The love of God was not caused by the death of Jesus, but caused it. God did not love us because Jesus died, but Jesus died because God loved us so much as to give Him up to the death for us all. God loved us from eternity, but before his love could have its blessed way with us, it was needful for Him to satisfy the claims of a broken law, to vindicate his righteousness, to be just; and therefore He gave Himself to us in Jesus, who manifested God in the flesh, put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself, and entered into the Holiest of all to become a merciful and faithful High Priest.

Though God's love was not caused by the Beloved, it comes to us in Him. The ocean fulness pours itself through the channel of the man Christ Jesus. It has therefore all the abundance and wealth of the Divine, and all the adaptation and tenderness of the Human. The Only Begotten and Beloved Son is the reservoir in which the great love of God is stored. In proportion therefore as we abide in Him, we shall realise its blessed fulness.

Eph. ii. 5. God's love was not daunted by our sin. In the day that we were born, we were cast out in the open field, dead in trespasses and sins, and to the abhorring of our person. But He loved us even then. His great love was not diverted by the spectacle of our loathsomeness. He knew what we were, and what we should be, and how much pain and sorrow we should cost Him, but He loved us still. He foresaw our failures and backslidings, and lapses into the darkness of shadow, but none of these things availed to quench his love. So rich was He in mercy that He could afford to be prodigal of his wealth.

It is a great comfort to know that God loved us when there was nothing to attract his love, because He will not be surprised by anything He discovers in us, and He will not turn from us at those manifestations of evil which sometimes make us lose heart. He knew the worst from the first. He did not love us because we were fair, but to make us so. We cannot understand it, but since He began He will not fail nor be discouraged until He has finished his work.

iii. 19. God's love in Christ passes knowledge. —We may *ap*prehend it, but never *com*prehend it. We may enjoy it without realising its infinite extent, as a child may shelter in a cave from the incoming tide without being able to compute the dizzy cliffs that rise sheer above it towards heaven. A single gentian sent us by a friend gives some idea of the glory of the Alpine flowers, but how little can we imagine the effect of the myriads that make blue patches on the mountain slopes! Every time we manifest love to others we learn a little more of the love of Christ, but though we give eternity to our inquiries, his love will always pass our knowledge. The arrows will ever be beyond us. There will always be as much horizon before as behind us. And when we have been gazing on the face of Jesus for millenniums its beauty will be as fresh and fascinating and fathomless as when we first see it from the gate of Paradise.

Its Breadth.—It is broad as the race of man. It is like the fabled tent which, when opened in a courtyard, filled it, but when unfurled in the tented field, covered an army. It claims all souls.

Its Length.—It is timeless and changeless. It never began, it shall never stop. It cannot be tired out by our exactions or demands upon its patience.

Its Height.—Stand by the cradle, or lower yet, at the cross, and you behold it, like Jacob's ladder, reaching to the throne of God. A spiral staircase by which the guiltiest may climb from the dark dungeon into the palace.

Its Depth.—There is no sin so profound, no despondency so low, no misery so abject, but the love of Christ is deeper. Its everlasting arms are always underneath. "If I make my bed in Hades, behold Thou art there."

As we consider these things, we can almost hear the voice of God speaking to us as to Abraham, "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward and southward, and eastward and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it, for unto thee will I give it." When we separate ourselves from our Lots, this land is ours. It is an undiscovered continent on which we are settled, but every year we may push our fences outward to enclose more of its infinite extent.

Eph. v. 2. God's love was expressed in a supreme sacrifice. Wherever there is true love, there must be giving, and giving to the point of sacrifice. Love is not satisfied with giving trinkets, it must give at the cost of sacrifice: it must give blood, life, all. And it was so with the love of God. "He so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son." "Christ also loved and gave Himself up, an offering and a sacrifice to God."

And this was very grateful to the Father. It was as the odour of a sweet smell, reminding us of the sweet savour offerings of the ancient Levitical code (Lev. iii. 5, &c.). To us the anguish of the cross seems one awful scene of horror, but it pleased the Lord to bruise Him. In love, so measureless, so reckless of cost, for those who were naturally so unworthy of it, there was a spectacle which filled heaven with fragrance and God's heart with joy.

Eph. v. 25. God's love is as the love of the bridegroom to the bride. In Eden man needed one to answer to him (Gen. ii. 18, R.V.). There was none such among the animal creation, and his nature yearned for reciprocity of love. Then God made woman. Either sex without the other is incomplete. Together the twain are one. This is a great mystery, for our Maker is our husband, the Lord of hosts is his name. God needs us, as we need Him. The Son of God yearns for the redeemed who shall answer to Him, and give Him love for his love. St. Augustine said that God made us for Himself, and that we could never rest till we found rest in Him. We may reverently add that Christ Himself cannot rest satisfied until He has cleansed and sanctified the Church, and presented it to Himself in a union which eternity shall only strengthen. Ah, marvel of marvels, He wants my love! He seeks it of me, and offers his love in exchange! He rests in his love, and rejoices over me with singing, as the bridegroom rejoices over his bride! Such love is too wonderful for me!

Eph. vi. 23. God's love passes into human hearts. "Love with faith from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." The two are one. The stream issues from the common throne of God and of the Lamb; thence it flows downward to redeemed hearts, and through them to a dying world.

Love and faith are inseparable. We trust before we love. We love and find it easy to trust. Faith is the open channel down which God's love passes into our nature; and love in its passage hollows out the channel down which it came. Like burnished mirrors that face each other, they flash the sunbeams to and fro. And thus as we live near God we are filled with love, not ours, but his—his love reflected back on Himself—his love flung forward to men.

THE BIBLE IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The South African Auxiliary Bible Society, in connection with the British and Foreign Bible Society, is in its forty-seventh year. The last report says:—"Perhaps at no distant date we may have to add to the name of the Auxiliary that of the 'Central African Bible Society.' And when the telegraph unites the North and the South, and the railway runs into the very heart of this great continent, we hope this Auxiliary will have its line of depôts and agencies as far as the extended railway, and perhaps farther. Not only is the field of operations extending, but the circulation of the Word of Life has also remarkably increased during the last few years, and the last year more particularly."

The returns for 1892 show that 35,983 copies were sold by the Auxiliary through its 130 branches, agencies, and colporteurs. The last-named distributors of the book are a worthy set of men, and their visits are greatly prized by some of the settlers and others. That Bibles are desired by the people is clear from the fact that in some districts where there was little or no money sheep were offered in exchange! On account of the difficulties of transport these had to be declined, but in such cases copies of the Scriptures were freely given and gratefully received. It is through great difficulties that the colporteurs have toiled, encountering many risks and enduring varied hardships.

A journey of a thousand miles by waggon was undertaken by Mr. F. Turner, who says:—

"The Dutch farmers are very fond of their Bibles, and have family prayers morning and evening. I remember one place I called at, the old 'vrouw' (wife) pulled down an old Bible, all in pieces and quite worn out, and with tears trickling down her cheeks, said she had 'niet geldt' (no money), and the print was too small and that she could not read it any more; so I gave her a Bible with large print, for which she was very grateful. They are also very hospitable; one is always welcome to take his meals with them, and they would never think of charging you anything, except for forage, which is very dear. On one occasion, at a very small place, where there were only two rooms, a bedroom and a sitting room (although a family of nine), they insisted on my sleeping in the only bedroom, and they all cleared out of the house and slept in the 'veld' (field). The greatest difficulty I had was getting forage for the horses, on account of the locusts, which had destroyed nearly everything.

"I left Johannesburg and started for Pretoria with a heavy load of books, about 800lb. I called at the different farms on the way, where I was well received. Before I reached Pretoria, I was overtaken with a terrific thunderstorm, which soiled a great number of books. The rivers I had to cross were all swollen by the rain, and so I had considerable trouble in getting across, and only managed to do so by leading the horses, and myself walking up to my waist in the river. The storm increased, the 'veld' was one great swamp, so I was obliged to outspan. Having no food for myself or forage for the horses, I tied the horses to the cart; but the noise of the thunder was so terrific that it caused the horses to break their halters and bolt, and you may imagine I was in a dreadful plight. For four hours in that dark night I sought those horses in the swamp, drenched to the skin, with no other light than a flash of lightning, which lit up the country now and again. I was obliged to return to the cart, and feeling the intense loneliness of my situation, I turned my thoughts to the ever-present God, and prayed most earnestly for the return of my horses, after which I felt comforted, though I could not sleep. At the break of day I looked out, and to my great joy saw the horses standing near the cart. You may imagine how grateful I was to Him who is ever ready to help in time of trouble."

The dépôt of the Auxiliary is in Adderley-street, Capetown, and the secretary is Rev. L. Nuttall.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

By Sir S. Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B.

XVIII.

THE THIRD AND FOURTH TRUMPETS.

"And the third angel sounded, and there fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters; and the name of the star is called Wormwood, and the third part of the waters became wormwood, and many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter."

At the third trumpet peal a falling star, blazing like a torch, a portentous meteor, suddenly illuminates the black clouds that hang over the scene on which the prophet's gaze is still fixed. Its fiery track appears to follow especially the course of the rivers that water the various provinces that lie stretched out in their loveliness at his feet, and as its strange and apparently erratic flight passes from stream to stream, their banks are crowded with the dead and dying from the cities that adorn them.

The Old Testament again explains the symbols. "Smoking firebrands" is the metaphorical designation applied by God to the two enemies that attempted to capture Jerusalem in the days of Ahaz (Is. vii. 4). A star "fallen from heaven, Lucifer, son of the morning," is the name given to the King of Babylon, the "oppressor," the "smiter," the "ruler," the "weakener" of the nations (Is. xiv. 4—12). And the afflictions and miseries of the Babylonish captivity, that were to come upon the Jewish people and prophets, are predicted under the figure of feeding them with wormwood, and giving them water of gall to drink (Jer. ix. 15; xxxiii. 15). The meaning of the mysterious symbol is thus again fixed by the Word of God itself.

We turn to history. Who is it that follows Alaric, king of the Visigoths, and Genseric, king of the Vandals? Attila, king of the Huns, "the Scourge of God," appears upon the scene. Having so established his authority upon the Lower Danube that, as Gibbon says, "the Huns were masters of the great river," in A.D. 450, he moves against the western provinces ("the third part" of the Empire) along the Upper Danube, and, reaching the Rhine at Basle, follows its stream right down to Belgium, making it a scene of desolation. The cities on its banks, Strassburg, Spires, Worms, Maintz, Andernach, Treves (on the Moselle), Maestricht, are burned, their inhabitants massacred, the whole adjoining country wasted. Then, repulsed at the great battle of Chalons, the flaming torch falls upon the fountains of waters in the Alpine heights and valleys of Italy, Aquileia, Pavia, Verona, Mantua, Milan, Turin, being, as it were, scorched up in Attila's destroying march. Thus were the rivers of the Danube and the Rhine and the springs of the Italian waters indeed turned to wormwood. Famine, disease, and pestilence followed the course of war. Such were the events heralded by the third trumpet.

"And the fourth angel sounded, and the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was darkened, and the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise."

The symbolism of the fourth trumpet has already been explained. We have seen that the imagery of sun, moon and stars, which has been employed in previous portions of the Apocalypse, represents, according to the analogy of scriptural symbolism in the Old Testament, the ruling powers. When, therefore, these are seen to be extinguished, the overthrow of some particular dynasty or form of government is evidently denoted, and, as in the present instance we are told that it was "the third part" of these luminaries that ceased to shine—the expression having been ascertained to refer to the western third of the Roman Empire—we are prepared to expect that the events heralded by the fourth trumpet-blast would be those which were connected with the last stage of the existence of that mighty dominion, the subject of Nebuchadnezzar's and Daniel's visions.

And such, indeed, there can hardly be room to doubt, is the fact. As the visions introduced by the first three trumpets prefigured the invasions which contributed to its Decline, so that of the fourth represents its Fall.

I quote again from Elliott. "The glory of Rome had long departed; its provinces one after another rent from it; the territory attached to it become like a desert; its maritime possessions, its fleets and commerce, annihilated. Little remained to it but the vain titles and insignia of sovereignty. Some twenty years or more from the death of Attila, and much less from that of Genseric, Odoacer, chief of the Heruli, commanded that the name and office of Roman Emperor of the West should be abolished. The authorities bowed in submission. The last phantom of an Emperor, Romulus Augustulus, abdicated, the Senate sent away the imperial insignia to Constantinople, and within a comparatively short period the Roman Senate itself was dissolved and the Consulship abrogated."

Thus fell the Roman Empire of the West. In the words of Jerome, "The brightest light of earth was extinguished," or as Byron, in Childe Harold, writes, in the very language of the prophecy:—

"She saw her glories star by star expire."

We may again ask, is it possible for the calamities that fell upon the Empire, calamities of transcendent magnitude, and of such overwhelming importance in their influence upon European history, to be more fittingly, concisely, or strikingly represented, than by the symbols of the prophetic visions? Can prophecy in hieroglyphic, and history in plain language, more exactly correspond?

At this point it is perhaps desirable to advert to a feature in the record of the Apocalyptic visions, to which reference has already been briefly made in the paper on "The Symbolism of the Book." I refer to the concurrent use of both symbolic and literal expressions in the same passage. And it becomes needful to do so, first, in order rightly to apprehend the method of the revelation, and consequently its meaning; and, in the next place, to anticipate or remove an objection which might naturally occur to some minds.

It will doubtless have been noticed, in examining the text, and the explanation given, that while to many of the objects described a symbolic character has been attributed, others have been understood in their ordinary literal meaning. Thus, under the first trumpet, hail and fire, trees and grass—under the second a burning mountain—under the third the star from heaven—and under the fourth the sun, moon, and stars, were all regarded as symbols; while the earth, the sea, the ships, the rivers and fountains of waters were all interpreted literally.

At first sight this may appear arbitrary, and as leaving it entirely to the will or fancy of interpreters to adopt the one or the other method, just as it may suit their own particular scheme; and it may be argued that such a principle—if principle it can be called—would admit of the Revelation being twisted in any and every direction.

But the question is whether this concurrent employment of the two languages was intended by Him who gave the revelation and inspired the words in which it was recorded by the seer. Does a similar phenomenon occur elsewhere in the Scriptures? Does it appear, in particular, in any prophecies or visions which have been fulfilled, and the interpretation of which has been definitely ascertained? Now, the fact is that such use of the two kinds of expression is repeated again and again.

A few instances will be sufficient to prove this. In one of the earliest prophetic visions, Balaam declared that "a Star should come out of Jacob," and "a Sceptre arise out of Israel." The "star" and "sceptre" are symbolic; "Jacob" and "Israel" are literal. "I see a seething pot," says Jeremiah (ch. i. 13), "and its face is towards the north." The "seething pot" is symbolic; "the north" is literal. "The east wind hath broken thee in the midst of the seas" (Ezek. xxvii. 26). "The east wind" is symbolic; "the seas" literal. In Ezek. xxxii., "the dragon" (or crocodile), to which Pharaoh is likened, "the fowls of the heaven" and "the beasts of the earth," are symbolical; "the land," "the mountains," and "the rivers" are literal. "I will set a plumbline in the midst of my people Israel" (Am. vii. 8). The "plumbline" is symbolic; "Israel" is literal. In Lu. xiii. 32, "fox" is symbolical or metaphorical; "devils" and "cures" are literal. A careful examination of Old Testament prophecies will disclose a host of similar instances; and it is therefore an evident and actual fact that the Lord God of the holy prophets has repeatedly employed such a form of revelation. We can consequently neither deny the fact nor dispute the wisdom which has adopted such a method.

It is, moreover, a method which is constantly used by ourselves. It would be difficult to find an ordinary newspaper article, or speech of a public man, in which the figurative does not frequently appear in the same sentence with the most matter-of-fact language; and we are not perplexed thereby. Common sense, and an acquaintance with the forms of expression in ordinary use, enable us without any difficulty to apprehend the intended meaning.

In interpreting prophecy it is, of course, more difficult, since there symbolic language is employed to conceal as well as to reveal; but, apart from that spiritual sense which is the prime condition for understanding the meaning, a perception of the literary, dramatic, or other necessities of the case will generally suffice to make the distinction between the two uses pretty plain.

It is also perhaps useful to bear in mind that we are not bound, because an expression has been used in a symbolic sense in one place, always and everywhere else to confine it to the same. No such cast-iron or servile system obtains in the Scripture. We find, for instance, that while our Lord is spoken of as "the Lion of the tribe of Judah," Satan is also described as "a roaring lion"—that while the latter is called "that old serpent," Christ was typified by the brazen serpent. The non-perception of this has led some interpreters into considerable and needless difficulties, and indeed into not infrequent contradiction of their own canons. I allude to it here because, as we proceed, instances will be found of the use of the same symbol in two different ways.

I would only now make one further observation; namely, that the circumstances to which reference has been made—the concurrent employment of symbolic and literal language, and the different use of the same term in different places—may well lead us to expect that interpreters of prophecy will not invariably agree among themselves, and should at the same time make us tolerant of the views that others may hold which are not precisely the same as our own. In so mysterious a book as the Revelation, differences of interpretation are surely allowable.

ST. GILES CHRISTIAN MISSION.

An account lately given in our pages of Mr. Wheatley's work having come under the notice of a young man helped and set on his feet by the Mission, he has sent us the following letter, telling what it has done for him. Although for obvious reasons we do not give the name of the writer, we know him, and know that the letter is authentic:—

"Dear Sir,—About six years ago I was as low down in the world as anyone can be, and as I looked about for some new opening, for some chance to redeem the past, I was met on every hand by difficulties, which only those can fully understand who have been similarly placed.

"Then it was that my needs came under the notice of Mr. William Wheatley, of the St. Giles Christian Mission.

"I know my case was no easy one to deal with, but the help I so sorely needed was given by him, and it is not too much to say that under God I owe everything I am and have to his timely assistance.

"I know of many similar acts of kindness which have been quickly and quietly done by this Mission, and I am bound to confess that a Christianity which bears such noble fruit as this is just the Christianity I want as my guide and help through life.

"After all that has been done for me, my greatest desire is that I may have such grace and strength from God as will enable me to prove by my life that I have the right to sign myself—Yours faithfully, "Gratitude."

This is but one out of hundreds similarly aided at a critical time, rescued from circumstances which seemed hopelessly to hedge them in to crime, and now living honestly and industriously. The opportunities of such service are great; many men and boys seek help in order to escape; but help means cost, and funds, unhappily, come in slowly. Much more might be done were the means to do it forthcoming. The superintendent is Mr. William Wheatley, 29, Brooke-street, Holborn, E.C.

THRIFT-TEMPERANCE MEETINGS.—At the half-yearly meeting of the National Thrift Society, recently held at 1, Finsbury-circus, E.C., the secretary stated that 110 meetings for the advocacy of Thrift and Temperance, had been held by the Society since the commencement of the year.

Summer at Northfield.—I.

Why is it that those whose home is in this far-away spot so often pine to return to it when circumstances of work or pleasure have for a time led them to sojourn elsewhere? The reason is not far to seek. Let the British tourist combine some of the most attractive scenes of hill, valley, river, and wood with which he is familiar in his native isles, and he will find here the counterpart of them all.

There is said to be a Northfield in almost every State of the Union, but to those who have seen this, there can be only one. Its name may belong to others, but its beauty is its own. Hence it is that "homesickness" is a malady prevalent in the families of the evangelists and other Christian workers, who make this their residence during the summer months, when duty calls them to leave it for any length of time.

Here the broad and silent Connecticut river pursues its ceaseless course, tortuously dividing the wooded meadows which, backed by lofty hills, flank its sides, and, stretching away into the distance, rise tier after tier of mountains, interlacing themselves with graceful symmetry, while the blue of heaven is reflected upon their roundly-moulded peaks. Such is the scene upon which the childhood of D. L. Moody dawned, and inspired by which he looked from Nature to her God, to whom his lifework is to point his fellow-men.

But not only so. His personality is impressed like a seal upon the entire country-side. This is the more remarkable in view of the large proportion of his time that he has spent elsewhere. Everybody knows him, and, like a "father of his people," he is welcomed by them all. He is here from Chicago for a few days to attend some of the now in progress, and soon he will fly off again to the heat and bustle of that cosmopolitan city. But meantime he enjoys the quiet and restful change, wisely electing to derive all the benefit he can from the pure country breezes. Accordingly, he may be seen at any hour after early morn driving around in his useful "buggy," receiving salutations from everyone he meets, though not without an occasional rebuke from one and another that he does not "come inside" when passing their door. "Ah, well," he replies cheerily, "I only go indoors when I'm obliged to, for meals and sleep. This fresh air is so good, I take in all I can." Yet he breaks this rule sometimes, for he has only to hear of sickness or trouble casting a cloud o'er any household, and he is there to solace or to help. He is a man greatly beloved, and no wonder, with so large and generous a heart as his; and the fervour of his religion pervades the whole atmosphere of the town. Climb the hillside, wander through meadow or wood, take a seat by the side of a passing teamster, or pause to purchase a trifle at the village store, and not a word but of appreciation will you hear; while "Then shall my heart keep singing," or "This is my story, this is my song," comes floating over newly-mown hay which husbandman and labourer are gathering in.

Formerly a straggling hamlet, Northfield is now the chosen resort of hundreds of visitors who attend the three annual conferences, and enjoy, many of them, a longer or shorter stay beyond. Last week young ladies were in the ascendancy, to-day the men hold the field, while in August a general Christian Convention will occupy the first fortnight. So there is a constant coming and going, and between-whiles are organised picnics and pleasure-parties to various points of interest and attraction.

Six large seminary buildings (occupied in term time by young women being educated and trained for Gospel work) and a capacious hotel, conducted on strictly have vested the little town with such increased importance as to justify the establishment of a second post and telegraph office, while all around are springing up verandahed villas, in which new residents are taking up their permanent abode. Very picturesque are these domiciles, substantially built of wood, but designed externally with adequate regard for their natural environment. Scarcely ever does a fence divide the forecourt from the road. A majestic avenue of maples, a mile or more in extent down the main street, forms a luxurious shelter under which family groups repose in hammock and rocking-chair with refreshing indifference to all who pass by, which pleasantly suggests to a stranger's mind the picture of the oriental "sitting under his vine and fig tree."

Thus much from my pen of the place itself and of the man who has made it what it is. I reserve for later mention the men's seminaries across the river at Mount Hermon. The notice of the Ladies' Conference which follows is contributed by a lady whose whole heart is in the work of enlisting her educated sisters for the Master's service amongst each other, or in whatever sphere He may locate them. As one of the promoters of the Conference she is peculiarly qualified to describe its rise and development, and as its inception is practically similar to that of the male students' conference, which I hope to report next week, I commend this sketch to the especial attention of my readers so that I need not cover the ground a second time.

Northfield, Mass, July 6. G. E. M.

YOUNG WOMEN IN COUNCIL.

A notable event has just occurred in the assembly of an International Young Women's Conference, under the leadership of Mr. D. L. Moody, and under the auspices of the International Y.W.C.A. About two hundred young women gathered for a week of converse, prayer, and Bible study, from June 22—30, at which England, Scotland, and Ireland were also represented.

The World's Students' Conference for Young Men having met since 1886 in this place, has already established the value of such assemblies in winning college men to a higher standard of Christian life, and in uniting them in service for Christ. College life for women is a fast growing feature, and the advantages of higher education are now enjoyed by fully 100,000 young women in America. While these are opening up avenues of opportunity and responsibility for Christian service, and therefore calling for the highest type of consecrated womanhood, only one-half of this college element are acknowledged Christians.

A great field of service is opening up to women, but the world of college life is always full of danger in its very intensity; danger of exalting the intellectual and dwarfing the spiritual; of spiritual daring with social sins; of purchasing popularity at the price of time and self-respect; of "using our highest powers for less than the highest good."

THE PURPOSE OF THIS CONFERENCE

was, therefore, to bring leading students from representative colleges together, to consider questions of special value to their own spiritual lives, their power for usefulness, and how to attain greater efficiency for service. The invitation was also extended to young women interested in lines of Christian work in cities, in order to consider successful principles and methods of work for their sisters of all occupations, that they may be won to Christ, and developed in Christ. Two lines of Bible study were arranged, meeting for an hour each morning, with the object of training young women to be successful workers and leaders, "willing, enthusiastic, consecrated, strong, intelligent, skilled, and armed" for the warfare against sin. An Inductive Bible Study Class was taught by Mr. Robert E. Speer, of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Taking the Gospel of Mark as his subject, he dealt with it in such a manner as to draw out the circumstances of its composition, the life of its characters, and the fulness of its meaning; and thus to lead to the simple and direct application of the truth studied to the individual life of the student.

The Workers' Bible Training Class was another feature, taught by Mr. James McConaughy, a lecturer in the Mount Hermon School, the subject being "Christ's life among men." The special object of the class was to study the method and life of the Saviour in dealing with men and women in His daily walk; so as to learn adaptation to people inquiring and doubting, and be able to use the searching truths of God's Word in winning them to Christ.

A special series of Conferences on "Work for Young Women by Young Women," was led by Miss Effie K. Price, the general secretary of the International Young Women's Christian Association.

The value of systematised work for special classes was dwelt on, bringing under notice the important fact that the large majority of young women as a class, are outside of the Evangelical churches. Young women are an important element for good or evil in every community, because of their great influence on all lines of secular and religious life, and further because they stand at the

FOUNTAIN HEAD OF THE HUMAN RACE.

They are exposed to many temptations; they are very open to sympathy now, and hard to be won as they grow older. They must be won to Christ, if their lives are to be turned from sin unto righteousness. Young women are suceptible to the influences of young women, and as a class can only be reached by them. Conferences were conducted by Miss Morse, of New York, on the City work of the Young Women's Christian Association, clearly setting forth the plan and work of the Association as an arm of the Church working among young women. Its work is based on the threefold nature—body, soul, and mind.

To meet the social needs of young women, the Association rooms must be homelike, with pleasant parlours and reception-rooms, with good pictures and the pleasing characteristics of the home, that they may be a truly good and helpful resort for young women. Good music, good books and magazines, good entertainments will help to attract; but above all we should have homelike workers and a home like atmosphere, and the hearty purpose to introduce young women not only to our friends, but to our great Friend and Master.

For educational purposes, a well-stocked reading-room is a first requisite in counteracting taste for poor literature, and cultivating a love for good literature. The bright young people's papers of the day will prove strong rivals against trashy papers. The library should be chosen with care, to meet the varied demands of young women of very different degrees of opportunity and need. The planning of educational classes should be most practical, including common branches, industrial classes, history, language, music, fine arts, book-keeping—in short—an institution of education to young women of all classes, whether mercantile, industrial, student, or at leisure.

Knowing the intimate relation of the physical life to sound mental and spiritual life, and that our bodies are indeed "temples of the Holy Ghost," the Association attempts to further physical education and training. The spiritual agencies may be said to consist directly of the Bible classes, which are varied in kind, following the devotional, intellectual, or evangelistic method, also new converts' classes and women's training classes. In these different ways many young women may be led to study the Word of God for themselves. Special meetings for young women only on Sunday afternoons are valuable opportunities for winning them to Christ. Social meetings for religious purposes are helpful agencies in building up workers. But every agency of the Association as it works among young women should be consecrated to the glory of Him who has made us.

THE CONFERENCES FOR COLLEGE WOMEN

were led by Miss Blanche Zehring, assistant-secretary of the International Young Women's Christian Association. The subjects were such as should especially receive the attention and thought of students:—"Character-Building During College Years," "Organised Work Necessary to Christian Development," "Principles Necessary to Best Results in Christian Work," "Work for New Students," "Systematic Giving Among College Women," "The Relation of College Women to Missions," and "The College Young Women's Christian Association." The privilege and duty of every student, thus receiving the great blessings of a civilisation which comes to us in the name of Christ, to love and serve Him, was clearly emphasised. And as His servants we should set above all things else a Christian ideal, and seek to lead every student to recognise the obligation of her privilege in discharging her duty, (1) to her fellow-students, (2) to her country, (3) to the world.

1. There is no inaction of life, and the influence of student on student is vital. The fact that only one-half of the college women are Christians by profession, and that only about one in twenty-five are reached after leaving college, shows the urgency of active Christian effort. The "great possessions" which college students have to dedicate to the highest service are talents, ability to please and help others, time, and God-given personality. These may be effective agents in re-uniting often opposing social factions into one Christian head, making the Christian life the leading social element in all things good in college life.

2. Of the ten millions of young women three-fifths are outside the Evangelical Church. If they are to be won at all, it must be soon. College students are trained to lead; they have had the best advantages, and should, therefore, lead in the highest of all services. It has been said, "If you would fortify a nation, you must sanctify it"; and there is behind this another truth, that if you would sanctify a nation, you must sanctify its womanhood.

3. A glance at our duty to the world. There can be no doubt, when we look at the great cities of the Orient, into which the light of the Sun of Righteousness never shines, and remember the "open sore of the world," enveloped in midnight darkness and terrible internal struggles, of South American nations, that the Church has been trifling with the last command of Jesus Christ. Think of sixty millions of young women in China alone without hope for this life or the life to come! Think of the young women of Japan entering into larger opportunities of life, and longing for the "light of the world"! And let us remember that the young women of all nations are beginning to look to the young women of Christian nations for help, and are connecting as never before the happiness of their life with their religion.

WOMAN'S PLACE AND POWER

in this problem can be measured by the warning of a Hindu, that our lady missionaries are reaching the children and women, and through the hearts of the women are reaching the heads of the men, and so shaking the foundations of heathenism. As the watchword of modern education has been culture, Paul has expressed its culmination in admonishing us to "grow up into Him in all things, who is the Head, even Christ." And the poet expresses what should be our sweetest ambition:—

To serve the present age,
My calling to fulfil;
Oh may it all my powers engage
To do my Master's will!

The advantages of an inter-collegiate movement to extend God's Kingdom among students in every land were also dwelt on. The fact that they are found nearly all over the world, and are rapidly increasing in numbers, and that as a class they are easily united, and very fully sympathise with each other's life, indicates the wisdom of uniting these possessors of peculiar privileges and intense interests for the greatest cause of all, and thus centre their attention on the conditions and needs of all young women.

Two hundred and fifty American colleges already stand united in this great Christian sisterhood, and on their standard may be read these words, "Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts," and in their hearts is inscribed this burning desire "The young women of the world for Jesus Christ." The afternoons throughout the Conference were devoted to recreation and out-of-door sports, such as tennis tournaments, walking matches, and in rambling and making excursions along the beautiful valley of the Connecticut River. These afternoons did much to promote a healthy and joyous atmosphere throughout the whole session. At the sunset hour, all assembled for talks over

PROBLEMS OF LIFE WORK.

These were sometimes held on a grassy knoll, known as "Round Top," just behind Mr. Moody's home, and there returned missionaries and others who have searched deep into the things of God, came to teach us lessons of his great work.

The evenings were devoted to platform meetings, with noted men and women speakers, who had been eminently successful in different branches of work. Among those were Mrs. W. F. Bainbridge, the head of the Women's Department of the great City Mission Work of New York City; Miss Grace H. Dodge, originator of the "Working Girls' Clubs," now existing all over the United States; Mrs. Gibbon, president of the Young Women's Christian Association of Aberdeen, Scotland; Rev. Harlan P. Beach, of China; Rev. Geo. C. Needham, and Major Whittle. Then there was the inspiring presence of Mr. Moody himself, through whose kindness the Conference was made possible. As the week closed he was unanimously thanked for his hospitality, and requested to allow a longer meeting next summer. Greetings were sent from this first Eastern Conference of young women to the third Western Convention, convening July 5-18, at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, about sixty miles from Chicago, and also under the International Young Women's Christian Association. Surely God has a purpose in raising up trained Christian workers for his service; and shall we not believe it is no less a purpose than the fulfilment of his holy prophecy that "In the last days I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy. . . . and upon my servants and on my hand maidens will I pour out of my Spirit, and they shall prophesy."

THE DEPARTING SABBATH.

BY REV. J. E. LINNELL.

WHETHER Britain is to retain the Sabbath, or whether its millions of wearied workers are to lose a seventh day's rest, is a question that the professing Church of Christ will soon have to decide for ever. I know I might take still higher ground, and speak of "The Lord's Day" rather than "The Sabbath," but I am viewing the question on its human side. There are those who, though none too eager to render to God his due, may yet dislike the idea of parting with what—though still claimed by Him—He allows them to regard as their own.

If the professing Church determines that the day shall be kept as originally designed, and as, for ages, it has been used by the people of God, not even the non-religious world will be able wholly to secularise it. But, startling as such a statement may be, religious people, so-called, appear more ready to surrender the Sabbath than others are to appropriate it for their own godless pleasure. There are parishes in this land where Sunday cricket and football would receive parsonic patronage, while the much-abused publican would shrink with horror from desecrating the day with such amusements. And there are those who would have us believe they represent advanced Christianity, who, in the sale of religious papers, find it hard to overcome a drunkard's reluctance to let money change hands on a Sunday.

According to our Lord's own teaching, the way of life is a narrow way: but many of us have been trying to make it wider. We have claimed the liberty to ignore God's commandments, and have urged, as an excuse for doing evil, the good end we have had in view. This has been the case with regard to the Sabbath; we have robbed it of its sacred quiet; we have dishonoured it with the methods we have used in so-called Christian work; and then have pleaded—against the objections of Christians more consistent than ourselves, ah, and the objections, too, of conscience, and the Word of God, a desire to give the Gospel a bearing on the masses.

I remember my own faults this day. I had never heard of "The Salvation Army," nor had any "Church Army" come into existence when I began to use brass instruments at open-air Gospel gatherings on the Sunday afternoon. I never felt wholly at ease, but I always quieted conscience with the thought that the band drew such numbers to hear God's word. My feelings, however, with regard to such agencies were very much changed during "The Manchester Mission." I was preaching in "The Albert Memorial Church" when a Roman Catholic band outside compelled me abruptly to finish my sermon. This was in the morning. In the afternoon there were bands all round us, and the thud of big drums, both near and distant, was simply maddening. I had never used drums on the Lord's Day myself, and, by holding our meetings on the vicarage lawn or away in one of our Pavenham meadows, I had striven so to make use of the music as not to annoy my neighbours. But now, through a conversation held with a friend, the unpleasant fact cropped up, that I had been greatly injuring his Sabbath-school, and probably others too. We only accompanied the hymns after this for about two Sunday afternoons. Then I took up a bill that had been circulated through the neighbourhood with reference to a well-known "Temperance Band" that was coming to give a Sunday concert in the adjoining county town, and as I looked at that bill, with its suggestive wording, and remembered that the flood-gates for such performances had been opened by Christian people, and that I, among others, had helped forward the evil, I asked the Lord to pardon me for what I had done, and determined to dispense with the instruments. But even then I continued the music at a late open-air service, for a few Sundays. People who never darkened a church or a chapel door came to this. Our Wesleyan friends tendered their help, and I tried to believe that it would be a greater sin to throw away such an opportunity for usefulness than to just play such grave old tunes as "Rockingham," "The Emperor's Hymn," etc., with the people all singing around us. But it would not do. I knew that four bands at least (and three of them having drums) were keeping Sabbath quiet from the neighbouring county town, and how could I condemn these if we were playing, even though at a religious and a most solemn service, in our little village?

This question is now most seriously affecting the welfare of all Sabbath schools, for the attractions of the school will never be able to overcome a child's fondness for military music, and the sight of uniformed bandsmen; and, with the Bible virtually banished from many of our day schools, the only chance many a child has of learning the way of eternal life is in the Sabbath school. Advocates for the band may argue, as I have done, that results will justify its employment. But let the evil and the good be weighed against each other, and which will preponderate? Injury wrought to the Sabbath school system must react disastrously on the community at large, to say nothing of the Church of Christ. Had it not been for our Sunday schools, the blackguardism and lawlessness which, even now, are ready to engulf society, would have been supreme at the present hour; and, but for their continuance, these will, ere many more years have gone by, have swept away all the barriers that now keep their powers for mischief under restraint. It is a complaint, often heard in Bedford, that its Sabbaths have been changed into Bank Holidays. This is the murmur, too, in numberless other towns. Religious Sunday bands and religious Sunday processions have led to secular Sunday bands, and "cyclists'" Sunday parades; and ere long we shall have Sunday dances too. I do trust that fellow Christians will consider this matter in the light of Scripture. Many things may be lawful which are not expedient, and where that which is lawful means hurt to man, and dishonour to God, I know that every loyal servant of Christ will be but too ready to cease from its use.

One word about buying and selling on the Sabbath. If trading in religious literature is to be carried on by professing Christians, who can wonder if those who make no profession of religion take down their once closed shutters and open their shops for the sale of secular papers, etc.? And if the newsvendor shall be seen making money on the Lord's Day, who shall forbid the tobacconist, the confectioner, and others?

It may seem wrong to use a sporting phrase in connection with such a solemn subject, but it is time that some who delight to think that they have begun "forward" movements in church work, began to "hark back" and get on old lines once more. One thing is certain; while we are on Scripture lines we are safe, and, to me, it is equally certain that when we allow ourselves to be drawn from these, whatever may be the aim proposed, we shall do both ourselves and others more harm than good.

The London City Mission.

A PLEASANT garden meeting, convened by the East London Auxiliary of the London City Mission, was held on Thursday afternoon, by permission of Mr. and Mrs. J. Gurney Barclay, in the grounds of their residence at Knott's Green, Leyton, Essex. Mr. JAMES DUNN made a statement, in the course of which he said that, owing to death and retirement in their ranks, it had been found necessary to make some alterations in the working of the Auxiliary, by which each of the missionaries would be placed under the direction of the secretary of the district in which he is labouring. He had now 118 missionaries, for whom funds had to be found, twenty-eight of whom were engaged in special fields. The support for fourteen ordinary and five special districts had fallen off.

Mr. F. A. BEVAN (chairman) said it was a serious fact, but a true one, that they had been going back during the last few years, both in the matter of men and of money, for the two go together. For every £100 which they received they were enabled to send another labourer forth into an ever-increasing vineyard, but they had diminished from 505 to 483, whilst the great city had gone on increasing at the rate of 80,000 a year. Mr. Fuller, missionary to tramcar and 'bus men, Mr. Bradshaw, missionary at Victoria Docks, and others addressed the meeting.

CHRISTIAN HARBOUR LIGHTS.—The first muster of the members, in the new Seamen's Christian Friend Chapel, was held on Thursday. Colonel Macgregor, C.B., presided, and gave a Gospel address. Miss Messer, Mrs. Hill, and others also spoke, followed by a number of testimonies from seamen.

For the Young.

A FLOWER VILLAGE.

How fond of flowers children are, to be sure! If a boy has a small garden all to himself, it is astonishing how much he is anxious to crowd into it. Sweetwilliam and daisies, sweet peas and mignonette, poppies and pansies, and many others would all be huddled together without any regard as to the space required for each plant to flourish, or the relative height of the flowers, if father or mother were not consulted when the bed is being planned. And how the little fingers itch to pluck the flowers as they appear! Children seem to think it much more pleasant to pick flowers and shorten their days, than for them to enjoy a prolonged existence in their little beds. However, we like to foster the love for flowers which little folks exhibit, although sometimes it means considerable self-denial on our part.

But you would like to live in a "Flower Village," wouldn't you? Well, I want to tell you of a visit I recently paid to such a village, and to bespeak your interest on behalf of the sweet and tender plants I saw flourishing there.

Many of my readers have doubtless been to Clacton-on-Sea, and been delighted with the sands, which afford so much amusement; but thousands of you have never visited this popular seaside resort. Well, the Flower Village is at Clacton, and very beautifully is it situated. It consists of four detached roomy villas, which are appropriately called "Snowdrop," "Forget-me-not," "Buttercup," and "Daisy"; perhaps I should have said five villas, but the fact is the fifth building is a tiny cottage occupied by the caretaker, and is called "Violet." In all, there were about one hundred little orphan girls—for these are the plants under cultivation in this village—of various ages, ranging from eight months to about nineteen years; some have lost one parent, whilst others have neither father nor mother. One dear little girl has both parents living, but her father cares nothing for his child, and her mother is in prison; so she is being taken care of by the kind friends at the orphanage. Thus God fulfils his promise: "When thy father and thy mother forsake thee, then the Lord will take thee up."

But I must tell you something about the lady in charge of the village. The children call her "mother." She is a widow lady, and has one little boy, three years of age. Dear little Georgie never knew his father, so you will not wonder at his mother having such a warm heart for the little orphans placed under her care. She is very kind to them, and they all love and respect her very much. She is well acquainted with every department of the "Flower Girls' Mission," of which this is the country branch; and her experience amongst the flower-sellers of London has specially fitted her for the office she now fills.

"SNOWDROP."

is an Orphanage and Babies' Villa. In this building there are twelve infants under four years of age. Poor little Lydia was received in last New Year's Day when but sixteen days old. Her mother had died twelve days previously; her father was in bad health, and very poor, though quite respectable. When Lydia was taken to the Flower Village she was such a wee mite and quite a skeleton; in fact, for some weeks she could not be clothed, and the doctor thought she would die. So she was wrapped up in cotton wool, and very gently tended; and now she is a fine chubby healthy baby with such bonny eyes! There are several other orphan girls in this building, most of whom are very fond of the babies, and sometimes take them out in bassinettes.

"FORGET-ME-NOT"

is another villa in which thirty or forty orphan girls reside. Little Mary was five years of age when she was received three years ago. Her father was dead, her mother had no home, and wandered about with her charge, begging by day, and sleeping by night in doorways, under arches, and, when funds would permit, in common lodging-houses. For a fortnight after entering "Forget-me-not," Mary could not be induced to lie down; she would persist in sitting outside the bed, crouched up and sleeping with her head resting on her knees, as she had been in the habit of doing all her life! But she now enjoys the comfort of a nice little bed, and will grow up a useful lass. Her mother, I am sorry to say, is still a wanderer in the streets.

"BUTTERCUP"

contains eighteen orphans, and one convalescent. Poor Annie has no parents, and has been sent to Clacton for a change of air. However, she is very anxious to remain in the orphanage, and is a very industrious girl. Although she is nineteen years old, she is no taller than a child of ten. Her head and body are those of a woman, but her legs and arms are those of a child. Her mother on being left a widow supported her three girls by taking in washing. They lived in a top floor; and one day, while the children were at school, the mother had a fit, and was found by her daughter Nellie lying dead on the floor with the tub on the top of her, and her poor face much bruised and disfigured.

"DAISY"

is called the hospital. Here are two invalids in bed, one cripple, a girl who is subject to fits, and various others who are suffering in one way or another; but all are orphans.

Some of the children in the Flower Village have lived in cellars, with a bundle of rags for a bed; and their pinched faces on being received into the orphanage have shown that they have suffered want and semi-starvation. But with care and kind treatment they have regained health and strength; and to see them as I saw them, you would hardly believe that they had experienced such a rough existence. Are they not very tender plants, for whom Jesus is caring through the friends of the "Flower Girls' Mission"? And would you not like to lend a hand in the cultivation of these sweet flowers? I know sufficient of the generous hearts of my young readers towards the poor helpless boys and girls to feel quite confident that when the need is placed before them they will do their utmost to meet it. Perhaps some of you would like a collecting box, so as to aid the work in this practical way; no doubt Mr. Groom would be glad to forward them to those who could make good use of them. Then I am sure that some of the girls have dolls that could be spared, and other toys with which the little orphans could amuse themselves in their leisure hours. Needlecases, too, are much appreciated, and any pieces of work can be turned to good account. I hope you will not visit Clacton without calling at the orphanage, which is situated in the old road about ten minutes' walk from the railway station. Visitors are welcome any day except Saturday and Sunday, between 11 and 6 p.m. Clothing of any kind is always acceptable. Gifts of toys and clothing for the orphans should be sent direct to the Matron, Flower Village, Clacton-on-Sea; contributions in aid of the Mission to the Hon. Supt., Mr. J. A. Groom, 8, Sekforde-street, Clerkenwell, London.

CHILDREN'S HOMES, TANGIER.

While many of us here have been wondering if we ought to go on with an expensive teacher, now funds are so low and pupils so few, the matter has been suddenly decided for us, and we feel it is the Lord's arranging. Azad has received an invitation for the summer from Mr. Brown, of Leicester, and as he has been wanting to get a holiday, he is leaving for England to-morrow for three or four months. During the great heat little study is done, so it seems a first-rate arrangement in every way.

The children are coming in increasing numbers; it makes me very glad. I have often over twenty, some of them such fine boys. They are beginning to be much better behaved, and seem to enjoy the hymns and Bible lessons; it is happy work teaching them, only rather exhausting. My father and other friends are just starting a small auxiliary, which promises to be very helpful to the work, and will prevent it being any extra expense at all to the society.

CHILDREN'S SPECIAL SERVICE MISSION.

J. S. Tyler, Hastings, July 12 to 25.

Mr. A. G. Dodderidge, at Portrush (N. Ireland), during July.

Mr. H. Hutchinson, Tent, Keswick, Sundays, July 23 and 30.

CHILDREN'S SCRIPTURE UNION.—July 23, S., Matthew xii. 1-13; 24, xii. 14-30; 25, xii. 31-50; 26, xiii. 1-17; 27, xiii. 18-30; 28, xiii. 31-43; 29, xiii. 44-58.

"MISSIONS" is indeed fast becoming a great, practical emotion of the Church; but it is also the reproachful spectre, which, beckoning with outstretched hand, speaks to the people in her Master's name, and tells of privileges, duties, and responsibilities neglected; of degraded humanity and perishing souls; and of boundless possibilities for the outgoings of love.—The Missionary.

OUR VILLAGE CHILDREN.

On Saturday, May 6, we commenced work with our new caravan. Much prayer had been made for the van, and now that a start was effected our hearts were filled with gratitude. As the van passed out of Cambridge, we sang, "To God be the glory, Great things He hath done," and a mile or so on we drew to the roadside, ere the friends who had accompanied us thus far turned back, and again commended the work to God, and praised Him, for his mercy endureth for ever.

The first halting place was Burwell, where we were gladly received, and preached the Word out-of-doors and in the chapel, visiting the near village of Reach, and holding services on the green, with after-meetings in the Wesleyan Chapel. The truth was gladly received. The gipsies attending the horse fair are ignorant and Christless. A visit to several of their vans filled us with sadness and the prayer, "O Lord, send out thy light and thy salvation to these dark moving homes." By the kindness of the master of the workhouse at Newmarket, we were able to speak to the children and others there, returning in the evening, and holding a service on the green.

From Burwell we visited Isleham, but found the door closed, so we went on to Worlington, and were welcomed by the vicar. The work here was specially real, not only among the little ones, but some who were old in sin we found asking the way to life and liberty from bondage.

At Mildenhall the work was very happy, and many readily joined the Scripture Union. Here, too, testimony was received of those older in years, rejoicing with many little ones in the Saviour for the first time. A few meetings at Thetford, where we believe souls were saved—among them the worst lad in the school—and then on to Brandon, where a hearty reception awaited us. The Workmen's Hall was given up to us. The brass band played our hymns in the open-air. The meetings were largely attended, and those who loved the Lord extended their heartiest sympathy.

The closing days of May were spent at Fornham and at Old Newton. There seemed to be a careless and indifferent people, professing but not possessing. Some little ones' hearts were opened, as Lydia's was, to receive her Lord, in spite of some opposition from the schoolmaster.

On to Stowupland, where the services opened by an open-air meeting, followed by several days' earnest work. The attendance largely increased, and many professed conversion. Some who had been blessed walked from Old Newton, desiring to hear more. Several Scripture Union branches have been started. The brilliant weather has helped much. We bless God and take courage, feeling sure that this year's work is far-reaching and deeper, because we are able to remain longer and deal with souls. Surely God is with us and in the certainty of his promises we go forward, bearing precious seed. Continue in prayer for us, for a great door is open and there are many adversaries. Hitherto the Lord has provided. Funds will, however, be required to continue the work, for we propose to go forward till the summer closes.

Summer Holidays.

Forty-nine young men, enrolled by the City of London Y.M.C.A., Aldersgate-street, have just concluded a most delightful excursion through the Bernese Oberland, going as far south as Milan, Como, Bellagio, visiting Brussels, Lucerne, the Righi, Andermatt, Rhone Glacier, Meiringen, Giesbach, Interlaken, Berne, etc., staying at the best hotels and travelling (second class) for fourteen days, for the modest sum of ten guineas. One of the pleasing features of the trip was the arrangement for family worship each evening. Many testimonies have been received concerning the unqualified enjoyment, and in many cases also of spiritual blessing realised. The yachting cruises to the Norwegian fiords, organised by the same Association, sail from Leith on July 29th and August 12th respectively. The s.s. Kong Harold, exclusively chartered for these magnificent cruises, is admirably adapted for traversing the fiords. Amongst the passengers already registered are Rev. F. B. and Mrs. Meyer, Rev. W. R. Mowll, and Dr. Fry (Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society). There are still vacant berths in either cruise, including some at ten guineas, specially reserved for young men.

MDLLE. NITIKA has refused to sing at the World's Fair because liquor is sold there.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, JULY 23.—JOB XXIV.

Job laments that the times of punishment are not so explained by God, that those who know him may see and understand his reasons. He then turns to describe the life of the ungodly, who do dark deeds with apparent impunity. A very sad catalogue of crimes follows. The oppression of the needy, the driving away of the ass of the fatherless, the taking of the widow's ox for a pledge, the frequenting of the wilderness, the plunder of caravans, regardless of the claims of pity, the stealing the oil and the wine from those who had laboured to produce them, the murdering of the poor labouring man at the dawn, the commission of crimes at night—such are the iniquities which are described. And these are being committed under other forms in Christian England. Wonderful that God should bear with us, but his long-suffering would fain lead men to repent. It is only after long bearing and trial that He cuts down.

In his closing words (18-21) Job quotes the opinion of his friends as to the condition of the ungodly, that they pass away swiftly as the waters, and are snapped as a branch of a tree. And, in opposition, he states his own view (23-25), that they die in exalted positions, and not by a painful and lingering death, but as corn in the maturity of the ear. This also is true. Wicked men do not always meet their deserts in this world. In the next they are inevitable.

MONDAY, JULY 24.—JOB XXV.

Bildad's closing speech adds little to the controversy. He suggests simply that Job's vindications of himself do not imply that he is righteous before God, and, acting upon the philosophy of the time, Bildad prefers to consider that Job is guilty of unrealised sins rather than believe that God has permitted suffering to come to him unmerited.

There are some unanswerable questions in this paragraph—suggestions full of helpfulness. His armies are numberless, ten thousand times ten thousand, and every angel is pledged to our help. His light shines everywhere, even on the saddest hearts. Not one of us can be just before Him, but we may avail ourselves of the justifying righteousness of Christ, which, as Bunyan says, is always the same, not increased by our good frames or lessened by our bad ones. None of woman born are clean, but the blood of Jesus Christ cleanses from all sin. Moon and stars pale and pass away, but God hath set his heart upon his saints, and has adopted them into his family. And when the fabric of nature shall have decayed, they shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.

TUESDAY, JULY 25.—JOB XXVI.

Job taunts Bildad with his reply as having imparted no help or thought. How often may these words be said to us in our endeavours to help those who are in sorrow. We have spoken, but uttered nothing. We have sought to help, but no spirit has passed from us to them.

Job proceeds (5-14) to give a description of God's power as manifested in Hades, in space, and the clouds, and the ocean, and throughout the universe. The spirits of the dead tremble before Him: the grave and destruction that veil themselves in night are stripped before his gaze: the world itself is suspended in space by invisible threads (a wonderful foreshadowing of the true theory of the earth): the waters are held in the clouds, which do not burst under their weight, but act as the veil of God's throne: the sea owns his authority, hushing under his word, or rising in its might: his breath brings the dawn: his hand strangles the dragon, as representing a well-known constellation, Draco. But these are only the skirts of his ways. Great as is their acclaim as they circle his throne in thunder and splendour, they are but as a whisper as compared with his Divine power and Godhead. All that a Newton, or Herschel, or Faraday has known of God is, as compared to his essential nature, what the quiver of a leaf in the breeze is to the crash of the thunder-peal. This, oh child of God, is thy Father, and his power is for thy defence.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 26.—JOB XXVII.

Zophar ought now to have taken up the discourse, but as he was silent Job proceeds. He first denies that he was ungodly. He says that till he dies, he will not put away his integrity. He refuses to justify the contentions of his friends by admitting that their accusations were warrantable. He demands that those who had calumniated him should suffer the punishments which they had suggested to be his due.

He proves next, from his own history, the falsity of their charges, and asks if he were what they said he was, whether he would still delight in the Almighty, and call upon God. We may be thankful to have the testimony of a pure conscience. It is extremely comforting amid the perplexities of life to look up into the face of God, and know that there is no controversy between him and us. Keep a clear conscience, for if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God.

In the closing paragraph (11-23), Job takes up the words of his friends about the connection of sin and suffering, and seems to state their sentiments as strongly as they had done. Sin does bring punishment sooner or later, but suffering does not always prove sin.

THURSDAY, JULY 27.—JOB XXVIII.

Job anticipates the teaching of the book of Proverbs in his desire for that wisdom which is something more than the acquisition of intellectual knowledge, and is largely the insight that comes to a truly noble nature. Lofty morality yields knowledge. If we do his will we shall know. There is no certainty to the intellect, but only to the heart. Christ is the truth, the wisdom, and the Word of God.

A search for this pearl of great price, this certain knowledge, has occupied men in all ages. Job compares it with the search of the miner for the hidden treasures of the earth (1-12). According to R.V., a very minute and graphic description is given of ancient mining. The opened shaft, the entombed miners, the devious path, untracked by bird or beast, the passage cut among the rocks, the streams bound up. Would that we were as eager to discover God's truth as the miner his gold, or onyx, or sapphires.

The rich man cannot purchase this by his wealth, but only by his sincerity and simplicity, and by the revelation of the Holy Spirit. The explorer cannot reach it in depth or sea; the poor man, who has nothing to give for it, may know what kings and princes miss.

God alone is the mine of wisdom. In the depths of his nature, dark with excessive light, and hidden from the falcon eye of genius, are both knowledge and understanding. He waits to reveal the secret unto man, saying, "Behold!" Fear Him, and you will be wise; depart from evil, and you will understand things hidden from the wise and prudent, but revealed to babes.

FRIDAY, JULY 28.—JOB XXIX.

The tried patriarch gives a touching and beautiful description of the happy days which seemed to have passed for ever. Let us ask that each of them may be realised in us. Make thy face to shine upon thy servant (3). Let my days be ripe and fruitful, and the secret of God guide my home (4). Let my goings be rich with blessing (6). Let my influence be that of a godly man whose character has won universal respect (7-10).

There are some men the sound of whose voice awakens blessing, whose path through life is beset by those who come for help, and depart healed. The poor that cried, delivered; the fatherless and the widow made to sing. It is not enough to pay others to do our philanthropy, we should endeavour to be eyes and feet to those that are in need. And all this, not only because of the need of men, but for the glory of Him to whom we minister in the person of the least of these.

We sometimes say that "I shall die in my nest, changes will not come, life has reached its golden meridian," and then all suddenly we have to cry, "Oh that it were as in the months of old." But still trust and be not afraid, God watches over thee; He guides and cares.

SATURDAY, JULY 29.—JOB XXX.

In contrast to the description of prosperity, Job now recites his sorrows, arising in part from the ill-treatment of his friends, and in part from his physical sufferings.

"These verses (1-10) contain a very remarkable description of the outcast hordes of the desert...The traits are not general, but specific, and they describe a horde driven out from their homes by a stronger race. There is reason to suppose that in Idumea and Bashan, Troglodytes (cave-dwellers), a weak, nerveless race, survived their ruin for some considerable time, lingering near their old abodes. The colouring belongs, in fact, altogether to the age and country of Job; the description stands alone in its vivid portraiture of a wretchedness unknown or unrecorded in Palestine...In all this description Job must not be supposed to allude to the men of station and wealth who came to visit him in his affliction, but to the vagabonds who insulted him when he was abandoned by his friends."

Job's description of his pain is very touching (16-31). His pains prevent his rest; his disease clings to him like a garment; God seems to have removed far away. The most pitiful thing was, that, though he had always helped those who were in similar trouble, for him there was no help found. But out of all this sorrow, he was enriching the world for ever, with the priceless juice of the crushed grapes of his life, for it is only that which we have acquired in suffering that becomes the true help of other souls.

JULY 30.

PAUL AT EPHESUS.

Acts xix. 1-12.

GOLDEN TEXT, Jno. xvi. 13.

THE story of Paul's third missionary journey is told in chapter xviii. 23 to xxi. 15. It commenced at Antioch, but terminated at Jerusalem, where he was arrested. He was away about four years, three years of which were spent at Ephesus (xx. 31).

Ephesus was the chief city of Asia Minor. It stood on the coast of the Icarian Sea, an arm of the Ægean. It was called one of the eyes of Asia; and was an important centre of trade in the East. It was inhabited by Greeks; but there were some Jews also who possessed their own synagogue (8). It was governed under Rome as a "free city," having its own magistrates. The work of Christ was commenced there during Paul's previous visit (xviii. 19).

PAUL AND THE TWELVE DISCIPLES (1-7). They were probably the result of the work of Apollos before he was instructed by Aquila and Priscilla. Defective teaching is sure to leave its impression on the taught. But they were not wilfully rejecting truth; hence are called "disciples" (1). The question of Paul (2), as in our version, conveys a wrong impression. It is a mistake to regard the reception of the Holy Ghost as being of necessity subsequent to believing. In the Rev. Ver. the question is, "Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed?" For the Scriptural teaching is that the two should be inseparable. See Acts ii. 38. The fact that Paul asks the question suggests that he noticed some defect in their character or service. Wherever there is an absence of spiritual joy, of deliverance from the power of sin and the world, of liberty in the service of God, there Paul would perceive the same lack. The answer of these twelve should be read in the Rev. Ver. (2). They could not be acquainted with the Old Testament without knowing that there was a Holy Ghost, for he is frequently mentioned there. Nor could they know the preaching of John the Baptist without knowing something of the promised Baptism with the Holy Ghost and with fire. But they did not know that the Spirit was given. After their baptism by Paul they received the Holy Ghost through the laying on of the apostle's hands (6), and began at once to exercise some of his extraordinary gifts.

This incident teaches that we may be disciples, yet defective; that defective teaching will result in defective life; that it is possible to live in this dispensation of the Spirit without knowing what his fulness means; and that when the mind is instructed concerning the Spirit the heart needs to yield to it.

PAUL IN THE SYNAGOGUE (8, 9). He did not turn from the Jews until they had persistently rejected his testimony concerning Christ. (1) The earnestness of his effort. He continued it for three months, attempting by argument and persuasion to lead them into the kingdom of God. And he did this fearless of all consequences to himself. Knowing how the Jews had treated him elsewhere, he yet "spake boldly." May not teachers learn the lesson? (2) The result. The statement concerning some (9) is a very solemn one. They were "hardened," became less impressible, until their hearts were as adamant. This resulted from their not believing. One of these results must follow in those who hear the Word. No one can resist a good impression without being injured by it. And this led to something worse. They denounced THAT WAY (see Jno. xiv. 6) as evil; not because the Way was wrong, but because they were resolved not to tread in it. Yet, in contrast with these, some became true disciples, who not only believed, but "separated" themselves. Every Christian worker may look for these results.

There was special reason in Ephesus for the performance of miracles (11, 12). The city abounded in magicians and sorcerers, who deceived the people. Among the disciples were some who had evidently practised soothsaying, and who did not at first entirely abandon it (18). There was something "special" about Paul's miracles which the people could not fail to notice. (1) They were wrought by God. Paul was but the instrument; God was the worker. No apostle could work miracles at will. Where they were necessary, God wrought them. (2) They were special in character. Whatever article of dress was taken from the apostle's body proved effectual in doing what the pretenders to sorcery could not do (contrast 13-16). (3) They were beneficent. It was not enough to excite the wonder of the multitude. Sickness and disease and demon possession were miraculously cured. The Gospel has always cared for the sick in body, as well as for the spiritually diseased.

The story of what resulted is full of interest. The burning of the books of the sorcerers; the uproar raised by Demetrius, witness to the success of the apostle's work.

THE STORY OF FELICITÉ.*

BY MISS MARY DOUGLAS.

One morning, two years ago, in June, 1891, I was standing at the door of the Mission-room so well known by many, which belongs to Miss de Broen, in Belleville, Paris, when my attention was drawn to a pleasing young woman with her little girl, whom she was bringing to consult the doctor.

The disease from which her child was suffering was similar to that of many who have been sent to the Cripples' Home in Edinburgh, and this made me more able to sympathise with her.

I have often found that the little children in Scotland have unconsciously opened the door for me to mothers in Belleville.

My new acquaintance gave me her name and address, and then we entered the hall for the Gospel service which precedes the consultations.

Soon after, I visited her, and found her living in a narrow impasse or close; she had two small rooms. I found her in the inner one, working her sewing-machine at the window, her cripple child close to her. She gave me some details of her own childhood; her father was a fisherman of Brittany, her mother died when she was a child of eleven, and she was then taken into a convent, where she remained till she was twenty, and was very kindly treated by the superior.

She then took service in Paris, and two years after married a Belgian. She told us afterwards that at that time she did not pray herself, and her husband was opposed to religion entirely.

She very soon discovered that he was a slave to strong drink, taking "absinthe," which is the cause of great misery in many homes in Paris. Another day she told me that she had received a visit from one of Miss de Broen's evangelists, whom I had begged to call, thinking that, as he also is a native of Belgium, he might obtain easier access to her husband. She told me that when he called her husband was out, that on his return home she related what Monsieur V. had said, and how he prayed with her for the recovery of their child, to which he answered, "How could he pray, for we have no 'Christ' (—i.e. Crucifix) here?" I said, "Dear madame, you felt it was real prayer, did you not?" "Yes," she replied, with full confidence. She now took every opportunity in her power to hear the Gospel in the Iron room. Soon she had to pass through a great trial in having to part with her sweet little companion, and leave her in the Children's Hospital. She said a year afterwards, "God used the pain I suffered in parting with my darling to bring me to Himself." In the autumn of 1891 I left for Scotland, and before leaving I gave my friend a copy of the New Testament with the Psalms at the end, counselling her to study it, and telling her how she might use the Psalms as her daily book of praise and prayer.

On my return to Miss de Broen's home in Belleville, in June, 1892, I soon found my way to the house of Felicité. I was glad to find she was living in a more healthy room. I found her sadly delicate, evidently in a consumption, but struggling with great courage to work, in order to pay their rent. She had much to suffer, owing to her husband's inability to resist temptation, but she had learnt the comfort of casting him and all her care upon the Lord. God's Word had become very precious to her. I remember one day, as I was sitting with her, inquiring for herself and her child, she rose and fetched her Testament, and, putting it in my hand, asked that we might read together. She told dear Miss de Broen that I had helped her to see Jesus, and accept Him as her Saviour, by telling her that the Lord Jesus is the same to-day as yesterday, and would forgive and heal her now. We were reading a Gospel story, a miracle, I believe. I had myself been studying a valued book called "Christ's Presence in the Gospel History," by the late Rev. Hugh Martin, from which I would like to extract one sentence. "By the omnipresence of his Godhead, but especially by the sovereign and gracious presence of his Spirit, He, whose biography is now before us, is Himself with us; and the record of His doings, his life, and death, and resurrection, is no dead history, but a living biography which, like Him of whom it testifies, 'liveth and abideth for ever,' 'Lo, I am with you alway,' the very Christ—the living Saviour, still speaking to us as never man spake, still forgiving sin, and going about doing good."

Felicité told me that her husband would now allow her to read to him at mid-day out of the Testament. She would tell me little things which showed me her tenderness and refinement. I remember one day the room was rather untidy, and the bed still unmade. She pointed it out to me, and said, quite proudly, "My husband forbids me to touch it; it is too heavy for me to turn it now; he said he would make it this evening. I can't rise now to give him his coffee, but he gives me a cup at four o'clock, and he puts my Testament on my bed, saying, 'Here is your little book.'"

Felicité was much aided by a Christian widow, also a native of Brittany, who was brought up a devout member of the Church of Rome, but who, through attendance at Miss de Broen's Dispensary, heard and received the Gospel, and now adorns the doctrine of God her Saviour. The sympathy between the two women was very real. The Holy Spirit had taught Felicité wonderfully by his own Word, and she has been, I know, a blessing to many, especially to one whom I met at her house, an elderly woman who had been very industrious and independent, but who is now becoming gradually blind, and is in great poverty. When I first met her, she was very bitter, thinking that God was hard and unjust to her. I was told that her son often feared she would commit suicide, sadly common in Paris among those who have no faith. She afterwards told me that Felicité had once entered her room, and discovered that she was preparing to take away her life, that she had charged her with the terrible sin she was about to commit, had spoken with great earnestness, and then burst into tears. She said "She led me to put my trust in God, and now when I am tempted I kneel down there, and give myself to Him, and he is taking charge of me, a poor, blind woman. She made me come to her house, and read to me out of her little book, and often made me share their dinner.

For a short time Felicité seemed to rally. One day I was surprised to see her in the Ouvroir sewing busily; she only came to show her gratitude, but refusing to receive the bread ticket. She wished to attend our meetings, but I feared the steep hill for her weak chest, and advised her to go to the church of a good pastor, whose church is in her own street. She made his acquaintance, and he visited and helped and comforted her, and afterwards, at her funeral, at which I was present, gave his testimony to the assurance of her faith, saying also that he had seldom seen anyone who had made such rapid steps in the Christian life. No doubt the Lord was ripening her quickly for his immediate presence, though we would have wished to keep her among us to be a light to many around who are without God and without hope. When too ill to remain in her own house, she was taken to the hospital of St. Antoine. I visited her there, and once took her blind friend with me. She spoke to me of a young neighbour to whom she had read the Testament, but who she feared was quite indifferent. She said she longed for her conversion; she said this in a sad tone of voice, when her old friend looked up as if to encourage her saying, "But you know He has brought me back. Faint not, only believe."

The overcrowded ward at St. Antoine was a sad place, and we saw that her time on earth could not be much longer.

Miss de Broen kindly made arrangements for her being received into the Deaconess Hospital, and there she was nursed with Christian love during the last four weeks of her earthly life. She was taken home on March 20, 1893, aged twenty-nine. The news of her departure was sent to me in these words. "She fell asleep without pain. Her last words were, 'May Thy will be done.' Till the end she did not cease to be a source of edification to those around her, by her peace and faith." She told the lady who was much with her in the hospital, that she had heard the Gospel in the Iron-room, that when she felt herself ill, and had to part with her loved child, in her double distress she turned to God. She felt she was a sinner who needed pardon. Soon after arriving at the Deaconess Hospital, she said, "Do they not read the Bible aloud here?" She was shown the text painted on the wall: "It is good for me that I have been afflicted" (Ps. cxix. 71). She said, "Yes, without that I would not have known God." She was never heard to complain. Her child was brought by her husband to see her; she is just four. She said, "Formerly the thought of dying and leaving my child terrified me, but now I have trusted her to the Lord." She said once, when suffering much, "It is sweet to know Jesus and to do his will. 'The good Shepherd will come and take his poor sheep which He has long sought.' Jesus says, 'I will not leave you' (John xiv. 18). How good our Lord is to call us his children, we who are sinners. I never can thank God enough for all that He has done for me." She desired that her child should be brought up as a Protestant. She asked that her sister-in-law should receive a New Testament. She had only had one herself for eighteen months. She said, "Write in it: 'What ye ask in my name He will give it you' (John xvi. 23), and 'I cried unto the Lord and He heard me'" (Ps. iii. 4). She much enjoyed the hymns beginning, "Béni soit le jour où j'ai fait choix de Jésus pour maître," &c., and "Pour moi, chrétien, la terre est un exil, Mais tout est bien! Mais tout est bien!"

She desired that her New Testament should be given to her husband, and she begged her nurse to gum into the Book the letter which she had written to him, saying, "Will you add some verses from the Bible about trust in God?" These were chosen: Ps. xiii. 5, "I have trusted in Thy mercy." Ps. lxxxiv. 12 "Blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee." Prov. iii. 5, "Trust in the Lord with all thy heart."

This is a translation of her letter:

"My dear husband,—I desire to tell you, in the hope of soon leaving this world, how happy I am, and the full and perfect peace which I have found in God. I have known Him, and I commit myself entirely to his will, for He knows what I need. Know, my loved one, that before leaving you I desire that you may trust Him as I have done.

"I have prayed for you, I have prayed in faith, and certainly God has heard me.

"I have asked the Lord to make Himself known to you, as well as to our dear child. I commit her entirely to Him; He will keep her. Yes, He will keep you, He will pour out his blessing on you.

"Be a good father for our dear child; watch over her, and do not follow your companions who may entice into evil.

"Know that these are the last wishes of your loved wife. Receive the blessing of God and mine. I have not been able to write with my own hand, having delayed a little too long, but I have dictated these lines. Adieu, my darling. Come and meet me in heaven. 'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life' (John vi. 37-40).

"(Signed) Felicité."

Now my narrative of my dear friend is finished, but I know her work in Belleville for her Master is not ended.

She did not know, as I do, that she had sown much precious seed during her short Christian life, which will assuredly spring up and bear much fruit. We are looking for it with confidence.

BERLIN EVANGELICAL MISSION.

Mr. Rohrbach's twelfth report tells how he was led to begin work in Berlin, how God gave blessing, and how the mission has gone during the past year in Moabit, Charlottenburg, and Potsdam. The report says:—"Ever since its opening our large Gospel hall in Charlottenburg has been a well-known centre of far-reaching missionary activity, standing in the midst of a dense population, most of whom live in utter indifference to eternal realities; many have joined the ranks of Social Democracy, with its open denial of the very existence of God or the life to come, whilst many others are being led away by Romanism into dead forms and empty ceremonies. We rejoice the more that every Sunday evening, and several times during the week, the Gospel of the grace of God is being preached, simply and faithfully; meetings for prayer and the study of the Word of God are being held regularly; whilst many children attend Sunday school. Lectures are being delivered to increase and deepen interest in mission work abroad, and temperance work has been started by the well-known Col. von Knobelsdorff.

"From Moabit and Charlottenburg the work spread to Potsdam, the royal city, where the Emperor resides during the greater part of the year. One of our brethren and his wife, who had been brought to the Lord in Moabit, moved to Potsdam, opened their house to friends for Bible study; people came to see and hear, the Spirit of God convicted and converted sinners, a Sunday school was added, and a plain suitable hall, formerly a dancing saloon, has been secured for Gospel work. Besides these three mission centres, we have during the past ten years much assisted Fraülein von Blücher in her noble work for the Lord in the west of Berlin. The address is Julius Rohrbach, 28, Krumme Strasse, Charlottenburg, near Berlin.

REV. J. H. RIGG, D.D.,

EX-PRESIDENT OF THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

THE re-election of a Wesleyan minister to the Presidency of its Conference is now so rare an occurrence that the man who attains to this dignity must have claims of no ordinary kind upon the confidence and gratitude of his brethren. That Dr. Rigg, who retired from the Presidential chair for the second time on Tuesday last, has such claims, no one who carefully studies the history of the Methodist Church during the last forty years, will for a moment question.

One of the historic buildings of Newcastle-on-Tyne is the "Old Orphan House," the foundation-stones of which were laid by John Wesley in 1742. In this building, in the year 1821, Dr. Rigg was born; he is, therefore, in his seventy-second year. His father, Rev. John Rigg, was a Wesleyan minister, a man of a beautiful spirit, and greatly beloved by his brethren. His mother, a Miss M'Mullen, the daughter of a Wesleyan minister, was left an orphan at a very early age. She became the ward, first of Dr. Coke, and then of Dr. Adam Clarke, in whose family she was brought up.

The subject of this sketch was educated at Old Kingswood School, and afterwards became one of its masters. Then came two years of teaching at Mr. Conquest's school at Biggleswade, and in 1845 he entered the Wesleyan ministry. Before the usual four years' probation had ended, Dr. Rigg was in the thick of the controversy which raged around the famous "Fly Sheets." He gave himself so fully to the study of Methodist polity in particular, and to the general question of the various forms of Church government, that upon him devolved the task of defending his Church from these attacks from without as well as from within. Dr. Gregory, the late venerable Connexional Editor, said of Dr. Rigg: "Not one of all the sons the Methodist Church has brought forth and brought up, has so stoutly stood in the gap made in her walls by insurgents from with- and assailants from without. For this high service he was especially raised up, and equipped by Providence, by nature, and by grace." In 1850 Dr. Rigg's health broke down, and for eighteen months he gave up preaching. During this period of comparative leisure he published a book which has been enlarged and brought up to date, under the title of "The Connexional Economy of Wesleyan Methodism in its Ecclesiastical and Spiritual Aspects."

Dr. Rigg was married in 1851, to Miss Caroline Smith, of Worcester, a lady "possessed of graces of mind and person which drew all hearts to her, made her a favourite wherever she went, kept her husband her lover to the end of their life together, and made her her children's ideal of true and gracious and refined womanliness."

Two pleasant and fruitful years at Guernsey were followed by an appointment to the Hammersmith Circuit. It was here that the London Quarterly Review was established. Dr. Rigg was first assistant-editor, then co-editor with Dr. Pope; then he accepted and retains an editorship which has been a distinguished success. The review of Maurice's Essays in this Quarterly made Dr. Rigg's reputation outside the Methodist Church, and placed him in the front rank of critics. These studies were published in 1859, under the title "Modern Anglican Theology"; a third edition, including some chapters on Kingsley, was published in 1879. Bishop Ellicott, addressing a meeting held in the Earl of Aberdeen's house in Grosvenor Square, spoke of the profound impression made on him by these masterly critiques.

Among other valuable contributions to literature we may mention Dr. Rigg's "Essays for the Times on Ecclesiastical and Social subjects;" "Discourses and Addresses on the leading truths of religion and philosophy;" "The Living Wesley, as he was in his Youth and in his Prime," a book which in its latest edition is spoken of as "a singularly luminous sketch of the great evangelist's character and position." Dr. Rigg's "Churchmanship of John Wesley" has been and still is of immense value in meeting the insidious attacks made on Methodism by leaders of the High Anglican school. The article on Methodism in the new edition of the "Encylopædia Britannica" is also from the pen of Dr. Rigg.

After labouring in Stockport and Manchester, Dr. Rigg was obliged, in consequence of the delicate state of his wife's health, to seek a sphere of labour in the South. Three bright and happy years were spent at Folkestone. While here Dr. Rigg was elected to the chairmanship of the Kent district, and in 1866 he became a member of the Legal Conference. After a year at Tottenham, he was called to a position which he has now occupied for twenty-five years, viz., Principal of the Westminster Training College for Day-school Teachers. On the first London School Board, he represented Westminster for six years, and took a prominent part in shaping the policy of that body. In 1886-1888, he was a member of the Royal Commission on Elementary Education. All the phases of this subject he so completely mastered as to win a high reputation as an educational expert. Many of the best day-school teachers in the country have been trained at Westminster, which under Dr. Rigg's fostering care now ranks among the finest normal institutions of the country.

In 1878, Dr. Rigg was first chosen President of the Wesleyan Conference. His year of presidency was memorable for the admission of laymen into the Conference, a departure in which he took a very prominent part—and for the raising of over £300,000 by means of the Thanksgiving Fund.

His chairmanship of the Second London District has been marked by a sympathy with and interest in the work of that district which has borne the most abundant fruit. This has been specially true of those weaker places which stood the most in need of encouragement.

No one has advocated more powerfully or welcomed more warmly than Dr. Rigg those modifications of Church government and methods of work which promised to bring the Methodist Church into more perfect harmony with changed conditions of life and work, and so to secure for her a firmer hold on the intelligent sympathy of the people. More than thirty years ago he advocated the repeal of that restriction which made it impossible for any minister to remain in the same town for a longer period than six years. His efforts at that time proved fruitless: but the change has quite recently been made. So long ago as 1847 he came to the conclusion that in the case of ministers who had important matters in hand in the circuits over which they had charge, a prolongation of their ministry until they were able to complete such important work would sometimes be a great advantage.

It is scarcely necessary to refer to Dr. Rigg's debating powers. His influence in the counsels of his Church is very great. His preaching is expository, and displays much spiritual insight and power to apply the truth to the necessities of nineteenth century life. There is in him a striking combination of strength and gentleness. Mrs. Rigg died in 1889, after many years of suffering, during which the tenderness, patience, and thoughtfulness of her husband were beautifully and strikingly illustrated. Few know, but Dr. Rigg's most intimate friends, how much of kindliness and sympathy there is in that nature that seems sometimes so gigantic in its strength.

The following words from the address in which Dr. Rigg acknowledged the honour which his brethren conferred upon him last year reveal such a conception of a Christian minister's duties and responsibilities as are worthy of record. "Souls are the burden continually of our care, and should be continually in our thoughts and in our prayers. Whatever allowances we may make for circumstances, our ministry, as it is now being enacted, is not as it ought to be—the history of triumphing in Christ Jesus. What we all need is not the spurt of a momentary emotion, nor the enthusiasm of the hour of prayer, but such a permanent consecration as lives through all weeks, gives character to every hour, and makes us, wherever we are, consecrated men of God, our speech and our lives continually bearing witness to the eternal truths, of which God has put us in charge."

A Concordance in Bengali.

The Christian Literature Society, which, some years ago, published a Concordance in the Tamil language for the Madras Christians, has now decided to publish one in Bengali. The request came from missionaries of all societies labouring in Bengal. One of the Calcutta missionaries, Rev. Mr. Phillips, has devoted his spare hours for years to the preparation of a Concordance of the New Testament, which is admitted by all the committees which have examined it to be an able and accurate work, of the highest value for Bengali Christians.

The claims of the Christians of Bengal are very strong. They live in the midst of some seventy millions of the most highly-educated Hindus and Mohammedans in India, and much of the success of the Gospel in that great province depends on their intelligent and consistent work and teaching.

It will cost about £100 to bring out an edition which can be sold at a price within the limited means of the native Christians. One lady, on hearing of the efforts of the Christian Literature Society to provide this needful help for Bible study, sent £3, expressing the hope that others would make similar gifts. The secretary of the Society is Rev. James Johnston, 7, Adam Street, Strand.

THE WILLIAM TYNDALE BIBLE CARRIAGE, connected with the Christian Colportage Association, has made a brief stay at Taunton. Rev. Levi Palmer writes: "It is an effective means of evangelising rural districts during the summer months. It is manned by two powerful speakers, who, with trumpet-toned voices, can preach the Gospel in the vernacular of the common people. These consecrated workers are Messrs. J. Parsons and J. Niven. All sections of society have lingered to hear, and some of the most careless have been impressed. The local authorities having refused an application for permission to stand in the market, the only alternative was to traverse the whole town with the carriage and hold short service at intervals. In this way about six services were held each night, and thousands during the week came beneath the sound of the Gospel. The carriage is now en route for Barnstaple, and will spend six weeks in Ilfracombe."

COLPORTEUR EVANGELISTS FOR ALGERIA.

Our hearts were set on returning to our much-loved work amongst the Kabyles, but having had some difficulties with the authorities through false representations of the Roman Catholic clergy, and as my name had been prominent, we feared our presence in Algeria might compromise the work of the North Africa Mission and the efforts of our dear brother, Mr. Glenny, its hon. sec. We have asked the advice of two or three competent men, and they say, "By no means go, but leave things as they are at present," and this will explain our change of purpose, and our presence in this interesting city.

Several years back we came to Geneva to plead with the Société Évangélique de Genève for evangelist colporteurs to be sent to Algeria, and they sent out two devoted young Frenchmen who had been in the revival at Vabre, in the Tarn. Their labours have been appreciated and much blessed. We are here again with the same plea, that the Society may send more, for French or Swiss would be tolerated by the authorities, and they may be found; but the present pecuniary position of the Geneva Society will not allow them to enlarge, as they have a debt of £1000. But they would gladly do so, were the means sent in for the special object.

For a small sum, say £50, a colporteur-evangelist could be sustained, excluding the months of great heat. How happy it would make anyone having the means, to have his or her own representative in this needy field; it is desirable for some to go at once, in the beginning of October. It would be difficult to describe the increasingly demoralised condition of the 300 villages of French colonists of Algeria. With none to care for their souls, they are drifting into utter indifference and infidelity, and many, in fact, are a scandal to the Kabyles and Arabs around them; and such an agency as I have pointed out, so simple and inexpensive, would meet their case. My wife and myself have been eye-witnesses of the deplorable and lost condition of these dear people. With the view of furthering this object we have come here into this, as the Germans call it, Welthistorische Republik, and were in time for the sixty-second annual assembly of the S. E. G.; many delegates were present, and through the courtesy of the president, Count St. George, I was permitted to advocate the claims of these benighted colonists of Algeria.

How glad I was to be amongst these dear Geneva friends! I have known and highly esteemed and loved their work for half-a-century, and the names of the first founders of the S.E.G.—Gaussen, Merle-d'Aubigné, Vaucher, Col. Tronchin, are fragrant with the odour of Christ. They took their stand on the great foundation truths of Evangelical Christianity, and that standard is still maintained in the present day of declension. Sixty-six students, including twenty-five preparatory students, were trained last year in their school of theology. Four earnest speakers in the public meeting afforded good specimens of the men who had issued from this training ground. Thirteen pastors and evangelists and sixty-nine colporteurs are at work in forty-six of the departments of France, two of the latter in Algeria.

In this, as with most other evangelical agencies, the Lord is trying the faith of his servants, and they have lessons to learn in the diminution of their resources. Oh, let us learn what these lessons are! As I sit writing this, I have sweeping before me the beautiful blue and foaming waters of the Rhône, an emblem of the rich and abundant resources of our living risen Head, poured forth to faith. This river, taking its rise in the heights of the Galenstock, soon becomes a mighty river flowing through 500 miles, and is at last lost in the Mediterranean. It appears to be lost some time in a cleft of the rock, when the river is low, at the Perte du Rhone, near Collonges, but it soon emerges, and pursues its beneficent course to its destination. This affords a striking illustration of the circumstances at present of God's servants. The waters of supply may be hidden and seem to fail, but they are only hidden in a cleft of the rock for a time, and will soon burst forth again in blessing.

If the Lord has called his servants into the harvest, He will certainly supply their need, whatever that need may be, and He Himself will be with them always, with blessings in both hands for them. Let our eyes, then, be unto the hills (those Alpine heights), whence our help cometh.

May I be permitted to say, that if any friends are disposed to help forward this work of colportage and evangelisation in Algeria, they may address their communications to me at the Oratoire, Geneva, care of Secretary of the Société Évangélique de Genève, as I am now a resident in Geneva.—Yours affectionately in Christ,

Geneva, July 7. George Pearse.

SUMMER THOUGHTS OF SERVICE.

The Father's will I see
In all that He has made,
The wind that moves a thousand leaves
To fan the languid glade;
The tireless sea that lifts
Its myriad-fingered hand
To stroke, with strong yet tender touch,
The faint and fevered land;

The sun that deftly weaves
A veil of mist to wear,
Then smiles in such mild radiance through,
As weakest eyes can bear,
Yea, rest in and grow strong,
Light's pure nepenthe poured
On wearied nerves, till life exults
In life's full tone restored.

I see it in white rocks
Whereon brown seaweeds grow,
Weeds which the sea's soft silver scythe,
Oft crossing, fails to mow.
Rocks that withdraw themselves
From sight 'neath the green wave,
To shed, when bared, the fragrance forth
The balmy waters gave.

The Father's will I see;
Oh, that the breath Divine,
That moves ten thousand lives like leaves,
Might ceaselessly move mine
In ministry of grace
Earth's myriad wants among,
That all adown sin's shadowy glade
God's love-song might be sung!

A finger might I be—
Bejewelled not nor fair—
Of that great Hand that, tireless, seeks
To soothe souls everywhere;
A veil through which God's face
Might shine in softened ray,
Till unaccustomed eyes grow strong
To wish all veils away!

Ah that, like those white rocks—
Sea-cleansed, sea-clothèd too—
I might dwell deep in Christ my God,
Secluded all from view;
Emerging thence anon
Only as He might will,
And then so clothed in his blest grace
As to be hidden still!

A KENTISH VILLAGE MISSION is being formed to carry the Gospel into every village and hamlet within the county. It is intended that every village in the county will be visited to search out its need. The amount of spiritual destitution, apathy, and ignorance in many villages is appalling. The means to be used are—open-air services, tent services, meetings to be held in cottages, rooms, barns, mission halls, or any other available places; on Sabbath and week days, or both; house-to-house visitation, with persistent invitation to attend the services; and the judicious distribution of good and sound literature. Full information may be had of Mr. J. G. Dixon, "Maycot," Bexley, Kent.

AMONG AINUS OF JAPAN.

Rev. John Batchelor, writing from Sapporo, Japan, says:—

"Last Sunday I had the extreme pleasure of admitting one more Ainu to the communion of the Church of Christ by baptism. She is a girl, aged thirteen. It is a true happiness and great honour to be so permitted to see the fruits of one's labours gradually gathered in, and encourages us greatly. Before the baptism took place I experienced the same sort of difficulty with regard to the choice of a suitable name for her that I have several times before. The Ainus have so many superstitions and curious customs connected with this subject, that the choosing of a fitting name for a person is quite a formidable task. No one may be called by the name of a person who has passed away. When anyone dies, his or her name must die also! Should the name of a dead person be applied to a boy or girl it is supposed that it will grieve the soul of the departed and be likely to call forth his or her displeasure. Not only so, but according to the Ainus it is far better not to revive the name of the dead, because one would be thereby reminded of death itself, and this is a thing of which the Ainus are in constant dread.

"It will easily be seen, therefore, that there must always be a great dearth of Ainu proper names, and that naming a person is a source of great difficulty. Names in themselves are supposed by the Ainu to be lucky or unlucky, and to bring fortune or misfortune on a person, as the case may be. The people appear to invest them with power for good or evil, so superstitious are they. In short, the Ainus live in with regard to this as well as other subjects. Thus, a child is of a weakly disposition, and is consequently always ailing: this is often thought to be because the name is an unfortunate one. It has, therefore, to be changed! I have repeatedly been asked to name or re-name persons, varying in age from four to eighteen for this very reason. I have mentioned already that a person must not be called after his or her ancestors or deceased relations; in the same way, he must not take the name of his living neighbours. Should such a thing be done, it would be looked upon as a kind of theft and treated accordingly. This fact probably arose from the idea that names bring good or evil, and a person needs all the good his name can bring, and does not care to have it divided up with another. In trying to find the name of a person, I have several times been asked not to use such and such a name, because someone else at another village has one which sounds very like it.

"Again, the name must have a good sound and meaning. That seems reasonable enough. In choosing a name for the person I lately baptized, I suggested several before I could hit upon the right one. Thus, Rhoda would not do at all, because the first syllable sounded too much like the Japanese word 'ro,' a 'prison,' and is a word often used by the Ainus for 'prison,' so that Rhoda or Rota would mean, as the Ainus use it, 'to be in prison.' It was not the slightest use telling them that the Scripture word Rhoda had another meaning. A name with such a sound could not possibly do. I next mentioned Sarah at a venture. But even that would not do by any means; it sounded too much like the Ainu word 'sara,' which is the word for an animal's 'tail.' Having tried Eunice and Rebecca, in sheer desperation

I COINED A NAME ON THE SPOT.

It was 'Tom-un-mat,' and that means 'the shining female.' To my surprise all parties were highly delighted with it, and so she was named by it. After this I intend to devote some little time in thinking out and coining Ainu names, for the naming of the people constitutes a real difficulty, so many knotty points have to be avoided, and delicate and perplexing crochets humoured. God grant that 'Tom-un-mat,' 'the shining female' or 'girl,' may indeed henceforth shine to the glory of her Saviour, and be a bright jewel in his crown.

"Our 'Ainu Hospital Rest House' is now being made use of by the Ainus. One poor consumptive woman entered at the end of December, four other persons came to us last month, and one more we are expecting to-day. I go to preach and talk to them every day. We have been taking the first chapters of Genesis, and have had many very interesting talks about the Creation. The Ainus ask all kinds of funny questions, and tell me some very curious things. On one occasion a man asked me whether my books said anything about the sun having once, for a long period of years, risen in the west and set in the east! Upon inquiring why he put such a peculiar question, he replied at follows:—'It has been handed down to us by our remote ancestors that when the world was brought forth in the beginning, the quarter now called east was named west, and the west designated east. This was so because, at the beginning of time, the sun used to rise in the west and set in the east. But for some unknown cause God saw fit to change this order of things, and to make the sun to rise and set in the quarters it now does. When this took place, the Ainus were, therefore, obliged to transpose the names east and west, for those designations would not apply under the altered conditions, because chup-ka (east) means the kindling of the luminary; and chup-pok (west) means the going under of the luminary. Do not your books tell you anything of this?' Such was the question of an old Ainu, who is known to be a man well versed in the law of the ancients. The old man who asked this question and repeated the legend to me appeared to be quite disappointed to hear that the Bible told us nothing about

THE SUN HAVING ONCE RISEN IN THE WEST!

But I tried to show him that that precious Book told us of far more important things, and that it was sent to teach us of God, instruct us in the practice of an upright life, and to show us the Way, the Truth, and the Life, rather than answer every funny question as to the mechanism of the world, the laws of Nature, and anomalies in Nature which might arise in the mind of man.

"While talking to some people about the fall of man the other day, the mention of the serpent caused great uneasiness. This circumstance reminded me that I had, among other notes which I set down at odd times, a short one as follows:—'Nothing exercises so much power over the Ainus as their superstitions, nor is there anything, leaving out drunkenness, of course, which gives me so much trouble in my work among them. One is ever obliged to be on the alert lest he should inadvertently touch the people on some delicate point upon which they are superstitious, and in that way give offence.' I have several times caused a murmur to run through an audience by saying sometimes things opposed to Ainu superstitions, where I last expected them to lurk. It was in fact some little time before I could accustom my congregation, small though it is, to hearing the word 'serpent,' and from this circumstance, coupled with previous experience, I have learned when addressing the heathen not to choose at first such a text as John iii. 14, 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up.' Such a text can only be acceptably quoted after the way has been well prepared. The Ainus hold the serpent or, for the matter of that, snakes of any description, in peculiar dread. They look upon them as demons. They consider them to have power to possess people, and to be is said to be the same as to be possessed by the devil. My difficulty will hence be understood. We cannot, of course, say how the Ainus came first to be so superstitious about the serpent. It may be that they have some tradition of the part it played in the fall.

"I have lately returned from a visit to Usu, and other places. There seems to be just now a great stirring of the dead dry bones in every village where the Gospel has been preached. The Ainu church, which numbered but nine at the beginning of the year, has now a membership of eighteen, one having died last month. Thus the church has already doubled itself this year, and we fully expect it to again double itself before the year is out. We went forward in faith, we expected a blessing, and we have got it; to God be all the praise and glory. The spirit of inquiry now showing itself among the people, especially among the women, who never pray or have any religion, is beyond all measure startling. One longs to be more able to supply their spirit's craving and to point more of them to the Saviour.

"A great calamity has now overtaken us. The Roman Catholics are on our track at last. Two of the French priests have been studying Ainu for some time, and can now speak a little. That is the way with them and their work. We Protestants go on working hard and preparing the way by preaching, reducing languages to writing, compiling dictionaries and preparing books; then, just when the heavenly blessing seems about to fall, we discover that we have been watched by the Roman Catholics; and our work, yes, and our name too, made use of by them for their own ends."

Miss Andrews, 25, Castle-street, Hertford, will be glad to supply further information regarding Mr. Batchelor's deeply interesting work.

SALVATION ARMY ANNIVERSARY.

Exeter Hall was filled on Thursday evening by members of the Salvation Army and their supporters and friends, assembled to celebrate the twenty-eighth anniversary of the Army. Needless to say the Hall was densely crowded, and that the proceedings were marked by much enthusiasm and fervour.

General Booth said that it was just twenty-eight years ago this month, and almost to the day, that he first took his stand in Whitechapel-road and commenced the movement which had developed into a world-wide organisation. His life had been from that time given up to the business of seeking to save the souls of the people. Proceeding, he spoke of the promptings and purpose of their hearts and minds, then he referred to the ever-increasing expressions of confidence and love that came to him from his soldiers scattered over the world; and with this prelude plunged into statistics. These are his figures, in the order in which he marshalled them: In this country there are now 1203 corps, making with the outposts 1313 corps; abroad the total of corps and outposts is 3060. In this country there are 4466 officers entirely separated from ordinary pursuits, and abroad the number of separated officers is 6383. Thus, he paused to remark, there are now 10,849 men and women devoting the whole of their energies to Salvation Army work. In this country there are 234 institutions in existence in connection with the Army's social operations, and they are controlled by 875 officers. Of social work abroad he could say little—the statistics not being accessible to him—save that it is much more extensive than the social work at home. One figure, and one figure alone, he was able to communicate on the subject. During the past year £53,000 was expended on social work abroad. "There never was a time," he went on to say, "when our hearts were more completely united, and when the soldiers of the Army were more thoroughly at one, than at the present moment"—an announcement that provoked a storm of applause. Nor was there ever a time, he thought, when there was a greater need for service and sacrifice and loyalty to Christ. Everywhere men and women were cold, lukewarm, and worldly, regarding religion "as little more than theological belief or humanitarian sympathy." The world stood in need of those who were willing to sacrifice all, and fight against sin and the devil, and, if need be, die in the conflict.

Commissioner Railton followed, speaking of the progress made in Germany. During the three years he had been there many thousands had been to the penitent form, and the newspapers, although not over-friendly, estimated 40,000 as the number of the Army in that country.

Commissioner Ballington Booth, speaking of the Army in America, said that things had greatly changed in their favour. The courts in eleven States had pronounced that the Army had a perfect right to march through the streets. Within the past thirteen months no less than 11,200,000 had been present at the meetings of the Army, and 42,000 had knelt at the penitent form.

Ratna Pala having sung a solo in Hindoo and testified to his being saved, Mrs. Ballington Booth, two female officers who were going to India, Ensign and Mrs. Booth (who were appointed to go to Africa), and others addressed the meeting, which was closed by prayer for those about to start for the foreign field.

BLIND IN CAWNPORE.—Miss G. R. Ward writes:—A new Christian teacher brought her mother to see me. She was an old blind woman, but a dear old Christian. To my surprise she told me she could read; that a missionary's wife taught her long ago. As we have two or three blind children in our schools, I asked her if she would teach them to read. So, if the Lord opens the way, we shall gather a class of blind people for her to teach, so that they too can read the Bible which she loves. God has manifested Himself very preciously to her, and she spoke of his love with a full heart. It has done me good to see and talk with her. Oh, for more like her!

ALDERSGATE STREET NOON PRAYER MEETING.

This daily meeting continues to be a centre of great interest. On a recent occasion Mr. M. H. Hodder gave an account of a three months' trip in America, from which he has just returned. His outward passage on the Umbria was the roughest and most unpleasant ever experienced in his frequent crossings. He was thrown down by a heavy sea and badly bruised, but made a quick and complete recovery. He went first to Indianapolis, where the United States and Canadian Y.M.C. associations were in convention. The features that made most impression were a remarkable address by Rev. Dr. Munhall, and an impromptu visit of ex-President Harrison and ex-Postmaster-General Wanamaker.

Mr. Hodder spent a week in Chicago, which city he left with a sense of relief. Visiting Boston, he went to Dr. Gordon's Church, and witnessed the introduction of fifteen new members, including a child of tender years and a Chinaman. The Church of which Dr. Gordon is pastor maintains, amongst other useful agencies, a Sunday-school for Chinamen, with 150 in attendance.

Philadelphia was also visited. The most striking feature was Bethany Sunday-shool, which continues its most successful work, 800 adults attending Mr. Wanamaker's Bible-class. One Sunday, in a large church in this city, Mr. Hodder was somewhat surprised to hear rendered, as part of the religious exercises, the stirring patriotic song "The Star-spangled Banner."

In Philadelphia Mr. Hodder attended the Church of which Rev. Russell Conwell is minister. He was described as "A mighty orator, in the main evangelical." There is a congregation of 5000 people. The church premises are open every day. A hospital in the city is wholly sustained by this church. At the close of the evening service the pastor holds a reception. One of the incidents that came under Mr. Hodder's notice was a lad presenting his first-earned half dollar to Mr. Conwell for religious uses.

Toronto was described as three times the size it was ten years ago. In Montreal, the Y.M.C. Association is doing a good work, the secretary being "full of the Holy Ghost and possessing common-sense." In New York also the Association is doing a splendid work with Mr. Robert McBurney as secretary, equally full of life and energy.

Mr. W. R. Lane, who has also just returned from the same continent, on another day gave a brief and highly satisfactory account of his visit. Three weeks were spent in delivering two courses of lectures to the students (male and female) in Mr. Moody's Institute in Chicago. Then a fortnight at Hamilton with a friend beloved by many in England, who knew him as "Captain Moreton," now a Presbyterian minister. Thence to Stratford (Ontario), Toronto, and Montreal. Mr. Lane, since his return, has been conducting meetings at Croydon, and has now settled down again for work in England.

Rev. G. A. Ford, American Presbyterian Missionary from Beyrout, on another occasion gave some very interesting testimony of the results of Gospel work in Syria. This he did by reading a translation of a book full of notes, written by a native worker. In the course of a brief subsequent address, Mr. Ford spoke of a three-fold method of missionary development, first by means of theologically-trained ministers, which was well represented in the mission field; next, by means of medical missionaries and Christian ladies, which was in course of development; and lastly, by colonisation—Christian people foregoing the large business profits and some of the comforts of home, and going forth to settle and trade, and "live Christ" in mission countries. This method he hoped to see largely adopted in the near future.

At the same meeting Miss Fuller gave a brief testimony. She is returning to Spain after a short rest. She has already laboured there for many years. In addition to expounding the Gospel to the poor and needy, she exercises the surgical knowledge she possesses in dressing their wounds and tending them in accident and injury. One incident only she narrated. A poor woman, with a sadly mutilated hand, was so grateful for attention and kindness that on her third visit she said, "You are so kind I must kiss you." Miss Fuller gave her a Spanish New Testament. Shortly afterwards this woman told her that her son (a boy of twelve years of age) was so charmed with the little book he was loth to leave it for his meals and his bed. He often expressed to her his marvelling at the wondrous love of God. Prayer was offered that this dear lad might grow up to be a man of God, mighty in the Scriptures.

BRAZIL INLAND MISSION.

During the past two weeks I have received several letters from Brazil, and my heart is sad as I think of the state, and needs, of that dark and much-neglected land. Brother Downing, my late colleague, who was left alone to labour among the 120,000 souls in the district of Campos, writes:—"I am still suffering with fever, and gradually losing strength. We have been to Rio, and Dr. Stewart says my wife is in consumption, and cannot be cured in this hot, damp climate." In another letter of June 10 he says:—"Wife is getting worse all the time; she gets weaker each day. I have written the Board to send my relief at once, and if wife is no better I shall then take her home. You will rejoice to hear that eleven have been baptized since you left in April; but saddened to hear of the death of Antonio Assenco. He spoke with much fervour at our last week's night meeting, and died on the way home to his family. He was a faithful brother, a noble Christian, and did splendid work as a colporteur."

I cannot but think, as I hear and read of so many offering themselves for foreign mission work—why is it none are sent to Brazil? Why is it that England helps Brazil to build her railroads and ships, sends her merchandise and machinery, lends her money, keeps her markets supplied with race-horses and jockeys, but sends her no missionaries? The minutes of our Southern Baptist Convention are to hand. The statistics for Brazil are—Baptized last year, ninety-six; members, 453; contributed by native churches, 1,344,17dols. I have also received a most encouraging letter from Mr. Williams, of the Wesson Rio Harbour Mission. They have bought and fitted up a Bethel ship, and get from forty to fifty to the Sunday morning meetings on board. He gives very interesting facts concerning his work afloat and ashore.

My health is not much improved; I still get fever, and at times feel very weak. I am in the Lord's hands, waiting and praying Him to show me his will and path for my future. My address is Victoria-road, Woolston, Southampton.

MISSIONS IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

Rev. C. M. Wilbur writes from San José, Costa Rica, that in the five republics of Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Salvador, Honduras, and Guatemala there are at present labouring, so far as can be learned:

Nineteen Moravian missionaries among the Mosquito Indians in Nicaragua. No work is yet opened to over 200,000 Spanish-speaking natives in this republic.

In Costa Rica, Rev. J. H. Lobey, of the Jamaica Baptist Missionary Union, has been labouring at Port Limon for five years, and as a result a church numbering seventy-two Jamaicans has been gathered, a station opened among the East Indian coolies on the sea beach, and much evangelistic work pushed along the line of the Costa Rican Railway. Two years ago, Rev. W. W. McConnell and his wife were sent out by the Central American Mission of Dallas, Tex., to the Spanish-speaking natives of Costa Rica. They were joined in February of this year by Rev. C. M. Wilbur and his wife, and Miss Margaret Neely. Meetings in Spanish have been held for over three months, and the Master's seal of approval has been placed on the mission by the salvation of some. Messrs. Norwood and Penzotti, sent out by the American Bible Society, are now making a tour of the republics, and in Costa Rica sold over 2000 copies of Bibles, Testaments, and Gospels. Surely this Word of the living God will be an open door to future evangelistic effort.

In Salvador, with over 700,000 natives speaking Spanish, midnight gloom is unbroken, there being no voice crying to the wicked and idolatrous to receive the Gospel. In Guatemala, with over 1,500,000, only two missionaries are labouring—Messrs. T. Iddings and John Haymaker in Guatemala City. In Honduras all is dark; no ray of light to be seen by 250,000 of people. The secretary of the Central American Mission is Rev. C. T. Scofield, Dallas, Tex.

MANCHESTER REFUGES.

In the winter of 1869, while a ragged school in Manchester was being dismissed, three or four of the scholars failed to display the usual sprightliness of boys in getting out into the street. Indeed, they proffered the unusual request that they might remain a little longer. "Had you not better go home at once?" was the reply. And slowly, by question and answer, it was discovered that the boys had no home to go to. The teacher was a man full of compassion for poor children, and with a mind full of resource in devising means for helping them, Mr. Leonard K. Shaw rallied his friends round him, and was soon enabled to open a night shelter for homeless lads, the need for which, now that his attention was aroused, became more and more apparent.

The seed thus sown, nurtured with sympathy and watered by prayer, has grown up an overspreading tree, a noble object in the City of Manchester, under which thousands of homeless and destitute children have been trained for, and ushered into, useful lives. It is no light matter to take the place of parent even to one neglected child; what then must it have cost Mr. Shaw and his helpers last year in thoughtful effort in dealing with over 2000 of Manchester waifs and strays? That so many should be found among the social wreckage of a great city, is a terrible comment on the condition of life led by its inhabitants. To neglect these children would be to imperil the safety of the State; each of them might grow up and form a new seed-bed of immorality and crime. If the Christian men and women of Manchester were to shirk their responsibility to these neglected children—the children of their own gutters, they would themselves supply the strongest proof that the Christianity they professed was worthless.

But Mr. Shaw and his friends include within the scope of their operations not only the parental duties to children that are absolutely homeless, they have largely constituted themselves the guardians of many others who need a helping hand. They undertake duties which in other cities are often divided among half-a-dozen different societies. For many years they have carried on the work of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Last year they had cases involving the welfare of 1324 children. Not the least important of their operations is the Prison Gate Mission. Over 9000 discharged prisoners accepted their kindly offices last year. The Police-court Mission renders invaluable aid to lads and girls who are daily brought before the magistrates. Their day nursery opened its doors throughout the year to 3300 babies. Three hundred and sixty-eight little wandering children received all attention at the open-all-night shelter.

A thousand children of the city were sent down to the seaside for a fortnight's holiday. A home is carried on for crippled and incurable children, in which at present forty little sufferers are lovingly cared for; while for eighty stout-limbed lads and lassies, for whom new surroundings and a new country were desirable, homes were found in Canada. A more beneficent cluster of operations could hardly be found under the management of one general committee, and Manchester is to be congratulated on the financial economy which such a grouping secures. No less than £4,000 were spent last year in structural additions, and it cost a round thousand pounds each month to meet all the expenses of these widespread beneficent and remedial operations. It would be hardly fair to make mention of a deficit balance in the year's accounts. That, doubtless, has been more than covered already by the Christian generosity of the city of which Mr. L. Shaw is so valuable a citizen.

The annual report may be had on application at the Boys' and Girls' Refuges, Strangeways, Manchester.

GREEN PASTURES.—In our common life in this world, if we are faithfully following Christ, we are continually in fields of rich pasture (John x. 9). Christ never leads us into any places in which there is nothing to feed us. Even in the hot plains of trial and sorrow there is food. We sometimes think there is only barrenness in our toilsome life, filled with temptations, cares, and sacrifices; but the Good Shepherd is ever with us, and there is always pasture. If any Christians are not well fed, it is because they will not feed. The trouble must be that they do not hunger for spiritual food.—Dr. J. R. Miller.

African Missions Visited.—7.

By D. A. HUNTER.

In the Lovedale Institution the year is divided into two sessions, one running from February to June, and the other from August to December. Six weeks' holidays are given at the end of each session, when the young people are free to go home to their friends, and they carry with them in many directions, and into heathen villages, what they have been learning from day to day.

It is quite a sight, before "breaking-up day," to see natives arriving from all directions, many of them mounted on horseback and leading spare horses on which to mount the young people who return with them to their distant homes. Some have ten days or more in the saddle before they reach their own villages, and those who cannot get a mount have to trudge on foot. One good feature of native life is the hospitality these Kaffirs extend to one another while thus journeying, which renders them independent of hotels and inns, so long as a native village is within reach. On the last Sunday of each session the ordinance of the Lord's Supper is observed, and this, when I was present, was a day of good cheer to those who had been earnestly striving to lead these young people to Christ.

A number had applied for admission to Church membership, and these were carefully examined by the missionaries, assisted by a committee of older students, who are communicants of some standing. These latter come into closer relations with the applicants than can even the missionaries, and are in a position to testify as to whether their daily walk and conversation indicate a true change of heart. Twelve were admitted this time, while others were deferred until they had been proved a little longer. It thrilled one's heart to see three young Kaffirs come for baptism, thus confessing their faith in Jesus Christ, and renouncing all heathen rites and practices. After the baptismal service, the twelve candidates for the Lord's table were addressed as to the significant step they were taking, and then to each was handed a card of admission, on the back of which was written a text suited to their several cases. The right hand of fellowship was extended, and they joined in commemorating Christ's dying love "Until He come."

From Lovedale I rode over the hills some nine miles to the Wesleyan station at Healdtown, and received a warm welcome. This station is now expressly used as a training school for native teachers. Promising pupils are passed on from the outlying kraal schools, where they have received the rudiments of education, and are here taken in hand and prepared for themselves becoming teachers, evangelists, and preachers. Most of them are Fingos, a tribe formerly servants to the Kaffirs, who were loyal to Britain in the last Kaffir war, and received grants of land on which to settle, as a reward. I was particularly struck with their singing, which many a school in the homeland would find hard to beat.

Next day I rode about eighteen miles in the opposite direction, to a Free Church station called Burn's Hill, in the centre of many kraal schools and preaching stations, radiating from ten to twenty miles all around, and some 1000 children are gathered from day to day to learn the three R's, and, best of all, about Jesus. It takes the missionary nearly a month to make the tour of his out-stations, and he tells me that any earnest Christian lady or gentleman coming out and settling there as a voluntary worker could have wide scope, and wield a powerful influence for good.

POLICE SEASIDE HOME.—This new Home will be opened to-morrow at 3 p.m. in Bertram-road, West Brighton. Already in the smaller Home much good work has been done, and it has been blessed with the conversion of souls. We feel sure all who can make it convenient will gladly show interest in the work by attending the opening, and aiding as far as possible.

JEWS IN NEW YORK.—Miss Douglas, of 1, Rosebery Crescent, Edinburgh, who has been hitherto the devoted helper of Mr. Hermann Warszawiak's work among the Jews of New York, writes that he is now requiring a schoolroom for his Jewish children in that city. Scotch and American friends having furnished the greater part of the £5,000 in hand for the proposed Christian Synagogue, Miss Douglas thinks that this £400 might be raised in England.

THE SALVATION ARMY IN INDIA.

The present condition and prospects of the Indian branch of the Salvation Army may be summed up as good: never better! Reasoning from the experiences of the past twelve months we may reasonably expect to capture thousands of converts during the second year of Colonel Ruhani's (Miss Lucy Booth's) superintendence:—

The successes of the past twelve months, exceeding numerically and spiritually the combined result of the previous nine years, have been simply marvellous! In every part, our officers, giving up the comparative ease and comfort of their accustomed town life, have gone forth to isolation and hardness into the villages, "without the camp," to love, and labour, for the souls of the people, and God has honoured the bold step-out by giving them the hearts of the villagers, whom they have led by thousands to Jesus.

The proportion of declensions is very small. Some have backslidden because they had no deepness of earth, many have joined other missions, while some have gradually slipped out of our hands for the simple reason that the dearth of money to build meeting places, and men to take hold of the people, has obliged us to neglect them. It is heart-rending for those of us who direct operations from our Bombay headquarters to receive appeal after appeal for such sums as ten or twenty pounds, and be utterly unable, through poverty, to help our struggling officers in their village fight.

I have before me as I write a letter from Adjutant Yesu Ratroam (Stevens), one of our oldest and most capable Cape Comorin officers. He has worked in South India for seven years. He says: "I do somehow wish that the terrible strain for money that we always seem to live in could be avoided. I somehow fancy that if people in England knew what a wonderful Holy Ghost work was going on, and then how we are straitened and held back and lose the victory that would have been so easy if we had only the money, they would give. I almost pity the man who could see it and know it, and then not sink his every 'cash' on it."

And well he might call it a "wonderful Holy Ghost work." Our officers live amongst the pariahs and identify themselves with them in every way. The sacrifice and come-down this means to our officers, many of them high caste and delicately bred, can scarcely be realised by English people, but they do it cheerfully—nay, gladly—for Jesus. The people themselves are changed. In place of the degrading devil worship and dances we see the worship of Jesus, and that not by a despised few, but by every member of the low-caste village. The streets, once strewn with refuse and filth, are now clean, the duties of sanitary inspector falling upon our officer in charge of the village. The children attend our daily school, where, squatted round, palm-leaf and stencil in hand, they learn not only the three R's, but the Army songs, while as for the change in the men and women themselves—an officer cannot walk along the road without having to reply to the shouts of "Hallelujah" which greet him from the men and women working in the fields and on the road-side.

An experienced staff officer from Bombay headquarters, whom we sent down to inquire into one or two business affairs in the division, is tremendously impressed, as he says, with the "reality" of the work. He writes:—"There were a number of officers at headquarters whose acquaintance I was able to make at the onset. What a fine lot of Tamil officers there are in the division! Very intelligent and full of fire. I was quite taken by surprise, at a special meeting held at Tiradu last night, to see with what 'go' some of them led the meeting. There were about 1000 soldiers present, some of them in uniform jackets. I was simply charmed with the meeting; the songs were lovely, testimonies solid, prayers sincere and from the heart. It was grand to watch the upturned and sincere faces of both men and women, and also the children, during the prayer meeting. I felt that the work was real."

The work in this division was started by a "Boom March" we had in June of last year. With forty or fifty officers, we marched through the whole district, village after village receiving us, and all the people coming to Jesus for salvation. In many places we had the rare privilege of pulling down idol temples and smashing the images, with the full consent and help of the once deluded people. Many prophesied the work would be only temporary, but, as a matter of fact, it is still spreading, and villagers all round continue to send in applications for the Army to visit and save them. On the same model other Boom Marches in the Marathi country, and in the Hindi-speaking provinces of North India, have been organised with striking success.

The obstacles to our progress are many—sickness, high-caste oppression. One of our officers, Captain Manikam, has this month been sent to gaol by a Travancore magistrate for entering a caste street. Then the state of real slavery to the high-caste masters in which most of our converts live makes it unspeakably difficult for them. They are subject to many petty annoyances and persecutions.

Our people are very poor. They are outcastes, and that word means volumes. Still, out of their poverty they are trying to support their own officers. Our headquarters representative reports as follows:—

(b) Self-support. In all corps where there is a barracks, a weekly collection of Chuckrams is taken. This collection in some places amounts to as far as annas 8 and even 12. There is also a system of rice-giving in a few corps only. A small measure, made of either bamboos, basket, or earth, is placed in each soldier's house, with instructions to think of the Gurus, and pray for them, and put a couple of spoonfuls of rice into the measure at the time of cooking every day. During the week this measure gets filled up in each soldier's house, and at the end of the week the Jamadars (sergeants) go round and gather in the rice. This system brings in sufficient rice for the officers for the week.

This is splendid! That these poor people should so deny themselves, is a proof that a real work has been done in their hearts. More than this, though, they cannot do; and they look—and rightly so—to us to see that in the place of the idol temples we have destroyed we should raise up for them Salvation temples, wherein they can praise God daily.

SLAVERY IN UGANDA.

BISHOP TUCKER, writing from Mengo, Buganda, on April 7, encloses a very interesting document—nothing more nor less than a declaration signed by forty of the principal Protestant chiefs in Uganda, expressing their wish to abolish slavery; not simply slave-raiding—that was abolished by the Company's treaty with Mwanga last year—but domestic slavery.

The Bishop says:—"The history of the paper is this. Certain slaves who had been ill-treated ran away from the Mohammedans and took refuge with some of our Christian people. A demand for their surrender was made. This, however, was refused. The matter was referred to me as a question of conscience. I said that as slavery was the law of the land they were bound to deliver up those runaways, more especially when the demand was made by the Katikiro. I told them that if they thought the law a bad one, they should try to get it altered. I was then asked to tell them what I thought of slavery. I ahswered that I could only tell them what I thought was the teaching of Scripture. We met in church, and I then told them what I believed to be the Word of God on the subject. I declined to give them any advice one way or the other. I told them to go away and pray about it, and then talk it over among themselves with the Word of God in their hands. If they came to any conclusion on the subject, I should be glad to know what it was. The enclosed paper was their answer.

"I have placed the matter in the hands of Sir Gerald Portal, who will, I believe, do his utmost to further the wishes of the signatories. All depends on the action of the Roman Catholics. If they agree to the proposal, then I think there will be no difficulty whatever, and slavery would be abolished in the kingdom of Uganda. If people at home have any doubts as to the retention of this country, surely this incident will cause them to change their minds. Here is an exhibition of practical Christianity such as the world has rarely seen. Retain British influence in the country, and without question freedom will be the law of the land. Abandon it, and slavery in its most hideous forms, that under Mohammedans, will spread like a pall over the whole land."

The document, as translated, said: "All we Protestant chiefs wish to adopt these good customs of freedom. We agree to untie and free completely all our slaves. Here are our names as chiefs" (forty in number).

INDUSTRIAL ORPHANAGE FOR BOYS.

MOUNT HERMON, SYRIA.

One thousand pounds have been entrusted to me lately by two American friends for the purpose of meeting a great need. Another £1000 from the same country, though not assured, is fairly in sight, I believe. British and American Christians, after working for more than half a century in Syria and Palestine, have not made provision for an orphanage or for an industrial school for boys. All who know that country recognise the crying need and the hopelessness of expecting the natives to meet it. Is it not, then, high time we set to work to care for those many hundreds of destitute orphans, knowing, as we do, that they are the special wards of the Father of the fatherless, with special claims upon the servants of the King? And who of us but has been struck with the frequency and emphasis accorded in the Scriptures to the mention of this branch of godly service?

It is now proposed to establish, as soon as the way is open, an industrial orphanage for Syrian boys, undenominational, but thoroughly evangelical, under the management of a British or American superintendent.

The reasons for having this orphanage, the joint effort of British and American Christians, in a land where so many workers of both nationalities are uniting, are obvious.

The need and the scheme have already been endorsed by a formal vote of the American Mission there, at a recent meeting of the entire mission, held in Beirût, as well as by other missionary workers from Great Britain.

This institution, besides caring for the destitute orphans of native converts, on the principle of "doing good, especially to those of the Household of Faith," will gather in, as far as means may allow, Greek, Papal, Jewish, Druse, Moslem, and especially Bedouin orphan boys, to teach them common school branches and some form of useful manual labour, besides giving them a thorough religious training; and it must unquestionably prove, by the blessing of God, to be a powerful evangelistic agency.

To safeguard its interests and those of the contributors, it will be placed under the trusteeship of some responsible board or committee, such as the American Board of Missions in New York or the Bible Lands Missions Aid Society in London.

The present needs of the institution are: First. Earnest, believing prayer in its behalf. Second. A godly superintendent, who shall take up the work from love for it, and shall bring to it a marked love for children and an aptitude for and experience in mechanical and administrative labours. Third. Grounds, sufficient not only for the building and its yard, but also for considerable agricultural operations for the training of the boys and the supply of their table. Fourth. A building, to include dormitories, school-rooms, shops, and barn. It may be that some friends would prefer helping by sending building material, as hardware, timber, tiles, cement, glass, etc. Fifth. Furniture (the simplest, of course), and especially simple mechanical and agricultural appliances and implements, and bedding, desks, and maps or charts. The first and most important bit of machinery would be a boring apparatus for an artesian well, which should be put in operation as soon as the land is bought; thus saving during the building a large expense, and being thereafter available as a source of income to the School by boring wells for the surrounding villages, there being a large field in Syria for such an instrument, without one such in the land. The cost of purchase and transportation would be about £100. The committee that recently met to consider this matter, consisting of Drs. Van Dyck, Daniel Bliss, William Eddy, H. H. Jessup, Sam Jessup, and others, recorded their decision after careful deliberation, that £5000 would be the minimum required for the plant and the initial running expenses. In due course of time, the expenses should be largely reduced, if not covered, by the proceeds of the labour of the pupils. It is proposed that the orphanage be located in the Merj Uyûn district, at the foot of both Mount Hermon and Southern Lebanon.

The object in issuing this notice is to ascertain as soon as possible who the friends are upon whom we may count for assistance in this enterprise, either now or in the near future, and what will be the kind and measure of their help, that I may correspond with them later, as may be necessary. Especially do I desire to know of any who will take an interest in serving as representatives of this enterprise in any part of Great Britain, to awaken the interest of others and enlist co-operation or secure donations, as my duties call me this week to the United States, and I earnestly hope someone here will take up the work.

I shall be happy to receive and attend to correspondence addressed to me, care of Presbyterian Foreign Missions Board, 53, Fifth-avenue, New York. (Rev.) Geo. A. Ford.

Sidon, Syria.

WHAT DO YOU CARE?

Strong men are falling on every hand;
Havoc appalling is wrought in the land;
Pestilence, famine, and war are outdone,
Never more damning ill under the sun;
Highest and lowest are found in the snare;
Statesmen and patriots, what do you care?

Women are weeping worn hearts away,
Fast and watch keeping day after day;
Tremblingly waiting steps that were dear,
Love soured to hating, hope chilled to fear;
Weak, beneath more than the strongest can bear—
Chivalrous husbands, what do you care?

Children are crying for love and for bread,
Needlessly dying, happy when dead;
Carrying, friendless, hearts made for fun,
Through shadows endless, life just begun;
Aimlessly roaming, hungry and bare—
Fathers and mothers, what do you care?

Babes are polluted, cursed from their birth,
Parents embruted, fixing their worth;
Infancy, prized by the Spirit of Wine—
Modern Moloch—is burnt at his shrine;
Daily his priests for their altars prepare:
Champions of Christendom, what do you care?

Daily the weak to slavery sink,
Vainly they seek escape from the drink;
Household and neighbour, involved in their thrall,
Fruitlessly labour to break the fall.
Piteously rises the victim's prayer:
Lovers of freedom, what do you care?

Jesus, by dying, liberty gave;
Love self-denying only can save.
Light, to its strength, is the Temperance cross,
Glorious at length the gain of its loss;
Passion and triumph Love asks us to share;
Friends of the Saviour, what do you care?

The Rescue Society.

The committee of this Society issue an urgent plea on behalf of its noble work. It appears that nine Homes are maintained, with a small lock hospital and a maternity home; 16,073 have been admitted to the Society's homes since it was established; 629 were helped last year; 250 can be accommodated at one time. About £1700 were earned by the inmates last year. The condition of the finances is occupying the serious attention of the committee, as they have not sufficient to pay the salaries of the workers due at midsummer last, and the rents are also due. The response to the recent issue of the report has not been more than half the usual amount, and unless liberal help is forthcoming shortly, one of the homes—where most valuable work has been done—must be closed. At least £500 are required to meet immediate claims. Communications should be made to the secretary, C. Stuart Thorpe, 79, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

BUENOS AYRES.—Mr. W. Barnett writes:—"The mission party, led by Rev. G. C. Grubb, have been holding meetings for the deepening of spiritual life, in the city of Buenos Ayres, every day during the second week of June, in the American Church Lecture Hall. On Sunday, June 18th, Mr. Grubb preached at the Scotch Church in the morning, and at the American Church in the evening, to large congregations. In the latter church, he addressed the Spanish-speaking congregation (said to be the largest in the world) through their pastor, Dr. Thompson, who interpreted. Christians have been greatly revived, and some 'hard cases' who have come to the meetings have given their hearts to the Lord. Gospel meetings are now being held, and on the 23rd the party leave (D.V.) for Rosario, via Campana."

HOMES FOR WORKING BOYS.

At the triennial festival of these Homes, held last week at the Westminster Town Hall, a substantial dinner was given to the 350 residents of the eight Homes. The committee, feeling that there are many objections to the ordinary charity dinners, decided in 1887 and 1890 to give the dinner to the boys, rather than to the friends and supporters of the Institution.

While the dinner was proceeding, the Hon. T. H. W. Pelham, treasurer and honorary secretary, made a statement in the Council Chamber as to the work and financial position of the Homes. It appeared that £1500 was still required to make up the balance on the building and furnishing of Pelham House, the new City Home, and that about £800 would be required to meet the current expenses of all the Homes.

The Lord Chancellor, upon taking the chair, addressed the boys, saying that he felt sure every boy present appreciated the Homes. He personally claimed an interest in them, on account of their being working-boys' Homes, for he knew what work was, having in his capacity as Chancellor often found the Woolsack, although exalted, not the easy seat some people imagine, but a very thorny one. Although he could no longer claim to be a boy, he yet retained his youthfulness of spirit. It was specially for the Christian influence and the guidance of those who sought to direct their thoughts to higher things that they would in after life have to thank God that they were brought up in these Homes. Being trained as one large family, they could not fail to learn that discipline and self-sacrifice which were so essential for a truly happy life. The bright example of those poor fellows on the Victoria, with death at hand, showed them how true Englishmen could unhesitatingly do their duty, and he hoped that the boys now in the homes would learn a lesson from them, and act upon it in their after-life.

This speech was followed by one from Mr. E. J. Kennedy, who urged the boys at once to make up their minds to become true and thorough men.

Canon Wilberforce spoke next in most encouraging tones, exhorting the lads to live sincere and godly lives. Mr. T. A. Denny followed briefly.

The offices of the Society are at 18, Buckingham-street, Strand. Mr. William Denham, secretary, will gladly supply information as to this useful work.

MR. EUGENE STOCK ON UGANDA.

A joint missionary meeting of the members of the London Banks Prayer Union and the City Y.M.C.A. was held at the Association rooms, 59 and 60, Cornhill, on Tuesday week. Mr. J. H. Tritton, who presided, referred to the great advance made within a comparatively brief period in the evangelisation of the world, instancing the fact that a short time ago the inhabitants of the Southern Sea were not only heathen, but cannibals, and that now it was difficult to find an island that was not Christian.

Mr. Eugene Stock, quoting Luke xxiv. 46, 47, said that of the three essentials there laid down two were fulfilled, and the third rested upon us as Christians. They were that Christ should suffer, that He should rise, and "that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." Mr. Stock pressed upon his hearers the obligation of taking their part in fulfilling this great commission. It was to urge this all-important point upon Christians that he had voyaged round the world. He found Christians wherever he had gone willing to accept this truth, with the result that they had been stirred up to offer themselves as missionaries either at home or abroad. He replied briefly to the strictures made in a recent number of The Times on the work in Uganda. The writer of that article referred to the large body of Roman Catholic priests there, and went on to say that putting the religious question aside, the R.C.'s had done more work—they had made roads, etc., but he (Mr. Stock) declined to agree to put the religious question aside. The Protestant missionaries had translated the New Testament into the Uganda language, so that the natives were being taught to read about and know God. It was important to have roads certainly, but the conversion of the people claimed first attention. It was also stated that R.C. missionaries gave their whole lives to the work, and that Protestants came home after a few years. He found that the C.M.S. had sent out forty-eight men to Uganda, and only seven of these had dropped out. The speaker concluded with some interesting details of mission work in New Zealand, Ceylon, and India.

BLUE JACKETS IN SYRIA.

MR. W. FERGUSON, writing from Kinmundy House, near Mintlaw, N.B., narrates a striking episode in the history of Miss Taylor's work in connection with the Orphanage for Moslem and Druse girls at Beyrout. It is the visit of British marines at the Orphanage, just before the lamented catastrophe to the Victoria. In a letter dated June 26, Miss Taylor says: "The British fleet has been in port, no less than sixteen steamers. They came in on Saturday afternoon, about 200 came to our church and heard a telling sermon from Mr. Mackie. In the afternoon I sent my card to say I would be glad to see any of the men that got leave to come on shore. Fourteen petty officers marched in, so nicely dressed. They were soon at home. I asked if any could play on the piano. They all pointed to one who could. I gave him Sankey's hymn-book, and said 'Sing any hymn you like while I get a cup of tea for them and some bread-and-butter.' Some of them said it was a real mother's cup of tea. They had all their well-worn hymn-books with them and their little pocket Bibles in linen cases. Miss Vartan, along with Miss Turner and Miss Lyons, helped me to entertain them, and their hearty singing did one's heart good: and as one company came after another, it was tea and singing all the time, with a word in season from one and another, and all said they had enjoyed nothing like it since they left home. I was told not far short of eighty were present from first to last.

"On Tuesday afternoon about sixty came; some who had been the day before brought others. None of the common sailors were allowed on shore, and only a few from each vessel got leave. Mr. Cammack, H.M.S. Bartram, spoke so nicely to the children on Sunday evening. He had a number of the same men each day, but Wednesday was the crowning day; it was difficult to bring the meeting to a close. J. Morrison, H.M.S. Edinburgh, took the meeting Tuesday and Wednesday. He was so glad to have the opportunity of speaking to his fellow-officers from the other ships, a number of perfect strangers to each other. How he did plead to keep close to the Lord Jesus, and gave some of his experiences and trials for being a Christian on board. After we had sung the Doxology, another and another kept asking for favourite hymns to be sung. At last one stood by the pillar and told his experience and what blessing he had received in these meetings, while one and all were full of thanks. I had to confess for my household that it had been as refreshing to us as it had been to them—it was a time we should always remember. Some of the girls spoke for themselves.

"On Monday some had asked if I was above receiving a mite on behalf of the school; they wished to show how grateful they were for my opening my house to them, and after a while one of them handed me an English pound from himself and his companions, with many kind words. On Tuesday another handed me nine shillings, collected from his friends, as a token of gratitude. On Wednesday Mr. Howell, of H.M.S. Victoria, handed me half-a-crown, saying how pleased he had been to hear the girls sing English so plainly, and hear about the school. He would soon be home in England, and would speak of what was being done here. Alas! alas! the fleet left Thursday forenoon for Tripoli. Colonel Trotter and his father-in-law, Lord Wellesley, went in the Edinburgh. The Consul telegraphed to Mr. Trotter:—'The Camperdown ran into the flagship Victoria, and 400 men were drowned.' You can imagine better than I can describe the terrible grief that has filled Beyrout. One feels fit for nothing.

"Little did we or they think when we sang, 'God be with you till we meet again,' that so many would be so soon called away. Mr. Morrison, in the middle of his address, said 'My comrades, let us get down on our knees, and those who wish to give themselves to the Lord, do so.' After a little silence he began to sing, 'Just as I am, without one plea,' and we all joined, in such a plaintive tone. Little did he think God was using him for such a solemn service. We can only add, 'It is the Lord, and He doeth all things well."

"LET YOUR CHILDREN BECOME TOTAL ABSTAINERS.—It is quite certain that no parent will ever regret that he has kept from his children throughout their childhood what is utterly useless to children, dangerous to very many, and ruinous to not a few."—The Bishop of London.

THE ENGLISH HOSPITAL AT JAFFA.

HAVING lately spent ten weeks at the English Hospital, Jaffa, recruiting after serious illness, I venture to remind your readers of the excellent work that has been carried on there during the past fifteen years, in the hope that a little account of it may enlist practical sympathy in its present need. The story of the beautiful building is well told in a charming little book by "E. U." called "Light on an Eastern shore," how it was erected through the exertions of Miss Mangan, who, at her lamented early death, bequeathed it to her co-worker, Miss Newton, by whom it is now managed.

Until recently this Mission was connected with Mildmay, which supplied all the workers, but this year, a door being opened in Hebron for medical mission work, it was mutually decided that Mildmay should withdraw its forces thither and leave Miss Newton to carry on the work at Jaffa with the assistance of five of the ladies, Mildmay no longer contributing anything towards their maintenance or its support, so that Miss Newton is now responsible for all the expenses. As I lived there so long, I can testify to the admirable economy with which the establishment is conducted, and which has already considerably reduced the debt of £800 it owed to the parent society, but the necessity for which prevents the hospital being used to its full extent—several beds not being occupied owing to the reduction of the staff. On the disconnection with Mildmay, Mrs. Pennefather generously promised £400 towards this debt, and other friends have kindly helped, but there remains a sum of £233 still due.

Five days in the week a picturesque crowd of outpatients assembles in the large Mission Hall, and while waiting their turn to see the doctor, an evangelistic address is always given, either by one of the English ladies or by the Arab Scripture reader; a simple exposition and prayer is held daily in both men's and women's wards, which are also visited weekly by Miss E. Newton, of the C.M.S. One of the nurses was formerly at the L.J.S. Hospital in Jerusalem, so is able to talk with the Jewish patients in their own languages—German, Spanish, or Hebrew jargon.

Two of the ladies devote their time, after attending to the care of the household, to visiting the villages and hamlets around Jaffa, including the small leper settlement, carrying the Gospel message and showing Christian love and sympathy, and finding generally a welcome reception. So that all the nursing and dispensing devolve on Miss Newton and her three helpers, each of whom takes her turn on night duty in both wards, upstairs and down, alone, for a month at a time—no sinecure when critical cases demand vigilant attention.

This arrangement of necessity leaves no margin for occasional breakdowns of health or absence for recreation, almost compulsory in a trying climate like that of Jaffa. There is the more need that there should be no unnecessary strain of anxiety for lack of funds.

TOTLAND BAY.—Recently, while staying in the Isle of Wight, I spent a few hours at Totland Bay. Amid much natural beauty in the place, there seems a lack of spiritual life. The population is increasing, the Vicar is advanced in years, and apparently single-handed. The Papists are busy, and during a mission lately conducted thirty of the inhabitants were baptized into the Roman Catholic Church. I have called attention to these facts, hoping that visitors may be induced to take up Christian work in the village and neighbourhood. A. B. VALPY.

THE NATIONAL PROTESTANT CONGRESS will this year be held at Bath. The first meeting, on the evening of Monday, October 16, will be devoted to addresses on the unity and continuity of the Church of Christ. At three gatherings on each of the two following days there will be statements of Scripture truths, and exposures of Romish error and tactics. The final meeting, on Thursday morning, October 19, will be devoted to addresses on the Second Advent. The speakers will include Drs. C. Clemance, W. Millar Nicolson, J. Kerr, J. Hiles Hitchens, R. R. Kane, Bishop Hellmuth, Canon Garratt, Professor Hull, Revs. J. G. Train, H. B. Woodman, J. Lunt, F. A. C. Lillingston, Talbot Greaves, H. C. G. Moule, C. H. Wainwright, J. G. Gregory, T. Paterson, J. Urquhart, W. Fuller Gooch, Pasteur C. Merle-d'Aubigné, and Miss Golding. Communications should be addressed to the secretary, National Protestant Congress, Jubilee Hall, Broad-street, Bath.

NOTES FROM AMOY.

WE have had proof that readers of THE CHRISTIAN have taken to heart previous references to Christ's work in Amoy. If our friends knew the pressure of spirit through which some of God's servants, both native and foreign, are going, they would be yet more deeply moved to believing prayer.

The very fact of progress drives us to great extremities. New Christian movements, whether in extension, or education, or industries, or efforts at co-operation with native leaders, often win outward assent, yet more than ever stir deep resentment. We discover the appalling need there is for a moral basis, true conscience and principle, on which to build reforms. Chinese leaders are remarkable for "splendid mendacity." Some of us are forced to the conclusion that even Royal edicts promising religious liberty are actually accompanied by secret instructions of a contrary nature. It is not otherwise possible to account for breaches of said orders; and sometimes reference is made to special instructions. Adversaries serve many a good purpose. Still, God grant that their power may be limited.

Another subject for prayer is that the full power of God's Spirit may come even upon converts, to deepen the sense of sin. Some say it will take hundreds of years before we can find in China such conversions as those of, say, John Bunyan and C. H. Spurgeon, where men were moved most mightily in their whole nature, and for a lifetime. Still, there is a feeling towards such great consecration. We had proof of this in a sermon-class on the text "God be merciful to me a sinner." It is agreed that as the life of missionaries is intense it will move Chinese. Again, a representative of the most devoted and aggressive spirit in the Chinese Christian Church said to me, with all fervour and illustration, "There needs more faithfulness in preachers." He showed how one earnest soul had moved others, and how men were willing to be influenced.

There is, happily, great appreciation of soul-rousing addresses. I have repeatedly heard of an American missionary who brought forward stirring facts from Church history, and who used powerful illustrations to impress the need of the Holy Spirit, and the energetic presence of the Saviour. Perhaps while we here are oppressed by a sense of deep, deep need of all the resources of God for moving this stolid, compact, complicated, mysterious, and proud mass of heathenism, there may be many at home whose effectual fervent prayer may accomplish much. Our Heavenly Father knows that our petition is very, very definite, for the turning of this people to God, by all means; and He knows that his servants are not neglecting any human agencies they can think of.

Still, progress in the East, as compared with the West, is tardy. May the Almighty Himself appear and use any one, or anything, or nothing, to accomplish his will. If the life of God in the West were more decided the influence would tell in all directions. I was amazed at the courage shown by a Chinese Christian recently in warning against and rebuking sin. And there is at present a part of this region where highest Christian influence and usefulness are commanding the respect of even a population of literati!—Yours faithfully,

Amoy, May 27. J. SADLER.

Doncaster "Do-Without" Missionary Society.

AT the quarterly meeting recently held, Rev. J. Burkitt, from Fernando Po, gave an account of the industrial, educational, and evangelistic work sustained in that island.

Reports were rendered of work carried on by evangelists supported by the Society in China, India, and Madagascar, and a graphic description of work in the Tangier Hospital was read, from the pen of Dr. Terry.

There are now 904 members who are expected daily to "do without" something they really like and give its value to one of the twenty collectors, without reducing their subscriptions to other societies.

If this system were carried out by every church, chapel, Y.M. and Y.W.C.A., hundreds of missionaries would be sent forth every year, and this generation would witness the evangelisation of the world.

CARE FOR YOUR BOY'S GAMES, if you would have him believe that you would care for his soul; and if he trusts a Christian mother now, he will yet trust in his mother's God.—The People's Friend.

ST. LUKE'S HOME FOR THE DYING.

On Friday afternoon this Home, associated with the West London Mission, was opened in Osnaburgh-street, N.W., by Lady Battersea, who, in commending the Home, said it was not necessary to dwell at any great length upon the needs of such an institution. London was simply honeycombed with Hospitals and Homes, but she believed that, with the exception of the Home already established by Miss Davidson, there was no special institution in London for the care of the dying poor. It was, therefore, with the greatest pleasure that she welcomed this new development of the work of the West London Mission. Persons of whatever nationality or creed would be eligible, but no one would be received but those who were more or less destitute, and who were certainly dying. She could conceive of no nobler work than of rendering the last days of the very poor as peaceful as possible. The task of the nurses must be a sad one, for they knew that their patients would soon die, but such work was calculated to call out everything that was true and womanly in them.

Mr. Howard Barrett related the steps which led up to the formation of the Home, and said that the reason why they settled in Osnaburgh-street was because they were unable to get a suitable house in any other part of London. In company with the matron (Sister Elizabeth) he visited a great many houses in other parts, but as soon as the landlord learned to what purpose they proposed to put it he refused to let it to them on any terms. However, this house would suit very well for the present. It had been divided into four wards and two isolation rooms, and it would accommodate sixteen patients. Besides Sister Elizabeth, there would be three nurses and domestics, and there would be two visiting physicians and one visiting surgeon. It would cost from £750 to £800 a year to run the place, and he was glad to know that they had enough in hand to keep them going for a little time; but they would have to depend entirely upon the public for further support, as the mission funds could not be utilised, even if they were in a flourishing condition, which, unfortunately, they were not at the present time.

Short addresses followed by Canon Barker, Dr. Monro Gibson, and Dr. Clifford, after which Lady Battersea formally declared the institution open.

WORK FOR WOMEN IN FRANCE.

A correspondent in the Dauphiny, France, writes to us:—

"There are some Christians in England who say France is not a mission-field; they give hearty support to workers in foreign lands, but do not hear the call from France. If these Christians would come and live six months in the Roman Catholic villages, and see and hear for themselves, they would quickly be convinced of the need of sending forth bands of consecrated missionaries to go, with the open Bible, and scatter the seed broadcast over the land. In The Christian of June 15 there are four distinct references to the open doors in France at this moment. This liberty may not be of long duration. Who will enter in while yet the opportunity is given?

"In the country and mountain places it is to a great extent woman's work. Experience has proved that she will be received and permitted to labour where men would meet with open opposition. She can prepare the way for more aggressive work. For instance, in one place where ladies have quietly worked for three winters, last year it was found desirable to employ an evangelist, who held two Gospel meetings each week, visited in the homes of the poor, and was very helpful to some of the men, many of whom have lost faith in the Romish Church and priests. Will not some ladies who can support themselves offer for this work? Some might send a substitute, and churches and Young Women's Christian Associations might have their own missionaries in the dark fields of France.

"That they are dark is without question. Many examples might be given. In the same house where some workers are living and have a mission hall, there is a devoted Roman Catholic woman, who says (and believes it) 'The Holy Virgin Mary is my all; it is she who will open the gates of heaven to me. If Mary does not save me, I shall be lost.' A parish priest, only the other day, said in his sermon, 'There are two ladders leading to heaven. Jesus stands at the top of one, and Mary on the other; but there are many more who go to heaven by Mary than by Jesus.' The Bible is not allowed to the people; the priests try to take away and burn those they find in the houses.

"Three young ladies have been sent out to France from the Chelsea Y.W.C.A. Missionary Home for further training. They are perfecting themselves in the language, meanwhile visiting among the people. Two of them wish to have some medical training, which is most important; the third is ready and eager for active service. These candidates have given their all—themselves. The means for their support, £50 a year, will, it is hoped, be supplied by some who cannot offer for active service."

We shall be glad to put interested friends in communication with the directors of the work with which these young people have associated themselves.

THE ERRORS OF POPERY.

Rev. J. Cunningham has delivered a timely series of lectures in connection with the midday prayer-meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association, Exeter Hall, during the past fortnight. The attendance steadily grew, until at last the room was crowded with interested hearers.

The lectures began on Monday, July 3, with "The Chair of Peter." After a brief exposition of the sacred text, "Upon this Rock," an historical sketch of the dogma of Papal Infallibility was given, up till the year 1870, when, in spite of the tearful entreaties of many bishops, headed by Dupanloup, the Jesuits proved finally victorious, and the decree of the Personal Infallibility of the Pontiff was made, as it stands to-day.

Once launched, it ended in nothing less than the practical infallibility of the priest in office. Recapitulating the number and titles of the martyrs when the Romish Church was last in power over England—"277 men, women, and children, burnt alive"—the lecturer said that though we live in better days, and "fire" has gone out of fashion, who will say that other forms of persecution suggested by "Infallibility," may not yet be found reproducible from the arsenal of an infinite intolerance?

The following two days of the course were occupied with the "Seven Sacraments," which were taken up seriatim, and Rome challenged to show reason why she had not made seventy sacraments once she began. The Mass was treated on Friday, July 7, and continued on the following Monday. Christians were exhorted not to stint enjoyment of the Feast of Jesus' dying love, nor to cut down its fulness. "Purgatory" was the next topic, and it was divided into the "planting" of the purgatorial prison amid the mystery of the intermediate state, and the "exploiting" of it by the authorities of the Church.

The painful subject of the "Confessional" was considered on Thursday, July 13, and the series concluded on the following day with "The Worship of Mary." The history of this redoubtable idolatry was treated chiefly in the region of its source. Prominence was given to the protest of Epiphanius, a canonised saint, who, as early as the fourth century, tried in vain to stem the tide of Pagan sentiment at the crisis, when the Pagan temples being shut by imperial edict, thousands of people, fresh from the worship of the goddesses, were laying hold of the sweet idea of the Lord's mother, and doing sacrifice to her instead. The Jesuits in our time have succeeded in putting Mary in the room of the Blessed Trinity. Christ, the adored of angels, is the Friend of all, the fallen and the guilty, and the poorest wretch that comes to Him will find Him more than mother dear.

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S EVE.—A Paris journal, L'Eclair, announces the formation of a League, members of which intend to oppose Protestantism as contrary to the French spirit. It is proposed on August 24 to celebrate the memory of Charles IX. and his royal mother, and the assassins of Coligny. The Protestant religious papers are counselling a worthy use of present opportunities. Le Christianisme says: "Let us love the Catholics, but not imitate them; let us pity the Freethinkers, but not join with them; above all, let us maintain our distinctive principles, and not blush if pronounced rigid and inflexible, prudes and puritans. Would to God that these reproaches were more merited than they are!"

MISSIONARY PRAYER UNION.

This Union, commenced eighteen months ago, held its quarterly meeting on Sunday afternoon last, in the West Cliff Tabernacle, Bournemouth. The report of the secretary showed that the work continues steadily, and that the sum of about £15 is raised every quarter from the daily gifts of the members. Mr. R. C. Morgan spoke of the Prayer Union as a great and important fact, and emphasised its value as bearing witness to what can be done if other churches will adopt the same simple method.

A considerable impetus was given to the work by a letter received by Pastor Geo. Wainwright from Mr. A. H. Baynes, appointing Mr. Hale, who is soon to go out to Agra, as the missionary to represent, and to be supported by, the Prayer Union. The effect of this announcement was that other persons immediately decided to join the Union. The next quarterly report will, no doubt, be much brighter in consequence of this new departure.

The secretary, Herr Feller, made a proposal to teach a conversation class in French or German or Italian, making a charge for membership, and giving the proceeds to the funds of the Prayer Union. It is hoped that many will accept of this offer, and that more than a financial benefit will result from it. The Continent is our "Samaria," and is in need of witnesses who can speak to the people in their own tongue the wonderful works of God.

TO PARENTS AND TEACHERS.

When our dear little ones are from us taken
We stretch our empty arms towards Thy throne;
With bitter cry, "Lord! why are we forsaken?
Art Thou no longer mindful of Thine own?"

And we can find no comfort in our sorrow,
For they are not whose love our hearts beguiled,
Till from Thy word this ray of light we borrow—
"Jesus called unto Him a little child!"

J. B. Greenwood.

Froebel says that the child's love of play is the highest phase of human development at that period. That is, that in play the child endeavours to express his newest and freshest ideas.

If from his home the lad that day
His five small loaves had failed to take,
Would Christ have wrought—can any say—
The miracle beside the lake?

Why should our sister-women lavish on a pet poodle the love God gave them for the babes of humanity, to whom love means life, joy, education? Even a poodle could appreciate a baby.

Thou who didst lie in Bethlehem's stall,
Hast made all childhood holy for thy sake:
Since Thou on Mary's breast didst sleep and wake,
Through that one mother Thou hast hallowed all.

There is one word that I have simply begged my colleagues never to use in their reports of boys—the word "hopeless." Masters may be hopeless, I cannot tell; but boys and girls—never.—Dr. Welldon.

It is not bread you chiefly owe your family, father. It is not mended clothes, mother. It is not errands done and lessons learnt, children, that makes your part. It is the way in which the part, whatever it be, is done, that makes the part.—W. C. Gannett.

You wish to retain your boy's friendship, you say. Then study his nature. The confiding instinct in a boy is very delicate; it is easily chilled. So conduct yourself towards him that he may never regret having confided in you. Let him feel perfectly safe.

I thank God that my father encouraged all his children in habits of observation. I know that, although, alas! I profited only too little by it; the training that he gave me in observation has made all the difference to my enjoyment of life.—Miss Rose Kingsley.

"What are you going to do with these outcast children? Their parentage is against them. The structure of their skulls is against them. Of nerve and muscle they have none. What to do with them? Rather ask, what are they going to do with us?"—Talmage.

Nagging at the children spoils your influence with them. You see it chiefly refers to things that are worrying to yourself, and not those that are hurtful to the character of the children. A mother who keeps an eye on God and on the future will never "nag."

The Lord Jesus never said that unless a child is converted into a man by the lapse of years, he cannot enter the kingdom of God; though many people thought that. But what He said was, Unless a man is converted back into a child he cannot enter the kingdom of God. "Heaven lies about us in our infancy."—Dr. Glover.

Letters to the Editor.

THE FIRST COMMANDMENT.

Sir,—In these days we seem disposed to imagine that the first commandment has reference to heathen idolatry, and thus to lose its deep teaching and warning to ourselves. The command, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," surely strikes at the very root of all our actions and motives.

May I suggest a few of these gods to whom we yield homage?

I.—The world and its mandates: How many of our plans for ourselves and our families are framed to please (and propitiate) the world, and not the Father?

II.—The approval of the people of God: Do we not often allow the desire for the approbation of his servants to obscure our view of the Master, and the tokens of his pleasure or displeasure?

III.—Hero-worship: Are not some led astray in this direction, forgetting even the angel's prohibition "See thou do it not: worship God"?

IV.—The verdict of majorities: How often do we shrink from opposing ourselves to the almost irresistible force of numbers, ignoring the fact that "there is no restraint to the Lord to save, by many or by few"; and that the command is plain, "Thou shalt not follow the multitude to do evil" (Ex. xxiii. 2). Surely there is no virtue or value in majorities, be they of a committee, a convocation, or a congress, unless the Lord be on their side.

V.—The wishes of minorities: Are not some of us induced by our sense of chivalry to espouse causes which have nothing to recommend them but their feebleness? Doubtless the Lord uses the weak things of the world to confound the mighty. But, whilst the poor, who are rich in faith, are to be held in reverence, there is no intrinsic merit in being poor any more than in being rich. Evidence must be weighed impartially. Our Lord is a just Lord, and declares, "Thou shalt do no unrighteousness in judgment; thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty" (Leviticus xix. 15).

But obedience to this first commandment is costly. Victory in the work and warfare of keeping it, involves the humbling of ourselves under his mighty hand. Are we ready to pay this price, or do we keep back part of it?

We may be willing to strive and struggle if success is manifestly to be ours? But to sow when others are to reap, to protest (apparently in vain) when we may not, and probably will not, see in this life the fruit of the loyalty which has caused us such painful effort: to wait, or watch, or work, according to his will, with one thought only—his glory—can only be accomplished by keeping the first commandment and its explanatory note. Then will come "afterwards" the fulfilment of the strange, sweet promise of the Master, "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted." Crowns may be ours, but those who win them thus, care not to wear them. Nay, their joy and triumph is to "cast their crowns before the throne, saying, 'Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power.'"—Yours faithfully.

Railway Shareholders and the Lord's Day.

Some years ago important results followed the action of a few Christian railway shareholders, who joined hands to exert their influence for the preservation of the Day of Rest in connection with railways in the South-east of England. The notorious Sunday excursions from Dover and Folkestone to French ports were abandoned, the Sunday League was successfully resisted, and the Sunday special train service was curtailed.

It is now proposed, for the furtherance of His glory, to carry on work of a similar character, wherever any considerable number of God-fearing shareholders will consent to band themselves together, either to formulate protests, expostulate with boards, or canvass proprietors in favour of a better observance of the Lord's Day. The London Anti-Sunday Travelling Union, acting in concert with its Hastings branch, is about to undertake this task. An appeal is made for the sum of £150, to be expended in opposing various breaches of the Sabbath Law, especially Sunday excursions and the Sunday carriage of minerals and goods. Communications may be addressed to Mr. James Fox Wilson, 22, Western-road, St. Leonards, who will act as secretary in all matters pertaining to shareholders.

CHILDREN need so little to make them happy—they only want to be loved, they only want to press little soft cheeks against the breasts, the breasts of those who love them. They only want a response to the natural spontaneous affection which is in all of them.

POST CARDS.

CHRISTIAN CYCLISTS.

A few (six) Christian young men have formed a cycling club to work and distribute Gospel tracts in the villages around Bristol. They would be glad if other Christian cyclists would join them, and help in conducting open-air services once or twice a week. The club is quite unsectarian.

YOUNG WOMEN IN DUNDEE.

Mrs. Baeyertz's Mission in Dundee was followed up by a young converts' tea held in the Young Women's Christian Association, 33, Tay-street. Over forty out of eighty-seven responded to the invitation. A most suitable and powerful address was given by Miss Edith C. Doddrell, at the close of which nearly all consecrated themselves to God in answer to her appeal. A number joined the Association.

EARLSFIELD Y.W.C.A.

This little branch has taken a forward step. The members have bravely undertaken to pay their own rent, and a room having been secured it was opened at 312, Earlsfield-road, Wandsworth Common. The first night the room was full, and much interest was shown. Several speakers pressed the claims of the Association on the young women present. The secretary is Mrs. A. Williams, "Capern," Capern-road.

GOSPEL CYCLE BRIGADE.

Four members of this brigade rode to Thorpe Lea the other day, distributed tracts, and invited the people to come together in the open air to have some singing and to hear good news we had to tell. A publican asked them to have it near his house, so that he could hear. The visitors agreed, and all came out of his house, while he himself helped in singing, and listened most attentively to the good news of salvation. May the Holy Spirit bless the word spoken, to the salvation of many souls!

The National Refuges.

The National Refuges Society for Homeless Children has under its care the well-known training ships Arethusa and Chichester, in addition to seven Homes on shore, and has now entered upon its fifty-first year of service in the cause of God and poor children. Up to the end of last year the revenue was fairly well maintained, with here and there a drop; but this year the falling off in the funds has been very considerable.

Since we commenced our labours, many new societies have sprung into existence, and the tendency I fear has been to forsake the old love and to help the new. This is much to be regretted, especially in the case of a Society like our own, which for half a century has been unostentatiously doing real and useful work for the helpless boys and girls of our country. The fact that 12,000 boys and girls have been saved from misery, possibly crime, is sufficient evidence of the usefulness of the work we have been permitted to do, and will forcibly appeal to the hearts of all true stewards of the kingdom of God.

We are brought face to face with the near probability of having to close one of our Homes, wherein 150 lads are being trained in the fear of God, and are being educated, technically and otherwise, so as to fit them to earn their own living. To close the Home would be lamentable. May I therefore appeal, as I do most earnestly, for special help in our time of need? £5000 in new subscriptions and donations is needed annually to enable us to carry on our work unimpaired. Donations will be thankfully received by our treasurer, Mr. W. E. Hubbard, 4, St. Helen's-place, E.C., or by me at 164, Shaftesbury-avenue, W.C.—Yours, etc.

Henry G. Copeland,
Finance and Deputation Secretary.

THE WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF H.M.S. VICTORIA.—Miss Weston writes from the Royal Sailors' Rest, Portsmouth:—"The Mansion House fund has swelled to large proportions, but more is needed if the struggling widows with large families, and poor old parents tottering into the grave, are to be pensioned at all adequately. The circumstances of our bluejackets are not properly known. When the man dies the pay stops, and the credit of the wife ceases. She is a penniless woman; this brings immediate distress, and calls for immediate help. I am helping in various ways nearly one hundred families, mostly by small weekly pensions, to keep a roof over their heads and food in their mouths until the country's fund can be expended. If your readers will entrust me with any money I shall be very glad to dispense it. Mourning attire will be very welcome, also babies' and children's clothes."

The Book World.

Love Seeketh not Her Own is a pathetic little story for the young, translated from the German. (6d. Houlston & Sons.)

A Troublesome Trio; or, Grandfather's Wife, by Mrs. Bray, is a story for adults rather than young folks. Domestic scenes are ably delineated, and a wholesome moral is conveyed. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

A very attractive Picturesque Chicago and Guide to the World's Fair has been issued from the offices of The Religious Herald, Hartford, Conn., and presented to each subscriber as a souvenir of fifty years' publication of that well-known paper.

True Stories Leaflets. Mr. Josiah Spiers has done well to reissue these in leaflet form. (2s. per 100. Children's Special Service Mission.) Brightly illustrated, they are admirably adapted for distribution at the seaside, in the parks, or, indeed, wherever children can be reached.

Covenanted Blessings is the title of a small volume containing seven Bible Readings by Rev. G. C. Grubb, M.A. (Marshall Bros.) The governing text is "To the Jew first, and also to the Gentile." There is teaching on some of the Old Testament types as well as an outline of prophetic truth.

William Allen is the subject of the latest volume of the "Friends' Shilling Biographical Series." (E. Hicks, jun.) It is from the pen of Irene M. Ashby, who not only outlines the career of the eminent scientist and philanthropist, but introduces the reader to many of the movements and interests of a hundred years ago.

The Life of William Farel, by Frances Bevan, has reached a fourth edition. (2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d. A. Holness.) It is an important chapter of history, written with the noble purpose of conveying instruction in sound evangelical principles. Containing over 400 full pages, and embellished with numerous illustrations, the volume will make an attractive and useful present for young people. It should be in all Sunday school and village libraries.

Come Ye Apart, a well-known volume of daily readings in the life of Christ, by Rev. J. R. Miller, D.D., has been issued in a remarkably cheap form by the Sunday School Union. (3s. 6d.) The book provides a meditation for every day in the year, based on the story and words of Jesus; the reading being fragments of thought by a sound spiritual counsellor. The pages are practical in a high degree, and we trust they will have many regular readers.

What is Written: A Question for the Times. Miss Carruthers, well known in connection with the Evangelical Schools at Pisa, has issued in this little volume (1s. 6d. Y.W.C.A. Book Room, Bournemouth) a series of Bible readings to teachers and young women on the Written and the Living Word, and dealing with the life of Mary according to Scripture and in contrast to the false teaching of Rome. We feel justified in commending the book heartily, especially to workers among young women, and particularly those exposed to danger from Roman Catholicism.

"Do this in Remembrance of Me": A Reply to Mr. Supples and other Criticisms, by T. K. Abbott, B.D., Litt.D., Professor of Hebrew in the University of Dublin, is a pamphlet of substantial value. (1s. Longmans.) Is the Hebrew verb 'âsâh, or the Greek poiein ("make," "do") used to signify sacrificial acts, such as "offer"? Do shulchân (Heb.) and trapeza (Gr.) mean "altar," as distinguished from table? These are some of the questions raised, and Dr. Abbott brings ample scholarship to bear upon answers which Protestants will cordially approve.

Is Ritualism Right? Rev. J. T. Wrenford, of Newport, Mon., asks this question in a neat letter booklet published by Messrs. Partridge (8d. per doz.), and now in its third edition. A manifold answer is given, and we could wish it were read and pondered by the thousands who are being led astray by teachers of error and devotees of superstitious practices.

On the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. By Rev. John R. Palmer. (6d. Elliot Stock.) The result of several years of study, these pages are characterised by a precision of statement which will make them specially valuable to such as combat Romish error. It is shown that in centuries gone by Romanists opposed the very dogma which is now a distinguishing article in the Papal creed.

Technical Schools for Boys.—Miss Stewart, of Clifton Lodge, Lisnaskea, Ireland, writes:—"We are commencing a Y.M.C.A., as the men and boys have been much neglected. I wonder if it would be possible to have the boys taught to make tables and chairs for their own houses, and to sell to the cottagers in the country. I would be glad of a few practical hints as to how such a work is begun and carried on."

THE Y.M.C.A.

Mr. W. A. Boyd, District Travelling Secretary, has organised a Y.M.C.A. at Tinahely, co. Wicklow, Ireland.

The Dublin Y.M.C.A. has been very successful with its open-air meetings in Phœnix Park, and is making marked progress in other departments of its work.

Mr. Donald MacCall, formerly of New York Y.M.C.A., now of Princeton College, is associated with two fellow-students in an evangelistic tour of Central New York during the summer.

The Sunderland Y.M.C.A. held its summer quarterly meeting in the beautiful grounds of Ashburne, by kind permission of Mrs. Backhouse. The report presented by Mr. Henry Johnson, general secretary, was of a very encouraging character.

A volume will be published to commemorate the forthcoming jubilee of Y.M.C.A.'s. It will give a succinct account of work for young men in the different countries of the world, going back to the formation of the Y.M.C.A., and tracing the development thereof.

Mr. Fredk. Link entertained the members and associates of the Croydon Y.M.C.A. at their quarterly gathering last week, and presided over the business part of the proceedings. Plans are being prepared for the new building, which is to be called the Y.M.C.A. Jubilee Building.

The annual business meeting of the Kingston-on-Thames Y.M.C.A. was presided over by Captain Cundy. Nineteen members and twenty-nine associates, it was reported by Mr. A. Hill, gen. sec., had joined in the last four months, during which period, also, seven young men had been led to confess Christ.

Increasing interest is reported by Mr. McConaughy in the work in India. There are 74 associations, the Madras work comprising 268 members, 103 of whom are Hindus, 81 Eurasians, 4 Parsees, and 4 Mohammedans. The rooms occupied by the Association are wholly inadequate. Young men are confessing Christ each month.

Railroad work in the State of New York goes on well. The report states that Elmira has successfully introduced department days for Gospel services. Hornellsville continues prosperous. At the Grand Central, New York and New Durham buildings enlarged accommodations are to be secured. Rochester has had an increased interest in Bible study. At Troy nineteen professed conversions are reported.

The Y.M.C.A. of Yale University has issued an open letter to all who have friends about to enter college, inviting the co-operation of teachers, pastors, and parents in introducing to them all new students. They desire to extend a cordial greeting to such, welcome them to the best life of the place, and do everything in their power to assist them during the first week of college life in forming the right kind of new associations and receiving proper impressions.

A friend writes:—While entering the Y.M.C.A., I was accosted by a child, who informed me that "Them there Christian blokes ain't come yet." Certainly not a very becoming phrase; but it came from a child with all the simplicity of childlike nature, purely innocent in its language. It has struck me since how careful we, as Christians, should be before the outer world. Seeing the thousands term us "Christian blokes," they look for Christianity in us, and not the ways of the world. We ought to live before the world, so that, if they do not read the Bible itself for themselves, they may read it in us.

The National Council is organising a wide extension of Y.M.C.A. work throughout the country. The plan of operations is designed from the point of view of seeking to benefit every young man in the community; and the associations are advised to seek the good of costermongers and agriculturists, no less than that of young men of the commercial and upper classes. Hints are given for diversifying the operations of the Associations, and for affiliating kindred organisations on lines which, while safeguarding the constitution of the Associations, are somewhat similar to those uniting the Y.M.C.A.'s and Fellowship Unions in Scotland. Under the last-named provision, a number of Soldiers' Christian Associations have already been affiliated; and a wide sphere of usefulness has thereby been opened up by the members of Y.M.C.A.'s being brought into direct touch with the army,

SAMOA.—Sixteen islands have been entirely evangelised by Samoan Native Missionaries. A college for girls has just opened at Papauta, which, it is thought, will exert an influence for good upon the natives. A great awakening has been recorded at the Missionary Training College, Malua. On the New Hebrides group there is a great want of teachers. The drink traffic is ruining the natives of some of the islands, while it is a serious hindrance to the mission work in general.

THE MASTER'S TOUCH.

Matt. viii. 15.

"He touched her hand, and the fever left her."
He touched her hand, as He only can,
With the wondrous skill of the Great Physician,
With the tender touch of the Son of Man.
And the fever-pain in the throbbing temples
Died out with the flush on brow and cheek,
And the lips that had been so parched and burning
Trembled with thanks that she could not speak.
And the eyes where the fever-light had faded,
Looked up, by her grateful tears made dim,
And she rose and ministered in her household,
She rose and ministered unto Him.

"He touched her hand and the fever left her."
Oh, we need His touch on our fevered hands!
The cool, still touch of the Man of Sorrows,
Who knows us, and loves us, and understands.
So many a life is one long fever!
A fever of anxious suspense and care,
A fever of getting, a fever of fretting,
A fever of hurrying here and there.
Ah, what if in winning the praise of others
We miss at the last the King's "Well done"?
If our self-sought tasks in the Master's vineyard
Yield "nothing but leaves" at the set of the sun?

"He touched her hand and the fever left her."
Oh, blessèd touch of the Man Divine!
So beautiful then to arise and serve Him,
When the fever is gone from your life and mine;
It may be the fever of restless serving,
With heart all thirsty for love and praise,
And eyes all aching and strained with yearning
Tow'rd self-set goals in the future days.
Or it may be a fever of spirit-anguish,
Some tempest of sorrow that dies not down,
Till the cross at last is in meekness lifted,
And the head stoops low for the thorny crown.
Or it may be a fever of pain and anger,
When the wounded spirit is hard to bear,
And only the Lord can draw forth the arrows
Left carelessly, cruelly rankling there.

Whatever the fever, His touch can heal it;
Whatever the tempest, His voice can still;
There is only joy as we seek His pleasure;
There is only rest as we choose His will.
And some day, after life's fitful fever,
I think we shall say, in the home on high,
"If the hands that He touched but did his bidding,
How little it matters what else went by!"

Ah, Lord! Thou knowest us altogether,
Each heart's sore sickness, whatever it be;
Touch Thou our hands! Let the fever leave us,
And so shall we minister unto Thee.

E. G. Cherry.

THE OPEN AIR.

Dear Sir,—Several letters have appeared in your numbers deprecating the starting of a new movement, more especially as it concerns the work at races, fairs, etc., which has been carried on for forty years by the Open-Air Mission.

To many who, like myself, have accompanied our late beloved secretary, Gawin Kirkham, to the Derby, etc., it is well known that before his departure he had greatly desired that we all might be one in this great service, with its ever increasing demands.

During a conversation on the field at Kirkham's last Derby, our beloved friend expressed his hearty approval of the work of Mr. Josiah Nix, who is the well-known leader of another mission.

Since last Derby Day, I have had a long conversation with our brother Nix on this subject, and I wish to make it known, through your columns, that while Mr. Nix is determined to persevere, he is both willing and anxious to work, not only in unison with, but with the Open-Air Mission, in whatever way may be found practicable. Our friend, like thousands more, thinks that these are the days when more than ever one decided front should be presented concerning the glorious Gospel, for the defence of which the open-air preacher is conspicuously "set." What can be done in the direction indicated? It is clear that the time has come for considerable enlargement and the increase of our annual income, which from all sources only amounted for 1892 to £1,636 1s. 9d., while no society is more economically worked, and none in the world can be of greater importance. Having this subject so much on your own heart, I feel there will be no need of apology for this somewhat long letter. Nay, I venture to hope that you may be inclined to invite to your important journal communications on this great question.

We have much, very much, "to thank God for, and take courage." Our friend Frank Cockrem is proving himself most indefatigable in organising stations, etc., all over London.

Never had we more blessed news of conversions than the present summer has brought us. Yet, while the days are going by, and whilst in so many instances churches seem busy about everything except that very thing for which they can reasonably be supposed to exist, with the gambling mania of the age as rife as ever around us, and, to crown all, in these last tremendous days we are given to understand, forsooth, that this dear old England of ours, with its cottage homes and palaces, its fields, parks, and familiar highways and hedges, has just been delivered over to the Pope. Who can say that the necessity for field preaching no longer exists in Protestant England?

B. Barry Wake,
President Finsbury Park Branch O.A.M.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

Rev. W. Ross, of Polmont, has accepted a call to St. Mary's, Partick.

Rev. J. S. Stewart has accepted a call to the Rutherford Free Church, Aberdeen.

Free St. John's, Edinburgh, has called Rev. R. L. Jaffrey, of Camelon, who has accepted.

Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, of Aberdeen, has decided to decline the call received by him from Toronto.

We regret to hear that Principal Cunningham, of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, is seriously ill, and his condition is causing some alarm to his friends.

On Thursday, Rev. Thomas Wilson was ordained to the pastorate of Beith Free Church. Rev. J. Greenshields, Muirkirk, preached from Luke xix. 10, and Rev. G. Macaulay addressed pastor and people.

Free St. Columba's, Edinburgh, is at present undergoing extensive alterations. Meanwhile, the congregation have been granted the use of the Free Assembly Hall, where services in English will be held for several weeks in the forenoon and afternoon.

The Russell will case, which has so long been pending, has at length been settled by compromise. Under the settlement, one niece gets £6,750; another, still a minor, gets £4,750; various Christian bodies get £8,500 among them; while the residue of the estate (about £20,000) goes to the Mildmay Mission to the Jews.

IRISH NOTES.

Dr. Alexander, Bishop of Derry, has just gone for a brief visit to South Africa.

The Congregational Church, York-street, Dublin, has been reopened, after having been thoroughly remodelled and renovated.

The Belfast City Mission has just given a pleasant day in the country, on the banks of Lough Neagh, to nearly 400 street arabs, most of whom never enjoyed a trip by train before, and who do not often see the green fields.

The annual meeting of the Eastern Reformed Presbyterian Synod has just been held at Cullybackey, county Antrim. The retiring Moderator, Rev. Dr. Moffett, Letterkenny, delivered an interesting address, and Rev. S. B. Stevenson, Belfast, was chosen as his successor for the ensuing year.

Two new Episcopal churches are to be formed in Belfast. A series of evangelistic addresses has just been delivered in Castlederg by Mr. Jno. Goligher, of Londonderry, and a very successful Gospel mission has been conducted in Rathfriland by Mr. S. G. Montgomery, General Assembly's Evangelist.

What remarkable results often spring from small causes is well illustrated in the following case:—Twelve years ago Mr. Jno. Morrison, of Lurgan, co. Armagh, read the story of "Jane Parminter's Will," and from that time till his death, which took place recently, he became an annual subscriber to the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, and when he passed away he left his life's savings, £785 16s. 1d., which has just been paid, to the Society.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

Several societies in New South Wales are entering with much enthusiasm into work among the aborigines.

The C.E. Society in the Elyria (Ohio) Church recently gave a reception in a public hall to the employés of the three large manufactories in the village.

The World's Convention of Christian Endeavour commenced its sessions at Montreal, on Wednesday, July 5th. The committee provided for over 20,000 delegates.

When in Paris last month Dr. Clark preached at the American Church, and took part in a conference of pastors and workers, at which there was an attendance of one hundred; also the first Endeavour mass meeting ever held in Paris.

The Christian.

☞ It is particularly requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to individual members. Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster-buildings, London, E.C. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

All Advertisements for The Christian should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Central Advertising Offices, Bouverie House, Salisbury-square, London, E.C., accompanied by remittance. (For Terms, see Page 1 of cover.)

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Mr. Robert Wilson, of Broughton Grange, with a report of the Keswick Convention, of which he is chairman.

In the early days of my Christian life, a man of experience and wisdom counselled me in some such words as these: "Give yourself to reading; pray without ceasing; but let your reading and your praying be proportionate. If you read much and pray little, you will become dogmatic and dry or pragmatic and proud. If you pray much and read little, you will become shallow and fanatic, liable to be carried away with every wind of doctrine. Let everything be sanctified to you by the Word of God and prayer." During forty years I have proved this counsel true, and I leave it to those who are coming after me.

An Old Man.

Loose views on the authority of Scripture are to be seriously deprecated, and earnestly withstood. The notion current in many minds that a distinction should be made between the words of Christ and those of Paul and the other Apostles, is an exceedingly erroneous and mischievous one. Apostolic testimony is as authoritative as that borne directly by the Lord Himself. He only spake as from the Father: "My doctrine," He said, "is not mine, but his that sent Me," a statement equally true of all Apostolic teaching. It cannot be too strongly maintained that the Scriptures of the inspired Word are an organic whole, each separate part needful and essential to the unity of the rest, and all inbreathed and divinely enjoined by one and the same Spirit.

The inspiration of the Apostles as teachers of the Church was a gift bestowed by the Lord Jesus as Head of the Church. Their words are therefore his, spoken through them. It is not without significance that the sacred canon is called "The Word of Christ" (Col. iii. 16), and that the inspiring Spirit is called "the Spirit of Christ" (1 Peter i. 11). The Apostle Paul in writing to Timothy says, referring to his own previous teaching, "If any man consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, he is proud, knowing nothing" (1 Tim. vi. 3, 4). He thus declares that his words as the writer of what has gone before are the words of Christ. The human element in the Scriptures as connected with the writers in no way lessens or modifies the infallibility or authority of that which they have written. Hence the Apostle could say again, "I command, yet not I, but the Lord" (1 Cor. vii. 10).

"The literary and critical study of the Bible is no substitute for the profound and searching study of its contents, regarded as God's message and revelation to man." So says Dr. Hughes-Games in his admirable little book, "The Bible: and How to Study it." (3d. Hunt & Co.) There is a world of difference between discussing external questions regarding the Bible, and patiently applying ourselves to the Scriptures, as preliminary to an honest application of the Scriptures to ourselves.

Dr. Hughes-Games gives scholarly and practical advice to all who, going "back to the Book," would study it to real purpose and with the greatest profit. While indicating wise means and sound methods, he well says:—

> We may know the exact words which the sacred writers of old employed, and their significance; we may understand all that can be ascertained as to the conditions under which they wrote, and the history of their times; we may be acquainted with the latest results of scholarship and of the higher criticism; and yet miss the deep spiritual lessons beneath the surface: we may comprehend all about the shell, and yet miss the kernel. Meanwhile, the humble student of the Word may be deriving nutriment for his spiritual life, help in the battle against self and sin, and strength for the conflict, which we, with all our intellectual knowledge of the Holy Book, may be missing altogether, to the stunting of our spiritual growth, and the injury, or even ruin, of our souls.

We trust this little book will have many earnest readers, and be extensively circulated, especially among our young people.

An Irish Catholic writing in the Lyceum on English peasants and their religion, shows his ignorance of the subject when he says that "nothing, perhaps, shows the wretchedness of rural England so much as the fact that Calvinism is the only form of religion that has any real hold over the peasants; there is something in the terrible hopelessness of that creed that harmonises with life as they know it." We believe that Arminianism is quite as much the creed of the peasant as Calvinism, though he may not be able to define the difference between them. One writer also says: "Even among the virtuous peasantry there is a great deal of indifferentism. One of them spoke for his class when he told Mr. Heath that he was a Wesleyan himself, but that he thought 'we should never be asked what we'd been.'" That the reply of this intelligent peasant should be taken for a sign of religious indifference is an evidence of the utter unfitness of some magazine writers to deal with religion in any form; yet every one seems to think he is equal to the task.

M. de Blowitz gives, in McClure's Magazine, a description of the Pope, which may well fill the minds of Protestants with serious concern, if not with alarm:—

> To the Vatican flow innumerable missives from every corner of the world, and could I only tell some of them it would be seen how long still is the arm extending from the shadow of St. Peter's; how dreadful still are the lips that speak in the shade of the Vatican. I should show the Holy Father and his cardinals writing to the Emperor of Austria, directing him by counsel and advice, and sometimes almost by orders. I should show Prince Bismarck continuing, since his fall, to hold before the eyes of the Pope glimpses of the more or less partial restoration of the Temporal Power. I should show Leo XIII. now trying to unite, now to alienate France and Russia, according as at the moment this or that policy seems to him most propitious for his own cause or the cause of peace.

And more of the same kind. The disturbing force in politics is an unseen hand; the peoples know nothing of the gamesters who are playing for them as a stake.

In the first number of Forward, which is launched by Rev. W. Robinson, of Salem, South India, there is an account of Jesuit methods given by Rev. E. Hawker, B.A., from which it appears that the Romanists bought a house at a village, and established a teacher. A European priest and a native catechist visit the village at regular intervals. To every man, woman, and child, who will come and learn their prayers, and receive Romish instruction, they will give daily money, and promise that they will lend money, and give bullocks, to enable these poor people to farm their land. The security they ask is the land itself. Thus they get a temporal and powerful hold over the people, who are attracted by the prospect of obtaining money, and take little heed of future consequences. Any large extension of such a system would mean interference with the government of the people, and would call for the action of the authorities; but for some time it will probably go on unnoticed. It is easy to see how well it will pay.

The Free Methodist Church Conference reports a summary of work which contains points of importance for all Christian workers to observe. The causes of decrease are given as removals, imperfectly kept registers, insistence on the class meeting test, dissension through political causes, and letting chapels for religious services to persons out of sympathy with Free Methodism. The causes of success are said to be religious awakenings, concentration of ministerial effort, efforts amongst the young, and pleasant Sunday afternoons conducted on religious principles. The warnings which lie in the causes of failure are obvious; the lessons in the causes of success are suggestive, and emphasise the necessity for diligent spiritual work if the Gospel is to advance.

The Daily Chronicle gives accounts of further troubles for the Stundists. They are so heavily fined that their bedding and clothing will have to be sold by auction to liquidate the fines. In the Province of Kieff, the local authorities are engaged in making an exact census of Stundist children, with the object of removing them from the control of their parents, and placing them under the tutelage of the priests or of orthodox relatives. "From Kharkoff, Moscow, and Rostoff-on-the-Don, news comes that Protestant leaders in the company of ordinary malefactors continue to pass through the prisons of these places, clad in filthy prison costume, chained, and with shaven heads, en route to the Caucasus and other places of exile." When the Czarewitch attended the wedding of the Duke of York, he spoke at the Mansion House of the close alliance between the reigning houses of Great Britain, Russia, and Denmark, and expressed a hope that the people also might come as close together. He may be quite sure that neither our Royal Family nor the people of this country approve of this cruel treatment of persons whose only offence is their loyalty to our Lord Jesus Christ, and that the termination of the persecution would do Russia good in the eyes of all Christendom.

Harper's Magazine has a paper on "Chicago's Gentle Side," which contains a valuable suggestion for women all the world over. Certain men were arrested for attempting the ruin of five young girls, and put upon their trial. When the case came up, the Chicago Protective Agency for Women sent for fourteen or sixteen married women of fine social position, to come to court and sit through the trial to see fair play. The plan was a success. Bad men were put in the same position as bad women, and something like equality recognised between the sexes. Not only so, the presence of respectable women in the court "put an end to the ribaldry that was always a feature of trials of the kind." The police and Court officials were said to have been astonished at this proceeding by women of social standing. The appearance of women would have a purifying effect in many places that could be named.

According to the Australian Review of Reviews, the question of trade depression and drink is much the same as in England, only worse. New South Wales has accomplished the astonishing feat of pouring down its own throat during five years more than the sum total of all its loans, or the cost of all its railways. "All the gold, and coal, and iron which this richest of colonies produces in fifty years, it drinks in ten!" The writer may well say that "the financial difficulties of the colony are only skin deep. The sacrifice of every fourth glass of beer would bring them to an abrupt end." Sin is both stupid and costly, whether on this side of the world or the other. Learned things will be said on our commercial panics, but none so true as that to cease sinning would stop them.

The report of the Mansion House Council on the Dwellings of the Poor is a document which shows that if we are to keep the Government, the County Council, and the magistrates up to their work, we cannot do better than establish a voluntary association for stimulating them. It testifies that every day's post brings the Council complaints from all classes of society, and that during the last year they have dealt with upwards of 10,000 cases from the central office alone. Even authorities whose business it is to put the law in force are made prompt and vigorous by knowing that they have a resolute public opinion behind them. Since 1885, the year after this Council came into existence, with two exceptions, every local authority has doubled, trebled, or quadrupled its staff of inspectors, and in a great many cases has done even more than that. So much attention given to the homes of the poor cannot, if they do their duty, but have considerable effect in removing at any rate their insanitary condition.

Ipswich has an admirable Society which appears to consist of only one member, who is called "Honorary Administrator." Society? No, it is a "Private Benevolent Fund," and is now ten years old. It aims at aiding families in temporary distress without publishing their need, or allowing them to be pauperised. "Many homes," says the modest report, which is printed on a sheet of note-paper, "are broken up for a less sum than is often spent upon an evening's pleasure; hundreds are made paupers for a few shillings; the sufferings of the sick are prolonged, and their return to work delayed, for the want of nourishment, which might be procured for less than the cost of a rich man's dinner. And many a man out of work is so reduced for want of food that he has not the strength to keep at work when he gets it. This fund exists for the purpose of preventing this misery, wreck, and ruin." Orphans are cared for; distressed persons receive orders on tradesmen; sewing machines, mangles, new boots for boys and girls are bought; rent and funeral expenses are paid, etc. Rev. Wickham Tozer, Honorary Administrator, who has done so good a work through his Labour Bureau, has here created another type of good works which might be advantageously adopted in many other places.

Dr. Strong says, in his book "The New Era," "This generation is more charitable, but many a man in this day lays the flattering unction to his soul that he is 'tolerant,' 'liberal-minded,' when in point of fact he is so shallow-souled as to be simply indifferent to all truth, and perhaps indifferent to wickedness as well, a more dangerous state of mind than that of the bigot, and a more contemptible character. The bigot is narrow, but intense. He believes something firmly enough to sacrifice for it other people, at least, and very likely himself." This characteristic of the generation is chiefly seen in large towns, where people wander from preacher to preacher, and get into a way of thinking that "one man, and one church, is as good as another," and "the teaching amounts to much the same thing." If Romish teaching were applied in the form of a faggot, they might be of another mind. People generally learn only from experience, and that their own experience.

It is said by Dr. Lyman Abbott that there are wards in great American cities where "there are actually more men, women, and children to the square foot of land than there are of bodies in any cemetery in the country." The same, we suppose, may be said of many of our English cities. This means the loss of home; millions of our people who have a bed to lie on, and a roof above their head are total strangers to everything that is meant by the sacred word home. All the restraining, refining, and comforting influence which is generated in the humblest cottage where parents and children can meet in privacy and live as a family, is lost, and society misses one of the strongest bonds that can hold it together. The exaggerated individualism of great cities is one of their most striking and most unpleasant features, and in no class does it appear more plainly than in the poor gipsies of the street, who wander about held by no ties. That American physician who is said to have made fifty thousand visits among New York tenements, made a remark which is apposite to this sad state of things: "I think if I were going to uplift the masses I should first uplift the landlords. I would make it possible for each human being that lives in the slums to have a home."

What an advantage it would be to Christian travellers if there were places in the country and on the Continent where they could be received in the same manner as at Cliff, in Derbyshire. Christians find it difficult to meet congenial society abroad. If Christian families would open their houses to remunerative visitors, it would often be a material advantage.

World-Wide Evangelisation.—2.

Conferences are being held at Keswick and other places in Britain, at which many of those deeply interested in world-wide evangelisation will be present.

Is it, then, not eminently fitting to be reminded at this time of the persecutions that have fallen, and are falling on our persecuted brothers and sisters in Christ—the Russian "Stundists." Far be it from us to say a word to wrong the Russian Government or the Russian Church. It is known over the world that the Russian Church declares in its standards that a man can be saved through reading the Bible without the intervention of any man.

All the more, then, should we at this special time of persecution pray for Russia, and for our afflicted fellow believers, and this the more humbly when the pages of our own history tell how cruelly Britons have persecuted Britons; and let us be encouraged, too, when we remember how much America's Christianity owes to British fugitives fleeing across the Atlantic to escape from British persecution. It is true such fugitives may not be salaried missionaries. But then, years since, there was published in The Christian a remarkable letter from Dr. Hudson Taylor, saying how he had ceased to pay native Chinese missionaries because it hindered their usefulness, and that afterwards their fruitfulness, for the shorter time they could give gratuitously, was greater than when they had been paid for services the whole time. Dr. Taylor was careful to add that there may have been no fault with the men. But when the prejudice against them of being paid by the foreigner was removed, not only was the fruit far greater, but the Society was saved from paying their salaries.

Now, then, should we not, first, sincerely pray for the Bible-loving Greek Church, embracing so many millions; and next for the poor crushed and down-trodden Russian Stundists.

Surely we never can expect the world to be evangelised by sustained missionaries only. Though Paul may have been sustained at times, yet no one supposes that the thousands scattered out of Jerusalem, and who went everywhere spreading the name of the Lord Jesus, were sustained. Yet it is recorded (Acts xi. 21), "And the hand of the Lord was with them, and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord."

In conclusion, pray—(1) for the hundreds of regular missionaries. But (2) do also pray for the tens of thousands of converted natives, that they in their thousands and tens of thousands may go (as Dr. Hudson Taylor's Chinese went) everywhere transparently unpaid to the eyes of their heathen fellow-countrymen. And pray that more and more truly converted and unpaid Jews and Jewesses may likewise be pressed out by the Holy Ghost, to testify earnestly of Christ to their unbelieving fellow-countrymen; and depend upon it an unbelieving Israelite will appreciate this difference.

Reginald Radcliffe.

THE ADVANCE OF POPERY.—A correspondent writes: "The Surrey Times, reporting the ordination held in the private chapel of the Bishop of Winchester, in Farnham Castle, on Trinity Sunday, says:—'The heavy oak panellings of the chapel were relieved at the altar by the appearance of a brass crucifix, with vases of choice flowers on the holy table.' In these 'perilous times,' it seems to me that your readers should have their attention called to such an attitude in one who is held to be an 'Evangelical Bishop.' If the statement be untrue, an opportunity will thus be afforded of putting the error right."

Spiritualism.

Our acquaintance with the alleged phenomena of Spiritualism covers a period of more than thirty years. In the days of our youth we eagerly read all the treatises on occult science within our reach. At that period nothing was too marvellous to awaken doubt. Greatly interested in the possibility of opening communication between two worlds apparently so thoroughly shut off from each other, it never occurred to us to question the propriety of making such an attempt. In later years we have learned to think differently. For a long time we have entertained a strong prejudice against any endeavour on the part of the living to hold converse with the dead. Nor is this without warrant in Scripture. Witchcraft in all its varied forms is expressly forbidden by the Word of God.

We frankly confess we do not believe there can be any real intercourse between the living and the dead. Beatified saints can have no wish to revisit the scene of their sins and sorrows; while the lost can hardly possess the power to leave their prison-house at will. Therefore, we had a strong conviction that if there were any messages from the unseen, they were mediated, not by our friends who had left us, but by demons who were never far away. In this belief, we stedfastly refused for many years to be present at any séance in which spirits were supposed to convey messages to their friends on earth.

Nevertheless, a time came when our duty as a public teacher demanded a personal investigation of the phenomena of Spiritualism. For three nights, a month apart in each case, we joined a circle of advanced believers in the reality of spirit intercourse, assembled at headquarters in Bloomsbury. Sitting in profound darkness, we both heard and saw much of an unusual character, but nothing, we are bound to say, beyond the skill of Maskelyne and Cooke. If asked to give a candid opinion of the performance on each occasion, we should have no hesitation in calling it clever conjuring, and nothing more.

Nevertheless, subsequent investigation has led to the belief that so-called Spiritualism is not all trickery. Probably it is nine-tenths trickery and one-tenth reality. But of what does this fraction of one-tenth consist? Certainly not of communications from the dead who have passed into another sphere; so far, rather, as we are able to judge, the messages are sent by the emissaries of him who has been a liar from the beginning. At all events the attitude of Christians toward these phenomena ought not to be doubtful. Unfortunately we are not in this life outside the range of the great deceiver. To place ourselves still more directly within his power is gross folly no less than great sin. Any dallying with the powers of darkness can only expose ourselves to appalling spiritual danger. Let who will undertake experiments of this kind we must firmly decline to be of their company. Satanic influences are too near and frequent already, and it is the highest unwisdom voluntarily to seek their increase. The only spirit with whom communion may be safely indulged is the Holy Spirit of God. Phos.

POOR ITALIANS IN LONDON.—Dr. C. Stander writes from the Italian Home, 34, John-street, Bedford-row, W.C.:—"Nearly every day we have schools and classes, and Divine service on Sunday. The less fit are persuaded and helped to emigrate or return to Italy. In the few years that the Home has been opened the good fruit has been remarkable. The padroni business is broken up, night broils are silenced, private vendettas are a thing of the past among them; even vagabondage has been greatly reduced. Those who have helped us should feel that they have had a hand in a good work."

Reunion? or Union?

Three subjects specially absorb the attention of Evangelical Christians at the present time. (1) Our need of the promised power of the Spirit, (2) the evangelisation of the world, (3) the return of our Lord. And these three agree in one. For the promise of the Spirit and of power was given by the risen Saviour, solely in order to qualify his witnesses to testify of Him in Jerusalem and all Judea, and in Samaria, and to the uttermost parts of the earth. The end of this age, consummated by his return, is consequent upon the preaching of this Gospel of the Kingdom in all the inhabited earth, for a witness of God's love, unto all the nations.

A fourth subject might be mentioned, viz. the union of Christians. But this can only follow, and cannot precede, the obedience of the churches to the great commission, to evangelise the world. Wherever Christians are gathered together in a town or a country, and do not make the preaching of the Gospel to the world their primary business, contentions and divisions invariably arise. We cannot hasten the coming of the day of God, except as witnesses of Christ; the Bride cannot make herself ready, whether by gathering in her members, or by growing in grace, apart from preaching the Good Tidings of the Grace of God who sitteth on the Throne of Grace.

Canon Curteis having been invited by Dr. Lunn to the Reunion Conference at Lucerne, and being unable to go, wrote a warm and appreciative reply, to which prominence was given by Dr. Lunn, and which has, to use the Canon's expression, "got into the vortex of the daily papers." He, therefore, writes to The Times explaining his position as to Reunion:

> The point is this: If we are in earnest in trying to transform the present jealousy and rivalry between Churchmen and Dissenters into friendliness and co-operation, there must be "give and take" on both sides. What has the Church of England to give? She could push a long step further, without the slightest sacrifice of principle, the release of her Bishops from their onerous attendance in the House of Lords. She could, at a great sacrifice of money power, submit to tithe redemption, and then relieve the cruel poverty of her clergy by better distribution. And she could cease to irritate every Dissenting communion to madness by claiming that Board school teachers (of all people in the world) should do the work of her clergy, and should give the children not only a common ground-work of religion on which every communion can afterwards build its own superstructure, but the full dogmatic system of the Church. .....What, on the other hand, is there that Dissenters ought to concede to us? There is one concession, and that, surely, in view of the infinite freedom of speech and ritual and organisation all around us, no very burdensome a request, on which the universal feeling of Churchmen ought to be considered; it is, in a word, episcopal ordination as sealing and completing every other imperfect form of holy order. If friendliness and brotherly kindness, now so happily in process of restoration, should lead those noble and Christian men whom we have learnt to esteem and love, toward this concession to our old-world feelings, what is there that need keep us much longer apart? There would still be some outsiders, no doubt; and some would prefer the mechanical uniformity of Rome; but a vast mass of faithful men—united (like the seven-branched sacred lamp) at the base, and then exhibiting, each apart, its special grace or gift of the manifold Spirit of Christ—would present an invincible front against all the powers of darkness, maintaining both freedom and unity, both evangelical truth and apostolical order.

We heartily recognise the courteous, generous, and candid spirit of Canon Curteis, and think that from his point of view as a "Churchman" his argument is reasonable and fair. At Grindelwald last year the principle of episcopal ordination was warmly accepted by some leading speakers who were not Churchmen. Probably many Nonconformists, however, would find serious objection. But writing not as Churchmen or Nonconformists, but as Christians, members of "the Church which is his body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all," we are obliged to say that in our judgment ordination of any kind, episcopal or otherwise, does not come into the question of Christian union or unity. Union on any plane is not of the outward body, but the inward heart—is not material, but spiritual. For example: a family is a corporate unity; but though its members may live together, if there be no heart union we speak of them as a disunited family.

Two of the four Lambeth proposals relate to "the clergy," as though "the clergy" constituted the Church; whereas the Church constitutes the clergy—God's cleros, God's heritage. The requirement of episcopal ordination, carrying with it the exclusive right to administer "the sacraments," is an impossible basis for unity in the estimation of Christians who build only upon the Word of God. He says, "Let them measure the pattern." To make some human modification of or addition to the pattern, is not only to introduce defect into the building, but to commit an offence against the Architect. Every believer in the Lord Jesus Christ is one with every other believer by the act and deed of the Builder and Maker of the City of God. Christian unity consists in recognising this truth, and in loyally acting upon it.

The Reunion of Christendom is an impossible dream, and would be useless and mischievous even were it possible. For Christendom is that field wherein the enemy has sowed tares, which cannot be united with the wheat, but must be gathered out by the angels at the end of the age, and bound in bundles for the burning. But as the children of the Kingdom fulfil their one mission in the world—to sow the seed, which is "The Word of the Kingdom"—not to establish their own sect, they will be drawn together by love which is the bond of perfectness, and collectively as well as individually will be endued with the power of the Holy Ghost. LIFE IN THE CONVENT.

During last week, at Weymouth and Bournemouth, Miss Golding, the escaped nun, told her painful story of twenty-five years in a convent: her escape, and the cruelties, immoralities, and poisonings practised there. At Bournemouth, Father Cooney asked for names of places and other particulars, and urged that a committee of inquiry should be formed to obtain information as to the truth or otherwise of Miss Golding's statements. That lady gave the names of at least ten Continental convents to which her statements applied, and she adhered emphatically to every word she had said.

At the close the following resolution was carried unanimously, with the exception of a few Roman Catholics:—

> That this meeting is of opinion that provision should be made for the due inspection of convents in the United Kingdom, and with that view this meeting would regard with favour the introduction into Parliament of a Bill for the purpose of providing for such inspection, and having especial regard to the Canon Laws on the subject of convents. This meeting is further of opinion that whereas inmates of cloistered convents are unable to communicate to the outer world their desires (where they have such) of ceasing to remain therein, it is desirable that they should, by means of such inspection, be placed in a position to indicate their wishes to the public authorities; and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Prime Minister and the Marquis of Salisbury.

It was also agreed to form a committee to seek authentication of Miss Golding's assertions, and steps were taken for the formation of such committee.

These meetings were arranged by Mr. Edward Littleton, hon. sec. North Sussex Protestant Parliamentary Council.

A PARLIAMENTARY RETURN shows that 278 licences were refused last year, but of these twenty-five were granted on appeal.

The Key-Notes of Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

LOVE: OUR SIDE.

In its deepest sense love is the perquisite of Christianity. There is something like it, in germ, at least, outside the school of Christ, just as wild flowers on the hedgerows recall the rich splendour of the hothouse. But in all such there are flaws, traces of selfishness and passion, which prevent their realising God's fair ideal. Love, as the Bible uses the word, is the fruit of the Spirit. It may be grafted on the natural stock, but it is essentially his creation.

To feel towards enemies what others feel towards friends—to descend as rain and sunbeams on the unjust as well as the just—to minister to those who are unprepossessing and repellent as others minister to the attractive and winsome—to be always the same, not subject to moods or fancies or whims, to suffer long, to take no account of evil, to rejoice with the truth, to bear, believe, hope and endure all things, never to fail—this is love, and such love is the achievement of the Holy Spirit alone.

Eph. i. 4. God's election points to this love.—Men have sometimes thought and spoken of God's choice in such a way as to foster an exclusive and proud conceit, as though God's election were a high wall enclosing a favoured few, so that their flower and fruit might be kept from every defiling, pilfering hand. To think this is to misconceive the entire purpose of God.

We do not deny that God has enclosed us from the great moorland waste, or that He has expended on us special pains and care; but He has not gone to this expenditure for us or for Himself, but that the perfume of our love might be wafted afar; that we might fertilise desert places, as bees carry the pollen in their down; and that thirsty souls might be refreshed by our rare fruitage, wrought for us by the Holy Spirit. We were chosen to love, to love God above all, and to love man, made in his image.

If a man boast of his election in an arrogant and exclusive spirit, he shows that he has missed its point and aim, and is certainly outside its scope. The eternal purpose of God reveals itself, not merely in the new-found rapture, but in the new-found love. The love of God proves the election of God. If you do not love, you may prate of election as you will, but you have neither part nor lot in it. But if we are in Christ, by a living faith, we have been chosen to love, and love must be divinely possible, nay—easy. God's choice always carries with it an equivalent of power.

Eph. i. 15. Love and faith are inseparable.—When there is faith in the Lord Jesus, there will always be love toward all the saints, because faith is the faculty of taking God into the heart. Faith is God-receptiveness. Faith appropriates the nature of God, as the expanded lung does the mountain air, or as the child does the parent's gift. Faith, like a narrow channel, conveys God's ocean fulness into the lagoons of human needs. Wherever, therefore, faith links the believer to the Lord Jesus, his nature, which is love, pure as mountain dew, begins to flow in to the waiting, expectant heart, and then to flow out thence towards all the saints.

The love of God knows no favourite sect. It singles out no special school; but, as the sun and wind of nature, breathes and shines alike on all. It is cosmopolitan and universal. You cannot imprison it within the walls of any one Christian community. It laughs at your restrictions, and with equal grace raises up witnesses and standard-bearers from all parts of the Church. Thus as we become liker God, our love overleaps the barrier of our little pond and passes out to embrace all saints and to expend itself on the great world of men.

Eph. iii. 17. It is only as we love that we apprehend Christ's Love.—The R.V. is very emphatic. The Apostle asked that his Ephesian converts might be strengthened with power through the Spirit in the inner man; that Christ might dwell in their hearts through faith; to the end that, being rooted and grounded in love, they might be strong to apprehend, with all saints, the love of Christ. How remarkable this stress on strength! Why is it so needful in connection with love?

Is it that we should be strong to obey the least promptings of the gracious Master, Christ? Is it that we need strength to suppress ourselves in favour of the new passion which has entered our hearts, until it shall have become all-powerful? Is it that the flower of Divine love in its most perfect form can only be grafted on a strong stock? Any of these suppositions may meet the case. But we must be strengthened ere we can receive the indwelling Lord, and one chief result of his presence within is to make us strong to apprehend his love.

Rooted in love.—The rootlets that moor a tree to the soil and gather nutriment for its growth are very slender and delicate. So the actions to which the Spirit prompts us on behalf of others may seem very trivial, but each one gives us greater constancy and strength, and makes us quicker to understand Christ's love to us.

A grounded solid foundation is all-important for the building which is to tower into the air, affording distant glimpses of the landscape; and those who desire to behold, as in panorama, the love of God must be content to perform many deeds of unselfish goodness in the depths of obscurity and self-forgetfulness. What we do for others for Christ's sake, and what we feel towards them, is a priceless education, preparing us to know his love. Perform loving deeds; will to do them, even if you at first shrink from them: do them from a sense of duty, if not of delight; presently you will come to delight in them, and you will say to yourself as you go to and fro, "This is something like Jesus feels towards me." Love apprehends love.

But love never lives alone. It summons all saints to its aid. No one saint or school of devout thinkers can compass all God's love. He who has ascended Snowdon from Llanberis must take counsel with those who left Beddgelert and Capel Curig in the early morning, that each may detail the glories he has seen, and so together they apprehend the majestic beauty of the entire mountain, as no one could of himself.

Eph. iv. 2, 15, 16. Love should be the atmosphere of our church relationships.—The unity or oneness of the Spirit is a Divine reality, which we have not to make but to keep. Try as we may we cannot make it a whit more perfect than it is. No bases of agreement, no conferences or conventions can do this. But we are called upon to give all diligence, that the Divine ideal may be realised, so far as possible, among the saints. There will never be uniformity, but there may be unity. The pipes in the great organ will never be all of the same length or tone, but they may be inflated by the same breath and conspire to utter the same melody.

It must be our endeavour to guard against everything that would jar with the inner unity of the Spirit. Jealousy, bickering, harsh words, uncharitable misrepresentations—these must be under the ban of the loving soul. We must forbear one another in love.

It is often necessary to proclaim the truth, to defend it in the pulpit or the drawing-room, to enforce it to individuals to whom it may be extremely unpalatable. But love must prompt the speech and control the utterance. It is not enough to speak the truth, we must speak it in love. When a minister told the sainted McCheyne that on the previous Sunday he had preached the awful doom of the ungodly, he replied, "I hope you preached tenderly." Oh for more of the spirit of the Apostle, who spoke with weeping of those that were enemies of the cross of Christ!

It is when there is perfect love between us and our fellow-believers, that the grace of God can pass easily from one to another, through every busy point of supply, and through the working in due measure of every part. If we are out of fellowship with any, to that extent we cannot impart to them, or they to us. But when love pervades the body as the genial spring-warmth the woodlands, there is an up-building and out-flowering in love. Each gives to another, and gets as he gives.

Eph. v. 2, 25, 28, 33. Human love should be modelled on the divine.—It is no ordinary love to which we are summoned. Whether in the home circle, where man and wife live in each other's presence, or in the daily walk and conversation of life, we are to imitate God, as his dear children. It is not enough to love as our fellows do. We must love as Christ did. Our one ideal must be, "as Christ loved."

To love foes to make them friends. To love in the teeth of obloquy and shame. To love to the point of self-giving and blood. To love the foul till the pollution gives place to purity and beauty. Such is the love of Christ. Let us sit at his feet and learn of Him, until we reflect Him, and are changed into the same image from glory to glory. Oh, to love like Thee, blessed Master, and that we may fill us with thy love until our cup run over.

Eph. vi. 24. Our love must be sincere.—There are plenty who say Lord, Lord, but who do not the things that He says. It is easy to be profuse in our expressions, and readily swayed by gusts of emotion, and yet to be heartless and loveless. But such do not love with sincerity. They resemble the shallow soil, where the seed soon fructifies, and as soon dies, because there is only rock beneath. For such the Apostle had no words of benediction.

But wherever there is sincere love to Jesus, however weak and ignorant the disciple, there is a member of the mystical body, the Church, and one on whom our benediction may alight. You may not speak our Shibboleth or accept our creed, but if you sincerely love Jesus we bid you welcome and wish you grace.

Spirit of God, baptise us in God's holy fire, that we may begin to glow with the sacred flame, and be burning ones indeed!

BLESSING AT MUSSOORIE.

There have recently been such refreshing showers of grace and blessing in this beautiful Himalayan station that we feel we would like to tell what the Lord has done here, so that his people elsewhere may rejoice and praise Him with us.

In response to our invitation, Captain J. A. Gibbon, R.E., came from Multan to hold a series of special services at Mussoorie from the 12th of June to the 19th. Three meetings were held daily, one for prayer at 8 o'clock in the morning, which was indeed a season of earnest waiting upon God for definite blessing; another at 11 a.m. for the deepening of spiritual life; and an open-air service for young people and children at 5.30 p.m., on the Walnut Grove tennis grounds, kindly lent us for the purpose.

The daily 11 o'clock meeting, at which Captain Gibbon set forth clearly and fully our privileges and blessings in Christ, was largely attended by Christians of all denominations, and missionaries from different parts of India, who had come up here for rest and bodily health, were overjoyed to find spiritual refreshment too. The Y.M.C.A. hall was crowded every day, chairs often having to be placed in the passage for those who could not find room inside.

"It is just like Keswick," many were heard to exclaim during this delightful week; and, indeed, it was like it in more ways than one. The perfect unity in Christ Jesus, the hearty co-operation of Christians of all denominations, the spirit of deep earnestness, and the warmth and kindliness, no less than the subject that engaged our thoughts, and the familiar hymns of consecration and faith, recalled the Keswick Convention to all those who had ever been privileged to attend it.

God has done great things for us—souls have been won to Christ; the Lord's people have been led into deeper rest and rejoicing, and to some an entirely new pathway of power and victory has been opened up. Our hearts are full of gladness and thanksgiving, and we are looking forward (if it be God's will) to some more "Keswick meetings" in the autumn.

The children's open-air services, at which there was daily an average attendance of about 300, carried our thoughts back to the delightful outdoor meetings of the Children's Special Service Mission at home, the hymn-sheets from which we sang, and the beautiful Picture Leaflets (supplied by the Mission) which were distributed, reminding us more than ever of those happy gatherings which some of us will always recollect with pleasure and gratitude. Captain Gibbon's bright simple addresses were listened to with interest, and we believe the truth went home to many a heart. These are the first open-air services that Mussoorie has seen, and we trust they will not be the last.

We would ask God's people to join with us in prayer for a further outpouring of his Holy Spirit on this large and important Indian station.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

THE FIFTH TRUMPET.

The first four trumpets have sounded; the four winds of heaven have been loosed, and with terrific fury desolated the "third part" of the earth; the successive Gothic invasions have overrun the Western "third" of the Roman Empire; its sun has set; its fall has come.

But three trumpets remain; and these are declared by the voice of an angel flying in the midst of heaven to be heralds of "woes" of more intense character than the events hitherto prefigured. One of these, the seventh, is "THE LAST TRUMP!"

Our subject now is the fifth trumpet, which introduces a vision, described at greater length and with fuller symbolism than those which have preceded it.

We should endeavour to take our stand in imagination by the side of the Prophet as he beholds the extraordinary scene which is now made to pass before him in panoramic fashion: and thus picture to ourselves the apparition on that part of the earth over which the light still shines, of the smokeclouds from the abyss, and of the strange, weird hordes of locusts, combining the characteristics of men and women, horses and scorpions. The whole sky is darkened; a terrible, hurtling sound, "as of chariots and of many horses running to battle," is heard around; the terror and miseries of mankind under the torments of the scorpion stings are everywhere manifest; the awful name of the leader of this unearthly host is disclosed; they are under Satanic guidance; and the period during which their destructive presence shall continue is declared. It is indeed "a woe to the inhabiters of the earth."

In this vision we have an instance of that mingled use of symbolic and literal terms to which reference was made in the preceding paper; but it is evident that the greater part consists of symbols, which must be interpreted. And we are not without a clue, for, though the present vision contains many things peculiar to itself, we have in the Old Testament an explanation of its main feature, namely, the locusts themselves.

The powers that in succession arose to execute the judgments of God upon his backsliding people were foretold by the prophet Joel under the forms of the palmerworm, the locust, the cankerworm, and the caterpillar, and Jewish interpretation regarded those figures as denoting the armies of the Assyrians, the Persians, the Macedonians (or Grecians), and the Romans.

In that prophecy they are spoken of as the army of the Lord, and as symbolising the "rule of the heathen" (or Gentile powers) over the land and people of God. Their appearance (see ch. ii.) is in some respects very similar to that of the locusts in the present vision; and the consequences of the visitation are described in much the same terms.

The invasion of Israel by Pul, King of Assyria, recorded in 2 Kings xv. 19, 20, was shown to Amos the prophet, under the symbol of grasshoppers (or locusts), devouring the grass of the land (Am. vii. 1, 3). The "crowned captains" of Nineveh were compared to the "locusts," or "great grasshoppers," (Nah. iii. 17), and the armies of the Medes, which were to overthrow Babylon, were also likened to caterpillars (Jer. ii. 15).

We may therefore, speaking generally, consider the locusts under the sixth seal as figuring some terrible overspreading scourge that was to come upon the earth—that Roman world which throughout is the scene of Apocalyptic prophecy—an infliction which should have a peculiarly Satanic character, originating from the "abyss" and guided by none other than the prince of the power of the air, or, as he is here termed, "the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name is in the Hebrew tongue Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon" (i.e. Destroyer).

What, then, was this scourge of apostatising Christendom; what destructive agency did the vision represent? The best way, perhaps, of expounding the prophecy will be by at once saying that among historical commentators there is almost universal agreement in understanding the fifth trumpet as describing the Saracenic invasion of Eastern Europe. We can then examine the minute symbolism of the passage and judge the correctness of the interpretation; and I venture to think that if the object of the vision was to exhibit to the seer in panoramic and symbolic form the rise and early progress of Mohammedanism, and its influence upon Christendom, it would have been impossible to present the event in a more expressive manner.

First, then, it was made apparent that the plague was diabolical in its origin and direction. It was from this bottomless pit that the darkening cloud arose; the king over them was its "angel." There can be no doubt that the Mohammedan imposture, the religion of the False Prophet, the gigantic power which has withstood Christianity for more than twelve centuries, and still rules the minds of hundreds of millions in Europe, Africa, and the East, was the direct work of Satan. This fact by no means interferes with the employment by God of Saracen and Ottoman to chastise the professing Church. Instances of such dealing on the part of the Almighty are familar to us all, and occur at every stage of Old Testament history.

Next, the locusts were the locally appropriate symbols of the people they represented. As the vine, the fig, the olive, were apt symbols of Israel, the reed and the crocodile of Egypt, the wild ass of Ishmael, the eagle of Edom, so the locust which is indigenous to Arabia, "the wilderness wherein were scorpions," the region from which the "east wind brought the locusts," and whence also the Midianites came "as grasshoppers for multitude"—the name Arbah for locust (Ju. vi. 5) being akin to Arbi, an Arab—would expressively denote the geographical source of the irruption. The horse-like appearance would, moreover, afford another identification with Arabia, so peculiarly associated with that animal.

The characteristic features of the symbolic creatures point almost unmistakably in the same direction. "The faces of men" described the bearded countenances, as distinguished from the Goths, who are referred to by Jerome as having faces shaven and smooth, like women's faces. "The crowns like gold" on their heads would present the "turbaned" appearance of the hosts, to whom, as an Arab proverb says, God has given "turbans instead of diadems"; and it is, as similarly attired, that Ezekiel (ch. xxiii. 42) speaks of the Sabæan or Keturite Arabs as "Sabæans from the wilderness, which put beautiful crowns upon their heads." These two features of the Arabs are specified by Pliny, St. John's contemporary, when he describes them as wearing the turban, having the hair long and uncut, with the moustache on the upper lip, or the beard, that "venerable sign of manhood," as Gibbon, in Arab phraseology, calls it. The long hair, as of women, is often spoken of in the Arab poem, Antar (the Ossian of the Arabs), and might further denote the effeminate licentiousness of the Moslems, while the "breastplate of iron" was a special feature of the Arab warriors of the sixth and seventh centuries.

What, in the next place, was the commission of the locust horde, with its lionlike ferocity, its equine swiftness, and its tormenting [scorpion sting? "Their power was to hurt men five months"—"those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads." In other words, the desolating scourge was to have for its object apostate Christendom, which, in the language of the next vision, was now almost wholly given over to the "worship of demons (the deified dead), of idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and wood," and was steeped in "murders, and sorceries, and fornications, and thefts"; a condition of things described by Gibbon when he says that "the Christians of the seventh century had relapsed into the semblance of Paganism, their public and private vows were addressed to images and relics that disgraced the temples of the earth, and the throne of the Almighty was darkened by a cloud of martyrs, saints, and angels, the objects of popular veneration."

Accordingly we find that Mahomet's charge to his followers was to execute judgment against the idolaters of the earth, and especially against the Christians of the Roman Empire, who, by their worship of the Virgin Mary, had, even in his view, become idolaters. And the command of the Caliph Abubeker to the Saracens on their first invasion of Syria ran thus: "Destroy no palm trees, nor any fields of corn, cut down no fruit trees, nor do any mischief to cattle."

It was in 629 A.D. that the Saracens first issued from Arabia into Syria, with proclamation of war against Christendom. Damascus, Jerusalem, Egypt, the African Provinces, Spain, fell under their sway successively. In ten years, from 634 to 644, they took 3600 cities and castles, destroyed 4000 churches, and built 1400 Mohammedan mosques. Who can imagine the terrible "torment" that their conquests inflicted? The capitulators deprived the conquered of the use of arms, imposed the most degrading social conditions, prohibited the erection of churches, and made their lives a burden to them. As the condition of the Jews in Babylon was described, when it was said, "Death shall be chosen rather than life by all the residue of them that remain of this evil family, in all the places whither I have driven them" (Jer. viii. 3), so was the wretchedness of these here predicted, to whom the common language was "Ye Christian dogs, ye know your option: the Koran, the tribute, or the sword."

Twice it is declared that this "torment" or "hurting" of men was to be for "five months." According to the year-day interpretation of prophetic periods, which will be explained in a succeeding paper, this would imply a period of 150 years (i.e. five months of thirty days each). Dating the commencement of the Saracenic woe from the year of Mahomet's public proclamation of his prophetic mission, 612 A.D., the 150 years would terminate in 762, the year in which Saracenic aggression practically ceased, and the Caliphate was removed to Bagdad. "War," says Gibbon, "was no longer the passion of the Saracens—there the luxury of the Caliphs relaxed the nerve, and terminated the progress of the Arabian Empire."

Such are the principal features in the vision beheld by the Apostle under the fifth trumpet. If so important an event as the Saracenic invasion of the Roman Empire, and fraught with such consequences to both the Church and the world was to be prophetically represented by symbols, could a more accurate or striking method of prefiguration have been adopted? I am aware that some, who do not apprehend the character of symbolic prophecy, are inclined to regard such interpretation as has just been advanced as fanciful and arbitrary. But if it be conceded that much of prophecy, whether in Old or New Testament, is symbolic, it is difficult to see the ground for such objection, especially when it is remembered that lions, bears, leopards, horses, rams, goats, fowls, grasshoppers, and worms, with a number of other objects, were all employed by God to denote and prefigure the course of earthly history in preceding times. Such objectors may well be asked to furnish an alternative interpretation. It has not yet been forthcoming.

"THE WORLD FOR CHRIST."

O Saviour, satisfy thy soul,
And of thy travail fully see:
Thy yearning heart doth crave the whole,
The world, the world, O Christ, for Thee!
From East to West, from pole to pole,
O Saviour, satisfy thy soul!

Oh, let thy way on earth be known,
Thy saving health to all be spread,
That they who sit in deepest gloom
May see thy glorious light instead;
O let the world with one accord,
Let all the people praise Thee, Lord.

For ever, though they know it not,
For Thee, the nations wait and cry,
And ever, though they know it not,
For this they thirst, and faint, and die—
The "Drink indeed," the healing tide,
The Blood and Water from thy side.

O Thou, to whom all power is given,
O tender Love, O awful Might,
Speed on the day, when through this world
Thy saints shall shout with great delight—
"Our Christ is on his glorious throne,
And all the kingdoms are his own."

And while we say, "Thy Kingdom come,"
May we thy Kingdom help to bring,
By deeds and alms and earnest prayer,
As faithful children of our King:
O may we deeply zealous be
To win the nations, Lord, for Thee.

O Saviour, satisfy thy soul,
Thou shalt indeed be satisfied,
By myriad hosts, by countless throngs;
And we may tell them Thou hast died;
Oh! awful joy, oh! honour high,
To help thy soul to satisfy.

THE DOUBTING SWALLOW.

A PARABLE IN RHYME.

By Henry Thorne, Evangelist.

What is all this stir in the swallows' world,
This fluttering of wing and heart?
'Tis time to migrate, and the anxious birds
Are preparing to depart.

But one of the birds has declined to fly
To the new world warm and fair;
He will not believe there is such a place,
Because he has not been there.

Like men who declare that beyond the grave
There can be no world of light,
Just because its walls are above the ken
Of their puny sense of sight.

The doubting bird had a bird for a friend
(For swallows help each other),
And found in his friend, as the sequel shows,
A well-instructed brother.

Sagacious and kind, his friend was a bird
Who knew how to cope with doubt;
To him he repaired in his unbelief
And argued the matter out.

"How can I know," he inquired of his friend,
"That over yon trackless sea
I shall find in the warmth of sunny climes
A home that will do for me?"

"You may know quite well," said the feathered mate,
"For your nature tells you so,
As it makes you long for that far-off land,
And bids you arise and go."

"Sentiment, this," said the sceptical bird;
"Such feelings can be no guide;
I fear if I follow them I shall find
A grave in yon rising tide."

"Ill thought and ill said," the other replied,
"Thy schooling has been in vain.
Go back to the school in which you were trained,
And look at your books again.

"Was Nature no guide when your mother built
The nest that she made for you?
She had not been trained in the building trade,
But she knew just what to do.

"When caring for you she burrowed the earth
In quest of your needed fare,
Not vain was her quest, for instinct ne'er seeks
For something that is not there.

"When craving for food you opened your mouth,
Say, was it always for nought?
Did reason subdue the craving for food,
Fearing that none would be brought?

"When first you longed for the pleasures of flight,
And instinct urged you to fly,
Did you then subdue this happy desire,
And say, 'It is useless to try'?

"Gladly you followed the passion divine,
Fearless, and free from all care;
No longer confined, a bird of the nest,
But a free bird of the air.

"Now, if in all else your instincts were right,
And never led you astray,
Is it not wisdom to banish your doubts
And follow their lead to-day?"

The sceptic, rebuked, was saved from the fate
That his folly might have brought;
He fled o'er the sea to a warmer clime,
And found the land he sought.

If the birds are led by unerring guides
As the trackless air they scan,
It is not in vain that we humbly seek
For some guiding star for man.

There is that in him that for ever points
To a brighter clime than this,
Where the saints of God are about his throne
In the light of perfect bliss.

Wouldst thou seek a home in that sunny land?
By the cross thy path must be;
For the light within that leads men to God
Leads them first to Calvary.

WHAT MANNER OF LOVE.

By Rev. E. Payson Hammond.

One day, as the train entered a railway station, I saw a crowd of people gathering around a little boy whom the conductor was leading out of one of our cars. Everybody in that crowd seemed anxious to get even a look at the little fellow, and so I waited around to find out what it was all about. Soon a young gentleman who knew me came and told me something which interested me very much.

This boy, who did not look over three years old, had been off alone twenty miles on the railway. And what do you think took him off so far alone? "How came his mother to let him go?" I can hear you ask. But she did not let him go; he ran away down to the station all alone, and got into the train by himself just as it was starting, and away went the little man twenty miles before anybody knew where he was.

But now you say, "What made him do such a strange thing?" I will tell you.

He loved his father very much, because his father used to be very kind to him, and bring him home toys and playthings and picture-books and candies and lots of good things. He thought there was nobody quite so good as his father, as he felt sure nobody loved him so much. But his father had some business in California, thousands of miles away, and so one day he told his wife and children that he must leave them all and go there. Little Frankie at once said, "Can't I go with you, papa?"

"No, my child; it is too far to go with me."

This made the little fellow cry bitterly. When the time came for the father to set out, little Frankie was not allowed to go to the railway station with him. But after a while he found a way to get out, and off he scampered to the station with all his might. Just as he reached there he saw a train about to start, and he thought, of course, that his father must be in that train, and into it the little boy climbed, and went all through the car, looking for his dear father. After he had ridden about twenty miles, the conductor chanced to get hold of him; and, having found out his name, telegraphed back to his mother, and then gave him to a conductor of a train they met, and thus he was taken back to Rochester to his home. It was his own brother who told me all this.

And what do you think I thought of, when I looked upon the face of that persevering little fellow, and knew how determined he had been to see his father and go with him to California? I will tell you.

I said to myself, "Oh, I wish that little children, even as young as three or four years old, were everywhere so anxious to go with the child's Guide to heaven. He has done ten thousand times more for them than ever that father did for little Frankie." This Saviour loves you my friends, more than that father loved his little boy, Frankie; and he is the only one that can take you home to your Father in heaven. He is also willing to give you a new heart, so that you will love God and all good things.

You remember that poor little Frankie was disappointed because he could not go with his father; but there never was a boy or girl who really wanted to go with Jesus but that He was ready to take them and make them fit for a useful and happy life here and a joyful life in heaven for ever.

ENGLISH HOSPITAL AT JAFFA.—Communications regarding this work, described in our last week's issue, may be sent to Colonel Morton, Conference Hall, Mildmay.

CHANGED BY PRAYER.

Mrs. A. was a widow, and, like many of God's children, she had a trouble. Of a quiet, inoffensive disposition, unwilling to give offence, from some unknown cause a person who had lately taken a room in the same house had an extreme dislike to her. Mrs. B. was a woman of a proud, arrogant spirit, and, seemed most ingenious in finding ways of annoying her neighbour. This at first produced tears and depression, but after a time Mrs. A.'s heart was filled with hot anger, and a desire for revenge took possession of her.

I was accustomed to call on her, and often we had taken sweet counsel together of the goodness and mercy that had followed us, and the bright country towards which, through sovereign grace, both our faces were turned. Now this was altered. The conversation turned to the cruel conduct of her adversary, who daily provoked her sore; even the reading of a chapter or psalm was often interrupted by the relation of some fresh insult or unkind word.

The time came for me to leave the locality, and with a heavy heart I went to say "Good-bye" to my poor friend, who was as sad as ever. In a few words of parting prayer, I was unpremeditatedly led to pour out my heart in earnest pleading for blessing for Mrs. B., and immediately light seemed to dawn on this dark affair. I said to Mrs. A., "I think there is a way out of your difficulty. Whenever you see, or hear, or think of, Mrs. B., pray for her—if you can only say, 'Lord, help and bless her.'" The suggestion was not well received, and very cool was the response to my parting handshake.

Many years passed away, and when at last we met, I was pleased to see how well and peaceful my old friend looked. After a chat on various subjects, came the rather reluctant question, "Do you know anything of Mrs. B.?" "Oh, yes; and you will be surprised to hear we are the best of friends. That morning you prayed for her, I felt much hurt. I said to myself, you had gone over to her, and instead of one friend, I had two enemies. When I next saw her, she threw out a spiteful word, and I was furiously angry, so that it made me quite faint. When I got home, I thought, 'It is not what Mrs. B. said, but my anger towards her, that has made me ill.' I don't know how I did it, but I knelt down and said, 'Lord, help and bless Mrs. B., for Jesus' sake.' From that time things began to get better. We did not make any fuss about it, but we got more friendly. Her boy was ill, and I helped to nurse him, and she is greatly changed. I believe she is a true Christian, and she is the dearest, kindest friend I ever had.

WANTED—A BOYS' LIFE BRIGADE.

Will not someone organise a Boys' Life Brigade, which shall not have for its object the instruction of lads in the use of weapons of death and destruction, but shall have for its creed Right, not Might? It should be a brigade in which boys shall learn drill, but not military drill; receive a good training in gymnastics, and have music and banners and processions; a brigade whose aim shall be to develop a noble ambition to help and save, and so become a true Boys' Defence Brigade. It might have its medals and honours for courage, pluck, and resource, and its inner legion of honour for boys who have done some noble deed of rescue or defence.

Moreover, it might have its swimming classes, and in convenient localities its rowing clubs. It might perhaps give special lessons from time to time on what to do in various kinds of danger—from fire, drowning, or accident. Its motto might run, "Be just and fear not." Who will organise such a brigade? It must be someone who has faith, courage, and enthusiasm, who possesses organising power and some power of influence and of leadership.

HOME OF REST, BROMLEY, KENT.—Poor women and girls from London are received here for rest and change. The desire of the ladies working in connection with this Home is to benefit, physically and spiritually, those who suffer from long hours of work and poor homes, with little or no relaxation and brightness. To such a fortnight in the country, in a comfortable home, surrounded by Christian influences, is a blessing and an inspiration which remains to cheer them for many a day. For 6s. a girl may be supported in the Home for a week. The treasurer is Mrs. Dennes, Thirlmere, Bromley, Kent. Inquiries may be addressed to the matron, at Ebberla House, Bromley, Kent.

STUDENT VOLUNTEER MISSIONARY UNION

CONFERENCE AT KESWICK.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

The lovely vale of Keswick has this year been the theatre of a new experiment so far as the United Kingdom is concerned. For some years America has had its Summer Schools for student missionary volunteers at Northfield and elsewhere; now they are a well-established institution across the Atlantic. In this, as in many other forward movements, we of the old country have been content to let America take the lead, but if we are less alert and less elastic in initiation, we are tenacious of a good thing when we catch hold of it, and there is every reason to hope that this new convocation will find as firm a footing in the famed Cumberland retreat as the world-known Keswick Convention has done. It has certainly made a most auspicious start.

The Student Volunteer Missionary Union (S.V.M.U.), which has brought this Conference together, is now in the second year of its existence, and it has been used of God, within a brief space of time, to awaken a large amount of interest and solicitude among the young Christian men and women of our land with respect to the evangelisation of the Heathen and Pagan world. Local conferences have been held at various collegiate centres, and the visit of several British delegates to Northfield last year moved the executive of the Union to convene a similar gathering at Keswick this summer for the days immediately preceding the larger Convention on the deepening of spiritual life. This step was amply justified, seeing that the membership of the S.V.M.U. has now reached 500. Nearly all the in the United Kingdom are represented by larger or smaller delegations. The young men students have been resident in tented camp during a week past, to the number at first of eighty or ninety, and then latterly of 150; a good many, especially from Scotland, who were unable to come last week for the summer school, came for the usual Convention of the current week. The tents on this occasion are of a larger size than in former years, each accommodating fourteen sleepers instead of five. Into this temporary community are gathered young men from Oxford, Cambridge, London (hospitals and colleges), Durham, several Welsh colleges, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dublin, and Belfast. I have not been able to ascertain that anyone is present from St. Andrews; the tide of missionary zeal does not appear to have reached the students at that Conservative cathedral city as yet.

Most of the young fellows in camp are "student volunteers," though not all. One tent is allotted to those who have already been in the mission field, and here may be found Bishop Hill, of the Niger (on whom the dignities of high office sit very lightly), Mr. Stewart, of the C.M.S., Foochow; Mr. Rees, of the L.M.S.; Mr. Smith, of the C.M.S., Uganda (a man of youthful mien and gentle ways, but who has passed through more wonderful vicissitudes and experiences than many a veteran); and others whose names I have not at command for the moment.

Altogether they are a goodly set of fellows in camp, and, if I mistake not, the names of many of them will become familiar in future missionary annals, if God sees fit to spare their lives. Perhaps the leading figure in the School—for it is much more a school than a conventional Convention—is Rev. Louis Byrde, late of Ridley Hall, Cambridge, and now a working curate in North London. He is a secretary of the S.V.M.U., and his capacity for energetic work makes his influence all-pervasive. Other leading men are Williams, of the London Hospital; Bartlet, of Mansfield College, Oxford; Maclean, of the F.C. College, Glasgow; Thomas, of Edinburgh, etc. Of the outsiders who have taken part in guiding the councils of the School, there are Dr. Barbour, of Edinburgh; Drs. Maxwell and Battersby, of London; the venerable Dr. Murray Mitchell; Mr. Wright Hay, of the Baptist Missionary Society; Mr. McCheyne Paterson, of the Church of Scotland Mission in the Punjaub; the famous lady traveller, Mrs. Bishop; Rev. J. Hudson Taylor; Dr. Harry Guinness, Dr. George Smith, of Edinburgh; Dr. Sargood Fry, Mr. Eugene Stock, and others.

It has been a real conference, with comparatively few set speeches, and much interchange of question and answer and the

and the recital of experience. The programme, set from day to day by the executive, has been a singularly varied one, and as experimental and practical as varied. Scarcely a department of missionary life or ethics—preparatory and actual; individual and collective; spiritual, mental, and physical, from the culture of the hidden life to such mundane matters as eating, drinking, and sleeping—seems to have been overlooked. In a word, the conveners have meant business and everything has been framed on that plan. The meetings have been confined to the earlier and later parts of the working day. Between one o'clock and six all work has been strictly tabooed, and recreation has been the sole item on the card. Many of the leaders of the School appeared on the platform day by day in white flannel trousers and "blazer" jackets, which gave the finishing touch of free and easy unconventionality to the whole gathering. A sprinkling of lady students has been in regular attendance and the evening assemblies have drawn a good many of the general visitors.

The meetings were appropriately held in the Volunteer Drill Hall. Erected for the schooling of our citizen army in the arts of war, there has been a beautiful fitness in turning it into a training ground for this picked band of volunteers in the great company serving under the King of Peace and Captain of Salvation. The opening meeting was on Wednesday evening, when Bishop Hill spoke impressively on the work of the Holy Spirit, and Mr. Stewart, of Foo-chow, brought into vivid relief our debt to God and to the heathen who sit in darkness. On Thursday morning there was an early prayer meeting, repeated each succeeding day. The first regular topic of consideration, at the nine o'clock session on Thursday, was "The Missionary Band." This band is a body formed in each affiliated college and university, for the express purpose of studying and encouraging the study of Missions in all their bearings. The subject of Band work was considered in detail on succeeding days.

At the next session, an hour later, there was submitted the annual report of the executive of the S.V.M.U., and also the report of Mr. Polhill-Turner, the travelling secretary of the Union for the current year. Considerable growth in numbers and interest was reported from most of the centres. Besides those who have actually enrolled themselves in the Union as volunteers, it was stated that many in the different colleges are studying the subject, with the result, it is hoped, that in due time numbers of these will also definitely lay themselves on the altar for foreign service. In outlining the policy of action for the coming year, the executive recommended branches not to aim at an increase in the number of members where there is not a good prospect of the men being able to go to the foreign field.

"FISHERS OF MEN"

was Dr. Barbour's theme in an address at the last session on Thursday morning. In a speech of great skill and suggestiveness, he urged that men should be dealt with personally according to their circumstances. In fly fishing different kinds of bait are necessary in different streams. So variety and suitability of method and means must be sought for in winning men for Christ. Some might be caught by the "athletic fly," who would not rise to any other sort of bait, and so on. In the discussion that followed there was a free interchange of experiences as to methods successfully used, and the preponderating view was that the straightforward, honest way of approaching men in personal dealing is the most fruitful in result.

BIBLE STUDY

had a leading place in the programme of the evening meetings of Thursday and Friday. On the former evening a specimen was given in outline of a Bible training class lesson, and a special subject worked out. The close, systematic, and thorough study of the Scriptures is expected of the members of the Union, not only for their own growth in the Divine life, but for equipment as soul-winners.

On Friday evening, at six o'clock, Mr. M'Lean, of Glasgow, resumed his theme of Bible Study, dealing with general principles rather than details. It was quite possible, he said, like the Pharisees of old, to spend much time in getting to know the letter of the Scripture without any real practical benefit. The promised guidance of the Holy Spirit in this study does not obviate the need of mental effort. It is well to bear in mind that the Scriptures were first written in tongues foreign to us and to people of other ages, climes, and characteristics. Some care is necessary in finding the right point of view. The Bible is largely a record of spiritual experiences, and to those who have little or no spiritual experience there will be many things in the Bible hard or even impossible to understand. The speaker counselled a reference where practicable to the original languages for the discovery of fine shades of meaning. He also commended good commentaries and lives of Christ by such men as Canon Farrar, Dr. James Stalker, and others. Another thing to be carefully noted is the progressive character of the revelation. We are not to read into the earlier Mosaic and prophetic records, the maturer light and meaning of the full-orbed Gospel that we possess in the New Testament. The "Cambridge Bible for Schools" was spoken of as an efficient help to those who do not know the originals and desire to have the results of the best and most reverent scholarship. Let special books of the Bible be read and studied as a whole, and not only piecemeal, so as to get at the motif and purpose of each individual writer.

THE GREAT DESIDERATUM

for the student is to be fully in touch with Jesus Christ of whom the Scriptures speak; but mental effort and patient research are of great value.

In the conversation that followed it was shown that "study" to be worthy of the name must involve persistency and method. Mr. Smith, of Uganda, told of the marvellous progress that has been made by the Waganda in Bible study, and he attributed it to the fact that they never enter on Scripture study without prayer for God's guidance; and any light that they gain in the study is at once communicated to their fellows. Many of these Waganda converts begin their Bible reading at six in the morning, and those having leisure continue it a great part of the day.

Dr. Murray Mitchell, while agreeing as to the folly of importing New Testament meanings into the earlier records, thought that no student, however humble, should feel discouraged. The Spirit's aid is promised in preparing the heart and applying the truth, and He will enable the student even if unlearned to get at the essence of the thing.

A student in the audience rather dissented from the President's dictum that we are not to take out of a passage meanings and interpretations which could not be in the mind of the writer. In the view of our clearer light and greater knowledge, he thought it was quite justifiable to interpret and apply a passage differently from the writer of it, as the Spirit might enable us. The President in a closing word replied that he would not exclude that method, but it needed very careful and cautious application.

The "Bible Study" hour on Saturday evening was conducted by Mr. Bartlet, a tutor in Mansfield College, Oxford, and a man of fine parts, physically and mentally. He took for the subject of a very able and philosophically-stated address, the necessity of observing due emphasis and proportion in Bible study. This can only be done properly, he contended, as Christ in his person and work is made the centre of all thought and teaching. If He gets his rightful position, all related and subsidiary doctrines will be kept in their proper place. Very weighty, indeed, were the speaker's golden words of warning against allowing divergence of view on Bible doctrines to separate Christians in feeling and love one toward another. Holding the Head, let all believers humbly esteem others better than themselves, even though they may not be able to see eye to eye on such questions as the Second Advent, Sanctification, and the like.

REPORTS OF MISSIONARY WORK

were given by various friends from different fields at the evening meetings, which were of a more general tenor than the morning conferences. On Thursday evening Mr. Rees, of the L.M.S., spoke of his experiences in North China, and the methods adopted there. A lively address was given by Mr. McCheyne Paterson, of the Church of Scotland Mission, Punjaub, descriptive of mission work in the villages, especially among Mohammedans. He related how prejudices were overcome by a little harmless diplomacy, and a way found for the gathering together of the people to hear the Gospel message. Musical instruments and the magic lantern were found helpful in this respect. Mr. Paterson spoke of the joyful nature of the work, and thought those who had to stay at home were much to be pitied.

A very thoughtful and impressive utterance came next from Mr. Wright Hay, of the Baptist Mission, who has laboured both in Africa and India. He directed his remarks rather to the question of character in the workers than methods of work. God's work, he said, demands the best men, at their best. He expressed personal indebtedness to a sainted old negress in West Africa, who had in early life been a slave, and whose experience of the saving and sanctifying power of the Gospel showed him much personal deficiency. The need of individual piety as an element in missionary equipment was strongly insisted on. Mr. Hay, told of an Indian Maharajah, who gave his own weight in gold, that he might have the coveted privilege of seeing some Brahmins eating a meal. When weighed for this purpose he had donned his richest regalia with heavy shield and sword, so highly did he esteem the honour. The point to be illustrated was, that in our dedication of service to God, we ought to put into the scales all possible equipment, whether of life or capacity. There are many heathen who are stumbled by low ideals of character cherished by missionaries, and by defective teaching as to what the Grace and Spirit of God can do in enabling a man to overcome sin.

An interesting interchange of question and answer elicited from Mr. Hay the view that that aspect of the Gospel which he had found to be most successful in transforming heathen character was the very aspect to which the natural man had most objection, the vicarious atonement of Jesus Christ, Bishop Hill added that he had found in Africa that one of the greatest incentives to Christian living was a clear and vivid hope as to the second coming of Christ.

OUR KITH AND KIN IN INDIA.

On Friday evening ten minutes were allotted to Rev. John Fordyce in which to expound the claims of our kith and kin in India in connection with the work of the Anglo-Indian Evangelisation Society. This he did in a very effective and impressive way as he spoke feelingly of the special isolation of many British residents—planters and others—in remote places, and of the sad deterioration of character that comes from unbelief and indulgence in sinful ways. He spoke especially of the fruitful labours among these scattered fellow-countrymen of Rev. I. F. Row; and also told of the proposed forward movement in sending out students and young preachers for two years' preliminary service among these Anglo-Indians. Such young workers could begin work at once, and they would also find many natives who understand English to whom they could preach.

A VISIT TO CHINA

was the subject of a deeply interesting talk from Dr. Barbour, who spent the winter before last in a survey of some of the missionary stations in South China, mainly among the centres of the English Presbyterian Mission, but also embracing the work of the L.M.S., the C.M.S., the Wesleyans, and the American Presbyterians. At Amoy he saw one of the most interesting monuments of missions in South China in the shape of the first Protestant Church built in China by the American brethren almost fifty years ago. They built in faith, for while there were then only six Protestant converts in China, it was constructed to hold 200. A large congregation now gathers within its walls. A good part of Dr. Barbour's address was given to a description of hospital and medical missionary work in Chin-Chow, and to a stirring recital of the wonderful changes that have been produced in the region through the work of medical missions. Special note was made of the beneficial change in the position of the women, whose lot in China generally is such a sad and sorrowful one. The effective part played in the work of opium cure by these agencies was also dwelt on, and Dr. Barbour had some highly gratifying things to say as to the generosity of the native Chinese Christians in the support of their own churches, and also in furthering the work of evangelization in other places. He gave some weighty counsels in closing as to the need of missionaries preserving harmony of spirit one with another, and not airing crochets and criticisms at the expense of fellow workers.

Certainly the most remarkable utterance of the whole conference, regarded from any point of view, was the the celebrated lady traveller, at this meeting, giving some of her impressions of missionary work, and of the overwhelming spiritual needs of the heathen world. For an hour or more she poured forth a stream of eloquent and thrilling speech, in language of singular literary grace and power of expression, and carrying with it a cumulative pathos and impressiveness that could not be described. Before she ceased to speak twilight had deepened into darkness, but the audience—the largest of the convention—was held spellbound to the very last. She began by saying that among the profitable and often pathetic utterances of a very delightful conference, she had been greatly struck with Bishop Hill's words as to agonising in prayer for the heathen, and cherishing towards them the broken-heartedness that Christ showed for the lost in his day. It seems as if we were not realising the fearful destitution of the world, with more than a thousand millions of Christless souls. We know that every single soul, even that of a little slave girl driven across Africa by Arab traders, is in Christ's eyes of more value than the whole world. After being abroad for two years, hearing nothing of what was going on in Christendom, she said she returned to this country and discovered to her joy that the missionary spirit was rising, and had greatly risen during those two years.

This very Students' Volunteer Missionary Union, young and vigorous as it is, indicates the rising of this missionary spirit. The modern growth of medical missions—there are now 169 missionaries abroad holding British medical diplomas, and nineteen of them women—is a remarkable fact. Of the value of medical missions, Mrs. Bishop spoke very highly. But while thanking God for what has been accomplished, she felt impressed more by the magnitude of the task and the enormous area of the unenlightened world, than by what has been achieved. For four and a-half years it was her fortune to travel in Asia, and to come in contact with Buddhism, Hinduism, Shintooism, and Islamism. All these systems seem to present an impenetrable wall against the advances of Christianity; though we know the wall is not impregnable. Except in Japan, she could not say that she had seen the large results which we are thankful to know follow from the preaching of Christ. She had not seen the fields ripening to the harvest or heard the songs of rejoicing labourers returning from these fields bringing their sheaves with them. But she had seen an enormous amount of self-denying toil on the part of those who are carrying the Gospel to the heathen, and she could not speak too highly from the traveller's point of view, and from extensive observations in all parts of Asia, of the labours of Christian men and women in the regions where she had travelled. And here came

A NOTEWORTHY PERSONAL CONFESSION.

"I am a convert," said Mrs. Bishop, "to missions through seeing missions and the need for them. Some years ago I took no interest whatever in the condition of the heathen. I had heard much ridicule cast upon Christian missions, and perhaps had imbibed some of the unhallowed spirit. But the missionaries by their lives and character, and by the work they are doing wherever I have seen them, have produced in my mind such a change and such an enthusiasm, as I might almost express it, in favour of Christian missions, that I cannot go anywhere without speaking about them and trying to influence others in their favour who may be as indifferent as I was before I went among heathen countries."

Mrs. Bishop went on to say that in her travel she had been greatly impressed by the exceeding dolefulness and hopelessness of the non-Christian world. The sorrows of heathenism are great. As to the condition of women in Eastern countries, the speaker said she had had unusual opportunities of seeing that, and she had found that the life of an Oriental woman is really without hope in the world. They lead a degraded life in which the intellect is dwarfed. While the circumstances of their lives develop fierce passions of hatred, jealousy, and intrigue, their better natures are stunted, and in intelligence they are little better than a child of eight or nine years old with us would be. Having with her a medicine chest, which she often used in the relief of various ailments, Mrs. Bishop said that women had come to her hundreds of times and asked for something to make a favourite wife look ugly or odious, or to destroy a favourite wife or the favourite son of a favourite wife. She really thought that the position of woman in Mohammedan countries is more degraded than in the heathen lands she had visited. We may well be broken-hearted and agonise in prayer over the pitiable condition of our sisters in these non-Christian countries. All this, of course, involves the degradation of the men. She looked forward to the day when in these Eastern lands the work of Christian women among women would turn out to be the great elevating and evangelising agency.

As to political and social oppression and corruption, Mrs. Bishop declared she thought that Persia is worse even than Turkey. Persia is one seething mass of corruption, political, social, and moral, from the highest officials downwards, and the peasants are ground down to the very limit of starvation. Enlightened Mohammedans admit that their country is

PERISHING THROUGH SHEER CORRUPTION.

Speaking, further, of the condition of those in Eastern lands suffering from bodily ailments and sickness, Mrs. Bishop drew a picture, marvellous for its sweep and its vivid colouring of the awful neglect, ignorance, and cruelty with which disease is treated there as compared with the overflowing kindness, care, and skill bestowed on the sick and suffering among ourselves. As to the preponderating influences of the false faiths of those countries where she has travelled, her conviction is that it is no exaggeration to say they are "earthly, sensual, devilish." These faiths have no power towards enabling a conscience-stricken man to get rid of the tyranny of inbred sin. One great work of the Christian missionary is to awaken in these people a sense of sin.

We are thankful to God for what has been done in spreading the light of the Gospel, and for what He is now doing in stirring so many volunteers. But there is no place for self gratulation when we think of the vast extent of unreached heathendom and of the disproportion between the Christianising forces at home and abroad. Think of thirty million souls passing away every year without having even heard of Jesus Christ and his salvation. It is so solemn and awful that one almost trembles to speak of it. In her travels the paucity of missionary workers had impressed itself on her as a terrible fact. From the frontiers of China proper to the waters of Babylon, she had not found a single witness for Jesus Christ. Central Asia is without a missionary. Arabia is almost in the same destitute condition. Persia is without missionaries, except at the north-western corner. A great part of Turkey is without workers. As for Tibet, even that part of it which can be freely entered is virtually without a witness for Christ. It was very terrible for her to travel three thousand miles without meeting a witness for Christ.

After referring to the hopeful element connected with the rise of the S.V.M.U., Mrs. Bishop urged those who must stay at home to do their part in furthering the work. She gravely impeached the luxurious methods of living and the expensive home surroundings that prevail now even among Christians, and called for a reversal of this state of things, so that we might have more to give to the work of God in other lands. By the giving up of these superfluities we could do much; there is even a call to us to exercise self-denial, and to make personal sacrifices, that the Gospel of Christ may be made known to those who sit in heathen darkness. Then we can do much good by influencing others to take an interest in missions, and to contribute to their support. A great and blessed future lies before those who have consecrated their lives and their substance to the work of the Lord. Let us rise to the full stature of manhood and womanhood in Christ Jesus, ever growing in grace, forming higher Christian ideals, and keeping them before our minds amid the storm and stress and alluring influences of life.

PERSONAL DEALING

was the subject of a very profitable hour on Friday forenoon. The first aspect of it considered was that of dealing with fellow students about the claims of the heathen world, and it was opened in a judicious address by Mr. Williams, of London Hospital. It was for this very thing, he said, that the S.V.M.U. was called into existence. It was pointed out that much tact is needed in introducing and pressing home the question on individual students. Good men should be sought out, and they should not be worried. Men who are apt to look on the dark side of things, and who are given to grumbling, are unsuitable; neither are physical weaklings. While spiritual requirements are of primary importance, mental capacity and intelligence are not to be regarded as bars to missionary work. Show the men that while they are not justified in waiting for a "special" call, there must be a "personal" call to every missionary from God Himself.

HOW TO WIN SOULS IN THE FIELD

was next taken up and most impressively dealt with by Bishop Hill. He contended that there is a distinct gift of the Holy Ghost for the winning of souls and all may become possessors of this gift. As to the essential qualifications of the workers, he regarded love as the highest; nothing will reach the heart of another like sympathy and tender compassion. Another essential is broken-heartedness—a deep sense of the terrible condition of the lost. The Bishop told how at one time he got under the influence of modern speculations as to the ultimate condition of those who die unsaved, and his power in the winning of souls was paralysed until he came again to see that men without Christ are really perishing. Then the worker must never give the message of salvation to another till he has first received it from God. Let there be also instant obedience to the call of God and the leadings of his Spirit in directing to individual cases. Be sure that what is said or preached is not only truth, but soul-saving truth. Be definite and specific in prayer and expectation. A worker in Guildford prayed for twelve souls and got them; another in Streatham who heard of it did the same, and God honoured faith there also. The worker must have joy and full communion and complete surrender if he would be able to win souls. Preserve freshness of utterance; not giving out stale repetitions—though God can use an old sermon equally with a new one if the worker is full of the Spirit. When an illustration is found effective do not hesitate to introduce it again and again.

Respecting the essentials in the work itself four things are important—enlightenment, conviction, decision, and committal. These points were wisely expanded and illustrated, great stress being laid on the imperative necessity of suiting the particular form of the message to the special circumstances of the inquirer. Do not be like the medical quack, who has one remedy for every sort of complaint, but like the specialist, who has a great variety of remedies for varied forms of the same disease. God pity those who declare a half Gospel; they will be a curse to the soul they seek to win, instead of a blessing.

LITERATURE AND MAPS.

On the question of missionary literature, maps, charts, etc., Mr. Louis Byrde had much valuable information and counsel to impart at one of the Friday morning meetings. Every college, and, of course, every missionary band, should have its missionary library, that ought to be in constant use by the Student Volunteers. At Cambridge, where he studied, they had forty such books. To the question as to how many present had really read through twelve good missionary books Mr. Byrde got scarcely any response. Every spare moment the student has ought to be given to this study, the monthly missionary periodicals, as well as the annual reports, ought to be regularly mastered; they will well repay the trouble.

Then Mr. Byrde explained how missionary maps could be made. They should be drawn on common sheeting, unglazed, either in water-colours or with crayon. The names of places should be printed in or drawn very neatly. Areas and populations, with the various forms of religion, should be stated, and in the corner, for purposes of comparison, there should be drawn some well-known home country on the same scale as the body of the map. These maps preach telling missionary sermons through the eye. Charts and diagrams to hang round the room when a missionary address is being given are also valuable. For example, give the amount spent annually in drink (140 millions sterling) and the amount spent on missions (2½ millions). A most effective way of showing the comparative prevalence of heathenism, Christianity, and other forms of faith was submitted by Mr. Byrde, by a long slip of black braid wound on a card, with parti-coloured ribbons proportionately short, to indicate the extent of Christianity, Judaism, Hinduism, Roman Catholicism, Greek Church, Mohammedanism, etc. These ribbons displayed, and especially the black braid thrown across the audience, have a very telling and realistic effect.

The making of sand maps on the beach for seaside services and addresses was also illustrated by an outline roughly drawn on the black board. The coast line can be marked out with stones, and the rivers, lakes, etc., shown with stones and seaweed. The children and ladies will readily help in gathering these, and the maps, if made at half tide, when it is receding, will remain intact for some time, and will hold the attention of the crowds while speakers explain the subject; sometimes they listen and look for hours. Missionary literature should be scattered on these occasions.

THE PRESERVATION OF BODILY HEALTH

had a session to itself on Saturday forenoon, and a very interesting time it was. The first speaker was Dr. Battersby, who said that if missionaries are not angels (as Bishop Hill had remarked) they certainly had not got angelic bodies, yet many of them came home from the foreign fields invalided because they do not give sufficient care to the rules of bodily health. Our bodies are declared to be the temples of the Holy Ghost, and we are to glorify God in them. As to the feeding of the body while preparing for the field there must be a strict regularity as to meals; no excessive eating or highly seasoned dishes, a sparing use of flesh meat. Full and regular hours of sleep are essential. So is daily moderate exercise, which implies an abundance of fresh air. On this question of health Dr. Battersby drew attention to the newly formed Livingstone College at Bow, where intending missionaries are to get a sufficient modicum of training with respect to the preservation of personal health and vigour, and the treatment of simple complaints.

The speaker said that we are to use the means that God has placed at our disposal, and strongly protested against the view that we are to expect God to heal those diseases that will yield to medical treatment. He had known several men in the field who had died of fever simply because they would not resort to the use of ordinary methods of treatment. We are not warranted by Scripture in regarding bodily sickness as a sin. We have not yet got redeemed bodies, as some have claimed. When abroad the missionary must be careful as to exposure to the sun, and rigidly avoid overstrains or overeating.

Dr. Sargood Fry gave an account of the work of the Edinburgh Medical Mission Society, which gives a thorough medical training to those about to be medical missionaries. Then Dr. Maxwell did a like service for the London Medical Missionary Society. He cited a remark of Dr. Clark, of Amritzar, who told some young missionaries as he pointed to the graves of some young workers who had fallen early: "You have come here to live for Christ, and not to die for Him." The doctor also warned outgoing missionaries against foolhardiness or carelessness in exposure to the strong tropical sun. There is a danger in warm countries from the water, which ought always to be boiled. Fever is often caused through damp feet. Workers out there ought, if possible, to sleep six feet above the ground, so as to escape malarial night exhalations. Due rest is also very important; exhaustion induces fever, bicycling and tennis have been found helpful in preserving the health of missionaries, where other forms of exercise are not available.

Mrs. Bishop tendered some extremely valuable advice on the subject of health preservation. She said that though she had travelled much in the tropics, she had never suffered from any tropical malady. Addressing specially her sisters who would go to work abroad, she said they must give no time to indulging in melancholy or vain regrets. Much in mission stations is easily preventible. Mental depression comes perhaps through the difficulty of acquiring the language, and a breakdown of health follows. Women in Eastern countries cannot take outside exercise alone from social prejudices, and it is not always possible to get attendants. If a lady cannot go walking or riding, let her be careful as to regular sleep and exercise, half an hour in the court yard, and on the roof morning and evening, if nothing better can be had.

Lookers-on proverbially see most of the game. She had visited some 140 mission stations in various countries, and she could not but observe that friction too often exists in these stations. Women seem to have special temptations to make much of littles; they brood over small "tiffs" and imaginary slights, and this is a fruitful source of social friction as well as of failure in health. Being directly questioned as to how she was able to escape tropical fevers and other maladies, Mrs. Bishop replied that she used a camp bed raised at least two feet from the ground. She boiled and filtered all water, adding a pellet of Condy's Fluid. Her clothing was light, and all of wool. She protected her head rigidly, and was able to travel all day on horseback in a temperature of 157deg. Fahrenheit, without the least discomfort or lassitude. For the benefit of tropical residents or travellers I give fully her description of her headdress:—"First, I put on my head a wet towel, folded several times, brought well on to the forehead and hanging down behind, soaking it as often as it gets dry. Over that I wear a regular pith helmet (hats usually made for ladies are very little use), and in very hot weather I have a cabbage or banana leaf under the towel over my head. This protection of the head is very necessary in all malarial countries. I also protect my spine with a thick pad of cotton wadding, and wear my outer garment loose and baggy. Never drink when very hot, nor bathe in water that is too cold."

Bishop Hill said the experience of those working on the Niger was that those who went to sleep during the midday period of rest were more liable to fever attacks than those who avoided midday sleep.

Dr. Battersby expressed the very decided view that for health's sake all foreign missionaries should be total abstainers from alcohol, and said that the general experience of mission workers was in consonance with this opinion. He added that he believed many on the foreign field died of absolute fright; if any are fearful and afraid, let them stay at home. It seemed very appropriate at the close of this interesting discussion that the meeting should sing the hymn in which the lines occur:—

"I need Thee every hour
In joy or pain."

A MEETING ON THE LAKE

was proposed and fixed for Saturday afternoon. A brisk breeze blew from the North, but some dozen or fifteen well-laden boats started from the landing stages at 2.30, and found a pleasant anchorage on the lee shore of an island in the centre of Lake Derwentwater. Bishop Hill presided over the informal gathering, and a rousing address on the position and claims of African missions was given by Dr. Harry Guinness. He naturally dealt largely with the Congo and related missions. Referring to the losses of life that had taken place on these fields, he pointed out how a considerable prejudice is being created in the minds even of Christian people as to African work, and exaggerated statements are being made as to the comparative costliness in men and money of Gospel work in those regions. Looking by way of comparison at the sacrifices made in trade enterprise and in warlike expeditions, and which are deemed necessary to secure the objects in view, he showed how much more we as Christians ought to be willing and ready to make all needful sacrifices so that the blessed tidings of the Gospel may be carried to the sons and daughters of darkest Africa.

Interesting words were also spoken by Mr. Smith, of Uganda, and Mr. Stewart, of Foochow.

In the evening a goodly number came together, notwithstanding a large Convention prayer meeting in the great tent at the same hour, to hear addresses on mission work and mission fields. Dr. Maxwell presided, and the first address was by Dr. Hudson Taylor, who had for his theme the needs and claims of vast China, and the adjacent lands such as Manchuria, Mongolia, Tibet, &c. Out of full knowledge and in words of fervid appeal he pourtrayed the great spiritual darkness and destitution of these enormous territories and their uncounted populations. He mentioned many deeply interesting items of news as to Miss Taylor's recent brave but hazardous incursion into Tibet; the perils she had encountered and the marvellous deliverance that God had repeatedly wrought in her behalf. Her experience shows what may be done when there is an earnest consecration of purpose, and an unwavering trust in the preserving, providing care of an All-mighty God. Mr. Taylor warmly defended the Chinese race from the aspersion thrown on them by people in America, which he contended were the result more of the virtues than the vices of the Chinese. If American persecution and ostracism of the Chinaman continues, he feared reprisals and riotous troubles in China; even now these are happening in greater measure than formerly.

After Mr. Taylor's long address there came some admirable and practical words of counsel and caution as to missionary qualifications from Dr. George Smith, the well-known Edinburgh secretary of the Free Church of Scotland Missions. Briefly stated, he urged that (1) the missionary must be conscious of the call of Christ and the gift of the Spirit; (2) must covet earnestly the possession of the highest efficiency; (3) must follow fully the rule of Christian charity and good temper; (4) must learn habits of order and business ability that will make him a wise steward of the moneys contributed by the churches at home; (5) must be sympathetic and loving towards the native races; and (6) must give himself to unceasing prayer. In developing these points, Dr. Smith gave utterance to much candid friendly criticism, and his good advice must remain in the minds and hearts of his hearers.

Mr. Eugene Stock was down for an address on Indian Missions, but the train from London by which he travelled was about an hour late in arrival. He reached the meeting only in time to give a few excellent practical admonitions to the student volunteers on the need for absolute submission of the individual will to God, and an unquestioning obedience to his mind and will, ascertained through faithful prayer and waiting on Him for guidance as to the course in life.

A MEETING ON FRIAR'S CRAG

on Sabbath afternoon was marked by special interest. The Student Volunteers were for the time content to be silent (except Mr. Byrde, the chairman), and to listen to a large number of brief addresses from returned missionaries who had mostly gathered at Keswick for the Convention of this week. There must have been about a score of these short homely talks within the two hours of the meeting. The speaking was mainly by way of advice and suggestion to the intending missionaries, on practical points bearing on their future service in the field, and very excellent advice they got. Some of the friends who spoke also addressed words of appeal to the general crowd, urging the claims of God on the active service of all his believing children, and the needs of the perishing heathen.

Mrs. Abraham, the Nestorian lady from Persia, was one of the speakers, and made a simple, touching appeal. Another speaker around whom a special interest gathers was Miss Annie Taylor, lately returned from Tibet. One could see in the flash of the eye and the fiery energy of her manner, tokens of the consecrated determination and faith that led her to face the hidden dangers of an untried path, if so she might claim God's promise that "every place upon which your foot treads shall be given to you." In some very solemn closing words, Mr. Eugene Stock pressed home the responsibility that lies on every Christian to see to it whether or not God would have them join the missionary army, in view of the hundreds of millions of souls still sitting in the shadow of death, unrelieved by a single ray of Gospel light. He said that seven years ago it was a new thing to end the Keswick Convention with a missionary meeting; this was another new departure to begin the convention with a meeting on behalf of foreign missions. He prayed that God would this year thrust forth many 'Keswickites" into his great harvest field.

THE CLOSING SESSIONS

of this interesting Convention, held on Sunday evening and Monday forenoon, were of intense interest, and invaluable in focussing the attention of the Student Volunteers on the condition and needs of the great heathen and pagan populations in different countries. Many particulars were furnished by Dr. Murray Mitchell as to the tenets and bearings of the great religious systems of the East, e.g., Hinduism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and the like. Some of these systems are undergoing a revival of propagation, but all are utterly without power to uplift their professors, though there are good moral elements in some. Even the attempts at reform by the Brahmo Somaj, and other movements, are unavailing. They are desperate efforts to keep Hinduism alive, but it is sick nigh unto death. Now is the time for Christians to come to the help of the Lord against these false systems of belief and practice. Dr. Mitchell urged the students to make themselves familiar with the faiths of the people among whom they would labour; such study is as necessary as the study of morbid anatomy among physicians. En passant, the speaker described the "esoteric Buddhism" that emanated from that very astonishing woman, Madame Blavatsky, as the child of pure imagination. In Tibet the priests know nothing whatever of the "Mahatmas," that are so much talked about, and, in fact, they have no existence so far as can be ascertained. Dr. Mitchell was also very severe in his criticism of his friend Sir Edwin Arnold's poem, "The Light of Asia," which he declared to be largely the product of poetical fancy, while its illusions are little bettered by the same poet's later work, "The Light of the World."

Mr. Byrde, having urged that the evangelisation of the heathen world might well be accomplished by the present generation if the individual churches of Great Britain and America were each to send its representative to some part of the field, a very impressive statement fell from the lips of Mr. Eugene Stock. His deliberate and solemn conviction is that before anything adequate can be done to evangelise the world, there must be a complete revolution in the opinions and feelings of the churches at home. Above all, we want God to open our eyes to the real state of matters abroad, as compared with the lands of so-called Christendom. Referring to the earnest pleas on behalf of Ireland at the morning meeting in the tent, he said that the one province of Fuh-kien in China has a population equal to three Irelands, and the Province of Hyderabad in Central India is equal to two Irelands. These are but samples of vast districts, with vast populations, practically without any Gospel messenger at all. Ireland's needs may be and are great, but what are they in comparison to such spiritually destitute places? Africa, as well as India and China, provided Mr. Stock with object lessons of this overwhelming spiritual darkness, as for instance the Soudan, stretching right across the northern part of the Continent, without one known Christian in it. Do we not want a revolution? The needs of Arabia and Turkey were also impressively referred to.

As to what "evangelisation" ought to be, Mr. Stock rather demurred to the notion that a single visit and a hasty proclamation of the Gospel message to a crowd of ignorant superstitious heathen, could possibly answer the description. He contended for steady and continued work in great centres as well as for flying visits. This, of course, demands more workers; but they might well be forthcoming if our ideas of the matter were only on a proper basis. It is high time for us Christians to get on our faces in confession before God and ask Him to forgive us and teach us what our duty is towards the heathen. Some one had asked whether, if we did not go they could be saved. The proper answer would be:—"If we do not go, it is a question whether we will be saved." Mr. Stock said he was getting out of conceit with all missionary statistics. Experience has amply proved that ingatherings of converts in the mass have very unsatisfactory and disappointing results, and the work must be done, hand-to-hand, man to man. If we want Christ to return, the churches must be up and doing, for His coming must be delayed until the Gospel is preached in some form for a testimony among all nations. He will come, of course, to a still unconverted world, but if we do our part before He comes He will do his when He comes.

Mr. Hudson Taylor gave the closing words of exhortation. It is not the hardness of the field that prevents success, but the hardness of our own unbelieving hearts. His view of Scripture teaching was that each generation of Christians is bound by the Master's command to evangelise the heathen of that generation. If that is the correct view, of course we have there a complete answer to the question whether it can be done. God has unlimited resources for the accomplishment of his purposes, and it is ours to draw upon these resources, whether of men or of money. We fail to do this because Christ is not King and Lord in our hearts and in the churches. Mr. Taylor declared it as his belief that in the space of ten years the Gospel might be preached to every creature if all Christians were to put themselves and what they possess at the disposal of God. Difficulties of language are nothing. A child can learn any language in eighteen months or two years; it is absurd to suppose that educated, intelligent men and women could not do so in an equal or less time. We need not trouble ourselves about means. If God sends to his work He will infallibly supply all that his workers need.

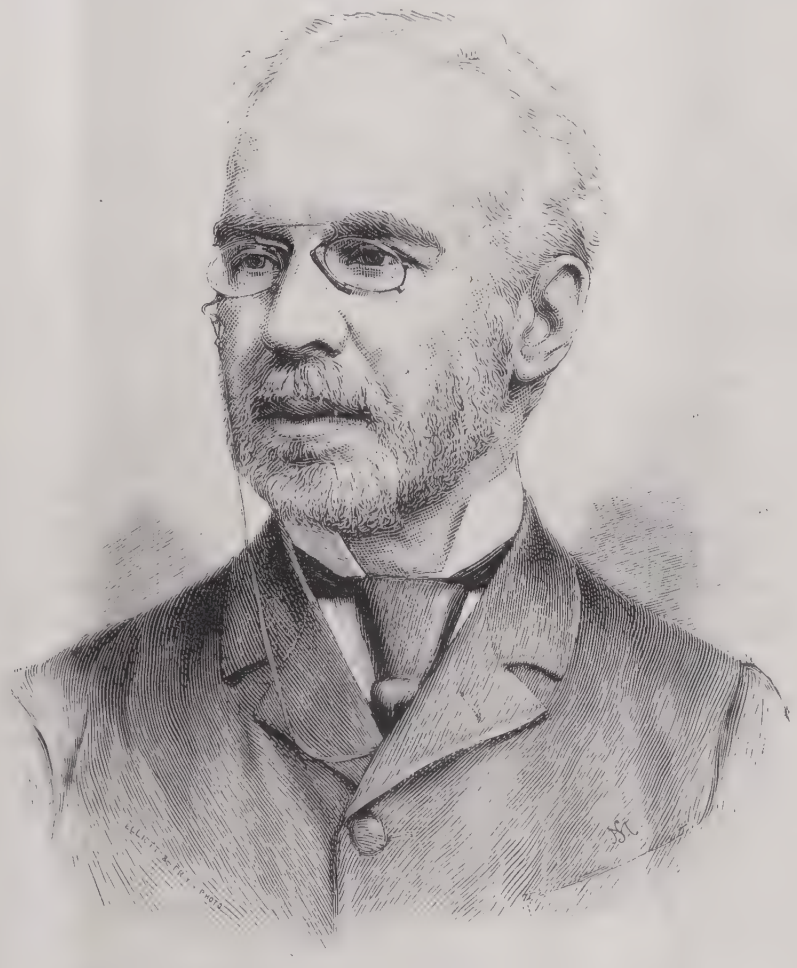
An opportunity being given at this point for testimony from the Student Volunteers, as to blessing and stimulus received at the Conference meetings, a number rose one by one and told with deep feeling how God had spoken to them in varied ways, and given them a humbling self-refreshing message from Himself. Some spoke of hindrances that still existed to their going out, and asked for prayer. This was followed by a season of much earnest and in many cases individual petition; and the formal proceedings of the first Students' Volunteer Conference in this land were closed by brief prayer and the benediction from Mr. Hudson Taylor. Truly God was present of a truth, moving in the minds and hearts of these young servants and of others present, and we look for much fruit not only in the near future, but many days and years hence.

In the course of the Convention several meetings were held, at which it was resolved to organise an "Inter-University Christian Union," for the purpose of furthering Christian work among the students in the universities, colleges, and medical schools of Great Britain and Ireland.

Y.M.C.A. BIBLE CLASSES.

A conference on Bible-class work amongst young men was held on Tuesday week at Exeter Hall. The chair was taken by Mr. George Williams, and a large number of representative men were present. A series of five minutes' addresses was followed by an hour's discussion, two minutes being allowed to each.

Mr. Williams recalled the fact that the Y.M.C.A. was instituted for the study of God's Word. Mr. A. C. Furse spoke of the Y.M.C.A. Sunday afternoon Bible-classes, giving as the primary cause of the falling-off in interest in Bible-classes the growth of a restless and superficial spirit antagonistic to all that would lead to patient, prayerful, and intelligent study of God's Word. Mr. James Pearce, speaking on the "Selection of Suitable Topics," said that what was wanted was a return to the old principle of conversational Bible-classes. A leader must consider his audience, so that what might suit one class might not another. Consecutive study in a class gave plenty of variety. Mr. John Hayward spoke of the "Mode of Preparation." He said that the Bible was its best interpreter, and all passages bearing on the subject in hand should be looked up. Mr. W. H. Mills dealt with "Methods of Conducting." Members should face one another; two or three trusted workers should sit near the door, ready to direct a stranger to a seat or speak to him at the close; a scout should be stationed at the door outside to persuade any hesitating one; the conductor should go to the class direct from the presence of his Master with his whole mind and spirit steeped in his subject. Methods of conducting must vary (1) according to ages, education, and spiritual knowledge or condition of those attending; (2) the character of the subject to be considered; and (3), the aptitude and gifts of the conductor. In any case the method must be adapted to win, to interest, and to help young men; the class should be devotional rather than argumentative, and evangelistic rather than critical, practical rather than theological; the praise and prayer should be read, hymns carefully selected, prayers short, and direct results be aimed at. Pastor James spoke on the "Qualification for Leadership," Mr. Walter Wild on, "The Advantage of Street Canvassing and Advertising"; Mr. N. R. Hughman on "The Tea-hour, How made Profitable" Mr. F. C. Wood on "Organisation of Bible class Workers," and Mr. W. Hind Smith on "Early Reminiscences of Bible-class Work." The speakers who followed were unanimous that while Bible-class work could be made brighter and more attractive, it was not by methods much in vogue to-day, which were leading further and further from the quiet and devout study of the Word of God.



MR. EUGENE STOCK,

EDITORIAL SECRETARY OF THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

WHILE fully and loyally identified with the great Missionary Society he serves, the subject of our present sketch has proved himself able to rise above mere denominational distinctions, and ready to co-operate with and aid all who are seeking to carry out the great commission of the Church in publishing to every land the glad tidings of salvation. Realising that "the field is the world," that it is "white unto harvest," and that if it is to be occupied to any appreciable extent, the whole Church of Christ must be aroused to obedience to her Lord, he has welcomed every opportunity of sounding forth the call; of insisting on the personal responsibility resting on every believer in the matter of missions to the heathen. We feel sure that many who read this sketch have heard from his lips words which have raised in their hearts searching questions as to their own response to the Lord's command.

Mr. Eugene Stock is a Londoner, having been born in the Metropolis on 26th February, 1836. The business training gained in his earlier years has proved of the utmost possible service in the post he has for so many years ably filled. He attended evening classes at King's College, under Dr. Plumptre, afterwards the Dean of Wells, and there laid the foundation of that intimate and spiritual acquaintance with the Word of God which is a marked characteristic of his writings. He was, besides, a diligent and observant student of Church and missionary history, whereby he stored his memory with facts and incidents which in subsequent years have proved of invaluable service. He has, as all who have heard him speak know, the useful faculty of treasuring what he has read, and producing it at the right moment, by way of illustration or argument, as required.

His first experience of Christian work was gained in the Sunday-school, as teacher, and then for many years as superintendent, at St. Thomas's, Barnsbury. He showed great power in dealing with lads of a class usually somewhat averse to attending Sunday-school. His first editorial experiences were in connection with The Church Sunday School Magazine, in which appeared from his pen a series of "Lessons on the Life of our Lord," which attracted attention, and, being reissued in book-form, have been translated into many languages. At this period he was in the habit of writing for various American periodicals. He became a member of the committee of the Church of England Young Men's Society, Islington branch, of which his friend, Mr. G. Martin Tait, was honorary secretary. Later on he joined the committee of the Religious Tract Society, on which he did good service for some years. The Church Sunday School Institute also owed much to his efforts, while he gave time and thought to the Industrial Home for Boys, founded by Captain Mann, R.N., in Islington. Mr. Stock's association with this institution has for many years been close and intimate, as might be expected, seeing that he married one of Captain Mann's daughters, and that the Home is now carried on by another daughter.

While on this point we may mention that Mr. Stock's own sisters are both doing valuable work, one being Miss S. G. Stock, the well-known poetess and author, and the other Miss C. R. Stock, who has been for many years in closest fellowship of service with Miss Macpherson at the Home of Industry. Some ten years ago Mrs. Stock was called to her rest, and he himself seems to have found solace in the devotion with which he has thrown himself into his life's work.

In 1873 Mr. Stock entered the service of the Church Missionary Society as Editorial Secretary, although the title was not at first given. At the Mission House his personality made itself felt. His enthusiasm for missions, his business capacity, his power of mastering and marshalling facts, his grasp of detail, his fluent and incisive pen, speedily won recognition. At that time the C.M.S. committee had been considering the need for a new departure in missionary literature. Admirably as the Intelligencer and Juvenile Instructor had fulfilled their function, it was felt that, in view of the modern improvements in journalism, there was a danger of their losing their hold. Recognising the needs of the case the late Rev. Henry Wright, then Honorary Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, recommended Mr. Eugene Stock as the right man to undertake the editorial responsibilities. The suggestion met with approval, and accordingly Mr. Stock was appointed Editorial Secretary, an appointment which has abundantly justified itself in its results.

The C.M.S. publications have been completely remodelled, and have become fresh, interesting, and informative. Nor has this happy change been confined to this great Society; some of the other missionary societies have taken the hint, and introduced many improvements. The C.M.S. Gleaner, which he started in 1874, has become a real live missionary organ, its vivid pictures making the scenes and episodes of missionary life familiar to every reader. A year's issue of this paper is on our table as we write, and merely to con the series of views it presents seems a liberal education in missions. The Intelligencer, though greatly enlarged, still retains its magazine form, and for those who have the leisure to study in detail missionary affairs it serves its purpose well. The Juvenile Instructor has become the lively Children's World, gleaning from the sheaves all manner of bright bits likely to rouse the interest of the young folk in the condition of the heathen. Then there is further a new halfpenny monthly, Awake, intended specially to arrest the attention of those who even yet are lukewarm on the subject of missions. Looking at the C.M.S. papers generally, it is not too much to say that a new order of missionary literature has been created, with the happiest results both in the Church of England and outside of it. Amongst useful books written by Mr. Stock we may mention "Lessons on the Acts" and "Steps to Truth" (written conjointly with his sister), also "The Story of the Fuh-kien Mission," "Japan and the Japan Mission," and other missionary books.

But apart from his editorial duties, Mr Stock has been the leader in founding a whole series of unions and bands which have taken hold, have spread widely, and have interested fresh thousands in the cause of missions. Perhaps the most widely known is the Gleaners' Union. In naming Mr.

Stock as the founder of this Union, we are simply repeating the statement made and published in the C.M.S. organs, at the last anniversary of the Gleaners' Union. Founded in 1886 for prayer and work, this organisation has as its first object :—

To arouse Christian people to a sense of the obligation laid on them to fulfil the one great last commission of Christ to his Church, the evangelisation of the world; that commission being not for missionaries and missionary committees only, but for every individual Christian; and its fulfilment consisting, not merely in money gifts, but in interest, sympathy, prayer, personal effort.

To this end it seeks to arouse members to take a personal share in the work; to link them in missionary fellowship, to promote prayer for, reading about, and effort in behalf of all missions—not C.M.S. alone. The members numbered at the last anniversary 46,288, or 437 branches all over the world.

Still earlier came the Lay Workers' Union, out of which have grown the Younger Clergy Union and the Ladies' Union. These three are mainly operating in London, and they have done much to deepen and render intelligent missionary interest. We do not call Mr. Stock their founder, but he had a large share in their initiation and growth.

He was, however, the first to suggest the February Simultaneous Meetings, now known generally as the F.S.M. For many years Children's Simultaneous Missionary Meetings have been held bi-annually in Islington, and latterly all over London, and the success attending these may have suggested to his mind the idea of organising in every church in a diocese or district a series of simultaneous meetings. At all events the results during the past few years have been most encouraging in awakened interest and the calling forth of fresh labourers.

Naturally Mr. Stock has been in the front of many Church movements, as a member of the London Diocesan Conference, and of the House of Laymen, and again and again as a speaker at the Church Congress. But outside this radius he has made his influence felt far and near. At Keswick, for example, he has had much to do with the recent and remarkable development of the missionary interest. When he first went to Keswick—eight years ago—there were no meetings specially set apart for missionary matters. Now Missions occupy a very prominent place, and rightly so. The early missionary prayer-meetings, the Saturday missionary meetings, and the "Keswick Mission" all afford evidence of the keen interest now taken in the subject of the evangelisation of the world. The free-will offerings for missionary purposes have been very large; while many have at Keswick heard the Lord's call—"Go ye."

As a deputation speaker, Mr. Stock is ever in great request at home, but his recent trip to the Antipodes was quite a new experience. We have already given a detailed account of this tour round the world, hence we need only summarise briefly the salient facts. Sent by the C.M.S. Committee to awaken and organise missionary interest in the Colonies, and to visit mission stations in India, Mr. Stock, accompanied by Rev. R. W. Stewart, sailed from London on March 18, 1892, and reached Melbourne on April 24, staying there till May 14, when they went to Sydney and other towns in New South Wales until the end of July. After revisiting Victoria they worked six weeks in New Zealand and Tasmania. Seven months were spent in the Colonies — spent in incessant meetings and addresses to young and old, to workers of every possible kind and of all denominations. As the first outcome of this visit three missionary associations were formed, a dozen candidates were accepted, many intimated an intention in due time of offering for service, and a wave of missionary enthusiasm was set in motion in all directions.

Leaving the Antipodes, the deputation visited Ceylon and India, and the articles since published in the C.M.S. papers show that a keen and thoughtful examination was made of the work in progress, the possibilities of extension, and the condition of religion generally in Eastern lands. The full results of this tour are yet to come, but undoubtedly the quickened interest in the Colonies in the claims of the heathen will press forth many to the mission field.

In closing, we may note three points which have often impressed us in listening to Mr. Stock. First, the emphasis he lays on the Gospel, the power of God among the heathen, even as at home; neither Christianising nor civilising the natives will suffice: if they are to be saved, it must, he ever maintains, be through preaching Christ crucified and risen. Secondly, he believes that the call to "go" is addressed to every Christian who cannot show a clear call to remain at home. The question is not so much, "Why should I go?" as "Why should I not go?" Lastly, he does not expect the conversion of the world by this means; that he looks for at the return of our Lord. Meanwhile, it is the Church's business to obey her Master and Head. It is his will that we preach the Gospel in every land and to every creature, that thereby He may gather out of them a people for his name.

ZAMBESI INDUSTRIAL MISSION.

A farewell meeting in connection with the departure of twelve missionaries to the colony founded by this Mission was held last week at Exeter Hall. The chair was taken, in the absence of Mr. John Cory, J.P., through indisposition, by Rev. C. G. Moore, who was supported by Messrs. J. G. Govan, Frederick G. Toller (treasurer), J. B. Keith, Hardwicke, F. J. Rayner (whose daughter was among the missionaries leaving on Saturday next), and Burroughs. The twelve missionaries were Dr. and Mrs. Fallon, Mr. and Mrs. Graham, Mr. Allan (who had received medical training) and Mrs. Allan, Mrs. Wilson, Miss Rayner, Miss Davis, Miss Mortimer, Mr. J. G. Edwards, Mr. J. E. Booth, the only son of Mr. Booth, the pioneer missionary to Africa.

Mr. R. Caldwell, the secretary, said the effort to form a Christian colony in Zambesi was commenced about a year ago. It was not a mere human effort but of Divine purpose; and it had succeeded beyond all expectations. One thousand acres of land were first considered sufficient, but this had increased to 100,000 acres, and all the money was forthcoming as required. There were (with those who were starting on Saturday) thirty missionaries, some of whom were going partly at their own expense. The colony was in Nyassaland. In two or three years' time, the colony would be entirely self-supporting, and the natives would become pioneers to other parts. Another effort of the Mission was on behalf of the 150,000 slaves in Angoniland. To every family they offered an acre of land, by the cultivation of which they are brought under the protection of the missionaries, who taught them how to cultivate the land, and at the same time preached the Gospel to them. The twelve missionaries, in few words, told how they were led to give themselves to this work.

Mr. Govan and others also addressed the meeting.

MISS KRIKORIAN'S WORK.

Our work goes along steadily. The meetings for women are being continued with usual interest. The Sunday-school classes in our Ragged Schools and Penny Schools have been making rapid progress, the numbers of the scholars rising from 160 to 400. Our Temperance Society, consists exclusively of those who have given up drinking habits. I have started a new branch, to be carried on according to the plans of our Y.M.C.A., and to consist of young men and boys who have not yet commenced the habit, and who promise to avoid it. I was obliged to form this society at the earnest request of the mothers of such young men.

Most of the Gregorian members have been separated from us through the influence of their priests. They are carrying on a temperance society by themselves. There are about 280 in that society; in our own branch there are about 200. There are hundreds of young men besides who have given up drink but do not join either of these societies. Those young men who have been under the influence of strong drink are apt to fall back to their old practices. We have committees to follow them and help them, but the members of these committees themselves are weak. They need someone to give his whole time in guiding and helping them.

How can I attend to all these various branches of the work? I ought to have a helper or two. The Gregorian priests and the chief men of that Church are exciting ignorant people to oppose my work. If I had a gentleman to help me I could give the public management of the work to him, and carry on my house-to-house visitation. I could employ a very able young man for this purpose for about £50. The need for a mission-hall is keenly felt. In conclusion, I would ask the continued prayers of the children of God for me and for my work.—Yours,

R. Krikorian.

LOVE.

John iii. 16; xv. 13; 1 John iv. 8—10.

Bound to earth by mortal fetters,
Tenements of dust and clay,
Blind, and deaf, and dumb, we grovel
Midst the shades of dread decay.
Fearful for the coming morrow,
Fainting 'neath our sins' stern rod,
Thirsting, hungering, weary, dying,
Such are they who know not God.
Whence are we, and whither drifting,
Down life's ruthless troubled stream?
Soon will death, grim phantom, wake us
From this cheerless empty dream.
Then must we appear before Him,
The great Judge of all, above,
Hear our awful condemnation,
This is life without his love.

Softly through our night of sorrow
Steals Love's dawn of gladness bright,
His sweet smile the gloom dispelling,
Turns our darkness into light.
For across the dismal waters
Of life's dim uncertainty,
Christ's dear arms, outstretched, embrace us,
And his thorn-crowned brow we see;
"Child beloved," his Spirit whispers,
"All thy sin on Me was laid,
Thou art mine, for I have bought thee—
With my blood thy price I paid."
God, Himself, is our Redeemer,
Saviour, Master, Jesu, Friend,
He our Light, without a shadow,
He our Life that knows no end.
He our Love, on earth, above,
For all space is filled with Love;
He Himself for us has given—
He is Love, and Love is Heaven.

"NO SEPARATION."—Israel, in crossing the Jordan with their final burst of praise, had to mourn the withdrawal of both their venerated leaders. But the Christian, amid the manifold chequered scenes of his wilderness journey—yes on the banks of the typical Jordan itself—can utter the challenge regarding his Lawgiver, Priest, and King: "Who shall separate from the love of Christ?" There can be no real solitude to him who can sing at his nunc dimittis: "Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me."—Dr. J. R. Macduff.

THE KESWICK CONVENTION.

So much space has been allotted elsewhere to a report of the Students' Conference, held last week, that I must abridge my introductory notes on the great Convention now in session. Writing before it actually begins, I may say that expectation runs high with respect to it. Everything points to its being larger in point of numbers than ever; on no former occasion has there been such an overwhelming tax on the accommodation that the little town can furnish, though new houses are being erected year after year. Towards the middle of last week rooms were at a ransom figure; and indeed they were not to be had at any price, simply because all the available apartments had been secured; except in a few rare cases where those intending to come had been prevented by some unforeseen circumstance from carrying out their plans. Visitors are lodged, as formerly, in many of the neighbouring towns and farm houses.

More than ever it is becoming the fashion for Convention-goers to come to Keswick some days in advance of the meetings, that the grand surroundings of the place may be enjoyed, and may produce their restful, invigorating effect on the bodies and spirits of those who are in the thick of life's battle all the year round. It may be truthfully said of Keswick in an increasing degree, as of Jerusalem of old, that it is "beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth." An inspection of the published programme of meetings reveals a formidable array of expected speakers. It seems as if all the well-remembered living voices of the tent in past years are to be heard again, with the exceptions of Pastor Monod and Rev. G. C. Grubb, the latter being hard at work in South America. So that there is sure to be a feast of fat things from the storehouses of Divine truth and personal experience.

On Saturday evening there was the usual preparatory prayer-meeting in the tent, which was very fully attended. Mr. Robert Wilson was in his wonted place—in the chair.

A brief address was given by Rev. Hubert Brooke, of Reading, whom so many are glad to welcome here, and who looks in good health after his trip to America. He spoke from Zech. x. 1, "Ask ye of the Lord rain in the time of the latter rain; so the Lord shall make bright clouds, and give them showers of rain, to every one grass in the field." This is the right place to begin the Convention (he said)—"Ask ye of the Lord." He wants to give us the best blessing we can have—rain. The sending of rain is solely God's prerogative, and his promise is "I will pour water upon thy seed, and my Spirit upon thine offspring." So we will ask for that Spirit, which is the rain for the soul of man. "How much more should your Heavenly Father" (He is Father as well as God) "give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him." The Old and New Testaments are in perfect harmony here as in all other things.

We do not know what the Holy Spirit will do with us when He comes; He does different things with different souls. There are no two of us in which the soul is exactly the same. In Amos iv. 7, we read, "I caused it to rain upon one city, and caused it not to rain upon another city; one piece was rained upon, and the piece whereupon it rained not withered." I daresay there will be coming up to this Convention some withered souls. They have heard the Word time after time, but it has come to nothing. Others may have withered corners and patches here and there. If you want to be like a fruitful field, "ask of the Lord rain."

Ask "in the time of the latter rain." That is the time when the fields want it (Deut. xi. 13, 14). So we are to ask for grace "in the time of need" (Heb. iv. 16). There are some souls so accustomed to be withered that they think it is the proper condition. But there is for us all guidance in the time of uncertainty, patience under persecution, endurance in trial, strength for work, quietness in sickness, boldness for rebuke. Ask the Lord to do for us what is needful, and do not trouble as to what He will do with us. When we have asked, wait and watch for the answer. Never mind through what particular channel the blessing comes. Probably each speaker will be used for a different purpose. As we look at the world and the Church, do we not feel that this is a time of special need? The enemies of God seem banded together to resist his working, and the call to go to the ends of the world is being sounded out loudly. The need is great.

"And the Lord shall give showers." We put so many "if's" between our prayers and God's answers. God binds together the prayer and the promise with a simple conjunction "and." Let us not interpose a doubt. If there is any hard and stubborn heart here, that does not mean to ask the Lord for a blessing, shall we not ask for them, and they shall have showers whether they want them or not. We have not really begun to ask of God yet. Let us get our vessels ready to hold what is to come; and let us not be careful if the blessing overflows to others.

THE SABBATH MEETINGS.

These were on the same scale as in former years; six were held in the tent in the course of the day. The early prayer-meeting was large, and a time of soul-refreshing and preparation of spirit. A goodly congregation came together at 10.35, as an overflow from the churches. The discourse or address was given by Rev. J. Harford Battersby, who gave a simple but weighty message to his fellow Christians as well as to the unsaved, from 1 John i. 4; ii. 1; v. 13—the necessity of knowing that we have eternal life; of having dominion over sin; and of rejoicing in God with fulness of joy.

In the afternoon there were an evangelistic service and a service for children; in the evening another "over-flow," at which Mr. Hudson Taylor spoke on the privileges of the Bride of Christ as set forth in picture in the Song of Solomon; and finally an evangelistic meeting addressed by Bishop Hill and Dr. Harry Guinness.

THE PARISH CHURCH SERVICES

were crowded morning and evening; the preachers were Rev. H. B. Macartney and Rev. Hurbert Brooke. In the forenoon Mr. Macartney preached a singularly pungent and searching sermon on singleness of eye in the Christian, what hinders it, what it is, and how it may be maintained. One of the greatest principles of the Christian religion (he said) is that God can be his people's possession. We may have God; He is worth having; and we must have Him if we are to be heirs of eternal life. The singleness of eye required is hindered by allowing self in its varied phases—righteous self equally with sinful self; or the world, its maxims, customs, and allurements; or the things relating to God's worship and service; or the servants of God, however eminent, fill our vision, so that the full sight of God is obscured or intermitted. "I will keep the Lord ever before me" is the motto and method of the single-eyed believer. This is the thing to strive after, and also the way to attain it. The words of the preacher were very weighty, as I have said, and there were grateful references to the sermon by some who took part in the later engagements of the day.

At the evening hour, Mr. Hubert Brooke took up a somewhat similar line of thought from Obadiah, ver. 17: "Upon Mount Zion there shall be deliverance, and there shall be holiness; and the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions." Mr. Brooke loves to stray back into the green pastures of the Mosaic and prophetic writings, and reap from them lessons and consolations for the modern Church. His preliminary thesis on this occasion was that God is the supreme possession of his people, and, conversely, the Church is God's coveted possession. Then he showed, from the bit of history in which the text is embedded, and from experience, that the three stages of the true Christian life are: (1) deliverance from the penalty and bondage of sin; (2) holiness of heart and action; and (3) the enjoyment of our promised possession in Christ.

THE NEEDS OF IRELAND,

as the well-established custom now seems to be, were the theme of prayer and exhortation at the large early morning meeting of Monday. The prayers by Mr. Wilson (chairman), General Hatt Noble, and Mr. Johnston were fervent and pointed. General Noble read and presented special requests, among others for a priest who has lately severed himself from the Romish Church.

Very moving and interesting reports as to the spiritual condition of the sister isle and the recent successes of itineration were given by two Irish brethren. Mr. Johnston quoted some of the characteristic Popish teachings to show the need for pure Gospel effort among the masses of the people. The great cause of Ireland's woes is the lack of the Bible among the people. The speaker said he had seen priests burning copies of the Scriptures over and over again. So great is the ignorance of the people as to saving truth, that they need the Gospel really as much as the heathen in Africa. Some instances were given of the resentment shown when attempts are made to bring to the people the Gospel message. On the other hand, there are plenty of open doors, if due wisdom is shown at the outset in gaining the ear of the people. Many are breaking away from the thraldom in which the priests have held them, and there is danger of their lapsing into infidelity or indifferentism. Thankful reference was made to the work of Mrs. Smyly's schools in Dublin, and to the labours of colporteurs and evangelists of different societies; all these are producing great and good results. Every Sunday afternoon in Dublin from 200 to 500 people listen in the open air to the Gospel preaching, and though there is a little rough treatment accorded sometimes to the preachers, there is also much to be thankful for. Within a recent period some fifty persons have definitely relinquished Romish error, and embraced the Gospel of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ alone.

Mr. Mumford, one of the colporteur evangelists visiting Irish fairs and markets, who greatly interested last year's Convention, had again a most cheering account to give of similar visitation and like successes. He explained how he caught "the bhoys" by sanctified guile, so that many were induced to buy copies of the Douay Testament. Within the last nine weeks he and a companion had visited forty-eight fairs and sold 700 copies, principally to Roman Catholics. Sometimes, on revisiting a place, they find that the priests have stirred up the prejudices and passions of the people, but in spite of opposition they get among the people, and furnish the Word of God to those who know nothing of it.

Rev. R. C. Hallowes, who has fought such a stubborn fight for free speech at Arklow and won it, told something of his experiences, and the difficulties by which Gospel work is surrounded there. He regarded Ireland as a capital training-ground for intending foreign missionaries, and entreated that many English friends should go over and help them. He stated that the introduction of the military and police to Arklow, in connection with the recent troubles there, had cost the Government £7000.

THE OPENING MEETING.

An hour before the appointed time people began to flock to the great tent. The evening trains from the South brought large accessions to swell the throngs in the town. Before the hour of the meeting, the tent was crowded out, and an overflow meeting announced in the Drill Hall, an unprecedented thing in the history of the Convention. A jubilant hymn of praise was the opening exercise. After silent prayer, Rev. Handley C. G. Moule, of Cambridge, led in vocal petition, confession, and thanksgiving, the vast company joining in the Lord's Prayer. A prayer-hymn, "Search me, O God, my actions try," was then sung feelingly.

Mr. Robert Wilson, chairman, read a part of Matthew v., and remarked that it was time we as Christians strove to live as the Master taught in the Sermon on the Mount. Rev. Geo. Wilson, Edinburgh, having prayed earnestly for a present blessing, Dr. Elder Cumming, of Glasgow, gave the opening address, as he has done for years past. Isaiah ii. 17, 18, formed his text. This is a very remarkable chapter—a call to the Israelites to walk in the light of the Lord, notwithstanding the discovery of hindrances. The special sins of Israel were here seen—love of money, indulgence in soothsaying, self-pleasing, excessive luxury, idols in the heart, self-confidence in their own works, and national pride. The revelation of God brings humility and hiding of face because of sin and unworthiness. Quoting Isaiah's confession, "I am a man of unclean lips," the speaker said that sins of the tongue are special sins of the Christian—even the Christian worker—to be repented of in the dust. If God alone be exalted this week, then we may look for blessings. Let our prayer to God be, "Show me thy glory, whatever be the form it takes." Every idol represented in the tent must be given up—Church, congregation, position, name, character—whatsoever it be, even Keswick Convention itself. Gather and bury, and every idol at the very beginning. Addressing newcomers, Dr. Cumming said they would have bitterness and disappointment, but in that proportion probably would be the blessing. Others have attended twenty Conventions. What a terrible responsibility if they have received no spiritual uplifting! None of us, speakers or hearers, should think we cannot attain a deeper possession of God's power than we have now.

After another hymn of prayer for revival, and prayer by Rev. Charles Fox, Prebendary Webb-Peploe spoke, as complementary to the aspects of truth dealt with in the preceding address. He felt he had been guided in choosing as his subject, The Beauty of God, and what He is prepared to be to those who trust Him. Many come to conventions with fluttering hearts, desiring to know the special truth taught. It is the same truth as is taught elsewhere, but it is the definite appropriation of it that is pressed here. The gathering together of many of God's servants to hear his voice and welcome his message has been found to be an occasion of real blessing. The darker and the brighter sides of truth will go together throughout the week.

Taking Jeremiah xxxi. 14, "My people shall be satisfied with my goodness," as the basis of his joyful message, the speaker said that in this life there may be a realisation of this wonderful dream. Conviction of sin must come; afterwards the way of redemption, and then the way of holiness may be trodden. As a result, there will be blessed satiety to the soul. Do we think God's promise too good to be true? Nay, but there are conditions, and it is only through contrition for the past, and appropriation for the present, that we can erect our Ebenezers, and experience full satisfaction in

THE GOODNESS OF THE LORD.

Unbelief is the sole hindrance. The Bible speaks much of this soul-satisfaction. It cannot be easily defined, but embraces the supply of all possible need. How disgraceful that so many in the Church are unsatisfied, and even dissatisfied. The drunkard is more satisfied with his cup often than the Christian who looks so miserable, though God offers him complete satisfaction. Our Father is no miser in his gifts. We need not groan and grieve over a mortal body.

Do we speak, and look, and act with respect to our great Father in any way like Jesus Christ? If not, how can we show to the world the manifold wisdom and goodness of God? Would we be rich? Look at Psalm xc. 14, "Satisfy us early with thy mercy." It is to the meek whom God sends satisfaction (Psalm xxxvi.); to the upright (Psalm xxxvii.); to the meditative one (Psalm lxiii. 5, 6); to the true worshipper (Psalm lxv. 4); to the attentive one (Psalm lxxxi. 16); to the one who sets his love on God (Psalm xci. 16); to the man who rejoices fully (Psalm ciii. 5). Twenty-seven years ago, said the speaker, I was chaplain to the workhouse in Hereford. In a common shed that held the parish hearse, there lay a poor man wasting away with cancer in the mouth. No one would sit with him except the epileptic idiots of the place, who were regarded with fear. For three months I had to visit him there as he lay dying, an offence to all, but a treasure to God. His last words, feebly spluttered out, were, "Bless the Lord, O my soul." What an object-lesson for many of us! Strange paradox. It is not for our own satisfaction that we are to be satisfied; it is for Him who is to see of the travail of his soul in us, and therein to be satisfied. After his impressive and searching address, Mr. Webb-Peploe prayed, and the awed assemblage dispersed.

A very large early prayer-meeting was held on Tuesday. Earnest petitions were presented from different parts of the tent for searching and filling. Rev. H. B. Macartney, of Melbourne, expounded the consecration of Aaron's sons, as shadowing forth God's work for and in the believer.

On Friday afternoon there is to be a special Christian Endeavour meeting in the Congregational Church at five o'clock, when addresses will be given by Rev. F. B. Meyer and others, followed by a short open conference. It is hoped that there will be a considerable rally of Christian Endeavourers and friends interested in the movement.

TO KESWICK FRIENDS.

"Together with Him."

O ye who "go to Keswick,"
To meet the Master there;
To join with friends together,
In fervent praise and prayer;
Remember, though we cannot
Be with you, face to face,
And blend with yours our voices,
In that sweet resting-place,
Our prayers shall yet be mingled,
Before the Father's Throne,
Yours from the tent at Keswick
Ours from some spot, alone!

HOLIDAY NOTES.—DOUGLAS.

Douglas is in some respects so much like Bournemouth that it does not seem likely that a Bournemouth pastor would choose it for a portion of his holidays. To me, however, it has associations that make it peculiarly interesting and attractive. Here, twenty-one years ago, I was converted. Here, too, in an old house in a back street, my Christian work commenced; and how well can I recall my joy when a poor woman, stricken with paralysis, professed to receive the truth through my lips!

Among the changes that have taken place during the last twenty years the most unsatisfactory is the remarkable growth of the spirit of worldliness. Along the Promenade alone there are no less than five places of amusement, in all of which the chief attraction every week night is dancing. To say the least, this form of amusement, in which young men and women, who are often strangers to each other, are allowed liberties which at any other time would be deemed improper, is perilous.

The evil does not end here. At some of these places an attempt is made to cater for the people on Sunday evenings by the announcement of a sacred concert. Bills are posted containing the names of the artistes; and, unfortunately, it appears to be the popular thing to leave the church for the concert hall. Young people staying at the board ing-houses in Douglas need to have spiritual intelligence to perceive the mockery of this, and to be sufficiently independent and courageous to go against the popular custom.

My Sundays in Douglas were spent at the Baptist chapel in Broadway, which has recently been erected through the earnest faithful work of Pastor F. B. Westlake, from Mr. Spurgeon's College. Those to whom the Gospel is dear will rejoice in the success which God has given to our brother Westlake and his excellent wife. The building is a very modest one, costing only about £300, with wooden sides and a plain brick front. But it occupies a good position, and already gathers a good congregation.

The effort of Mrs. Westlake to help her husband is deserving of all encouragement. For the benefit of Christians visiting the island, who desire more quiet than is found nearer to the town, she has opened a large boarding-house at the end of the Promenade, but conveniently reached by the trams which pass the door. Some such effort as this is necessary if the work is to be maintained; for it must be long before the young cause can sustain its pastor. Having stayed with Mrs. Westlake I can bear testimony that no happier or more comfortable home could be desired. The Christian associations formed there are likely to be a life-long pleasure.

DUBLIN.

From Douglas there are frequent trips to Scotland and Ireland. We took advantage of one of these, and accompanied some Christian friends to their home in Dublin. The sights seen during a drive through the city included the O'Connell Bridge and statue, the old Houses of Parliament, Trinity College, Phœnix Park, and especially the spot where Lord Cavendish and Mr. Burke were murdered, the cemetery with its O'Connell monument, and the grave of Mr. Parnell, still plentifully covered with wreaths; some of the churches of the city, Romish and Protestant, and Merrion Hall, where so excellent a work is being done.

Upon Kingstown pier, easily reached by tram from Dublin, I picked up a tract, the opening sentences of which startled me by their impious references to Mary. But on reading further I found that the tract was the work of zealous Protestants, who sought to open the eyes of the people to what Mariolatry really means.

On the next day a few of us paid a visit to Mrs. Smyly's Homes; and by the courtesy of the friends were permitted to enter the school, both of the boys and of the girls. In the spacious boys' schoolroom about seventy were assembled, and at our entrance they were gathered together in an orderly manner that would do credit to any school. We listened with profoundest interest and pleasure to their intelligent replies to questions based upon their hundred texts. It is doubtful whether scholars in our own Sunday-schools have anything like so intelligent an acquaintance with the teaching of Scripture concerning purgatory; the worship of Mary; priesthood, true and false; and what the Church of Rome calls mortal and venial sins. Nothing can so surely prevent error as having the mind stored with truth; this, the work of Mrs. Smyly does for her children with remarkable success.

In the girls' school there were about fifty present, who were occupied with some form of needlework when we entered. When they were all assembled together we observed the same clearness in distinguishing the Romish error from the Bible truth, and the same readiness to give not only the words of Scripture but the chapter and verse quoted. The singing of the girls was led by one of themselves, and the words of the hymn, which could be distinctly heard, had about them the ring of sound evangelical truth.

We left Dublin, delighted above all beside with what we had seen and heard at Mrs. Smyly's Homes, and would commend this work to the prayerful and practical sympathy of all Christians.

THE TASTE FOR HEALTHFUL READING is, no doubt, one of the most valuable which boys and girls can get, and the more it is imparted to them at school the better it will be for them and the country.—Thomas Hughes.

SUMMER GATHERING AT PARSON'S GREEN.—On Saturday, on the invitation of the committee of the "Friendless and Fallen" Institution, a large party of the society's workers spent a pleasant afternoon and evening in the garden of one of the homes in this locality. Mr. Theodore Barnes presided over a meeting on the lawn, and in the course of an address asked workers to have confidence in themselves, in the committee, and above all in Him whose work they were attempting to do. Rev. Dr. Davies also addressed words of encouragement to them, and heartily congratulated the Society on the appointment of Mr. W. J. Taylor to the secretariat.

THE MILWAUKEE RESCUE MISSION has opened a new mission hall and shelter, in which social work for the rescue and reclamation of the lost and fallen has been commenced. A helping hand will be extended to those who are physically unable to perform manual labour. Fifteen cents will entitle a man to a night's lodging. Any ordinary man or woman can perform work sufficient in three or four hours to entitle them to board and lodging for twenty-four hours. This work will be done in the wood-yard which is connected with the mission. An employment bureau will be connected with the mission, by which the inmates will be provided with outside jobs. By this means the inmates of the mission are encouraged to become industrious and self-supporting.

THE LIBERATOR RELIEF FUND.—The call for help for the women and children of the seamen lost in the Victoria seems to have suppressed all interest in the fund for helping the victims of the great Liberator swindle. At something under £26,000—instead of the £100,000 declared by the committee to be necessary—this fund has come practically to a dead stop. A correspondent who has greatly interested himself in this matter, while writing in the fullest sympathy with the object of the Victoria fund, nevertheless contends that, sad as that disaster was, the distress resulting from the rascality and mismanagement of the Liberator directors has been tenfold greater. He pleads very earnestly that contributions may still be sent to the hon. secretary of the Fund, 16, Farringdon-street, London, E.C.—Daily News.

Summer at Northfield.—II.

A WEEK WITH THE "COLLEGE BOYS."

WHEN nearly four hundred students, drawn from nearly one hundred colleges, and representing nearly every State, meet in a quiet and secluded hamlet such as this, the inhabitants are likely to know it, and sometimes to their cost, when standing corn and hay are deemed of less importance than "a short cut" to the river or the wood. But no such depredations can be laid to the charge of those who have been attending the annual Students' Conference here this week. "Well, I'll allow they're a well-behaved set, but they do holler," said an old farmer to me, whose ears, not his wheat, had suffered from their exuberance.

For eight consecutive years this gathering of the college clans has taken place, and although the attendance has been rather smaller this year, it has been very gratifying in view of the attractions at Chicago. Following the lead of Northfield, similar conventions are held at Lake Geneva, in the West, and Knoxville, in the South, the former of which, from its comparative proximity to the World's Fair, has drawn many delegates who desired to visit that great exhibition.

Although Mr. Moody takes no part in the actual bringing of the men together, which is done by the various secretaries, his presence is always one of its most welcome features. His great heart goes forth to young men, and he never speaks to better advantage than when among them. And as he counsels them to make the most of their opportunities—opportunities such as he himself never had—there comes over the meeting a solemn hush when he reminds them that he is not as young as he was, and must look to the younger men to take up the work which little by little he lays down. But who is there among his hearers that does not lift up a heartfelt prayer that the day of his departure may yet be very far distant, and that his abnormal strength and energy may long remain unimpaired? Yet no one is more optimistic than he. "Don't you believe it, young men," he says, "when you are told that your college days are the best of your life. If you are serving God they will be better and better all the time. I know a man who is always saying what a grand time he had in 1859. Yes, it was a glorious time in my soul, too; but as I know more and more of my Master's love, every year of my life is better than the last. I thought that 1892 was but I find 1893 is better still, and I expect 1894 will eclipse them all if I live to see and enjoy it." And then he argues that in view of these succeeding years they should show diligence all the more, to prepare themselves for the work that God may have in store for them. "You can only pass through college once," he told them another time, "but in those four years you may accomplish more for Christ perhaps than during all the rest of your life; for you can influence men while they are impressionable, and the views they form then are likely to stand by them in after-life." This thought was further developed by other speakers, who urged the importance of winning men for Christ during their college career, since experience teaches that the difficulties in the way of accepting Him greatly increase when they go out into the world and become moulded into their various avocations. A later speaker put it thus:—"Seek FIRST the kingdom of God, for you will find it much harder to seek it second!"

The three subjects of conference have been: Personal work among men in college; Bible study and training for active work; missionary work in other lands. These topics occupied several hours daily, to which were added two general platform meetings, at which addresses on Christian life and service were given by Mr. Moody, Pastor Theo. Monod, of Paris; Rev. W. H. P. Faunce and Rev. Dr. Judson, New York; Rev. Prof. Pervis, Princeton University; Rev. Dr. McBride, President of Tennessee University, Knoxville; Rev. H. P. Beach, China; and, on the concluding days, Prof. Drummond, of Glasgow.

The inaugural meeting was held on Saturday evening, July 1, when Mr. Moody began by saying, in his informal cheery way, "I'm not going to give an address of welcome to-night, but you're all welcome just the same." And then, in the course of an admirable talk upon "The Will of God" which, he said, could be known only through he gave an emphatic utterance regarding the truth and authenticity of the Bible. "When you give up any part of it you may give up all, for if one portion is unreliable or inaccurate, any other may be. I have no sympathy with those who receive the New Testament but reject the Old, for the former simply abounds with quotations from the latter. and I hope no man will ever stand to speak from this platform who would cut the Bible in two. There is much in it we cannot understand, but so there is in every phase of life and learning, but this is no obstacle to our accepting and believing it; and the more we study it to find out the will of God, the better we shall understand it."

On Sunday morning Mr. Faunce struck a very suitable key-note before a large congregation of delegates, residentr, and visitors, taking as his subject the sending forth of the spies by Joshua (Num. xiii. 23). These men were the advance guard of the nation, with 600,000 behind them awaiting their return. They were to sample the country, and upon their judgment rested the whole people of God. But if they had settled down to enjoy its natural provision for their needs, forgetting the multitudes for whom they had been sent forth, they would have been false to their mission, their religion, and their God. They were sent out that where they went all might go, what they saw all might see, and where they entered all might dwell.

How true is this in the realm of knowledge! Some one man, like a tall mountain peak fired with the red glow of early morn, catches the first beams of the rising sun; then the light flows down to other points, until by-and-by it lights up the lowliest valleys. Thus do some few men receive the light of knowledge, and pass it on to the multitude. This is seen in the realms of art and science, and perhaps in things medical most of all. Our patent laws teach a man to keep to himself and for his own advantage the secret he has found; but this is not the object God has in view for those to whom He has committed talents such as these.

NOT AN ARK, BUT A LIFEBOAT.

What are we here for? If we are only to seek our own salvation, why does not God take us home at once? Because he has left us to expand the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and to bring the truth that He has given us into every human heart that we can touch. The Church of God is not a little ark, in which a few pious souls may complacently sail away into everlasting bliss; it is a lifeboat thrust out into the raging surf to save. If you have any treasure, bring it forth to the world, and save others as we have been saved; you are leaven, and the place for the leaven is in the meal; you are salt, and the place for salt is in that which it is to sweeten; you are light, and the place for light is in the darkness. What you know, all ought to know; what you feel, all ought to feel. The power of Christ that came into your hearts is to come into all hearts; and if you are not living thus you have not begun to understand the purposes of God toward us.

But you cannot give the fruits of the land to others until you have found them for yourself. We must receive before we can give. There should be in every man's heart a reception-room, in every life a receiving time. But you, who have a joy that no man taketh from you, and a peace that passeth understanding, it is for you to make known how Jesus Christ can transform a human heart and renovate a human life.

Then, let us give our best to our fellow men. It is easy to give the worst—temper, jealousy, selfishness, meanness—these always come like froth to the top. But the holiest aspirations and noblest desires are hidden away down deep in the heart, and it is sometimes hard to speak them. Give forth that which has touched your own soul the most deeply. God gave his best—his only begotten Son. You young men are the forerunners of hundreds and thousands in our country, and God bids you bring down the Eshcol clusters to those who have not yet entered the promised land.

It was at this meeting that an example of Mr. Moody's tender-heartedness and ready tact was given. He caught the ear of his audience by stating that the institutions had had a legacy left to them, but as he proceeded it was discovered that the object was one calling for sympathy rather than congratulation. After months of hard fighting against sickness and misfortune, a poor woman who had long been known in Northfield as a devoted wife and a worthy Christian, had lost her husband. A prolonged winter and the exigencies of her troubles had involved her in debt, and Mr. Moody, ever glad to help one who is needy, thought that a present of a thousand dollars would ensure her comfort for her remaining days. Those who know his persuasive powers on such an occasion will not be surprised to hear the result of an immediate collection was over eight hundred dollars, three-quarters of which will remain after her debts are paid. This sum was further increased by private gifts the following day.

During the six days of Mr. Moody's stay, before resuming his evangelistic efforts in Chicago, he addressed the students at one or other of the platform meetings daily, and his talks were greatly enjoyed. It was an interesting study to watch the attentive faces of the men upturned to him, now earnest, now broadening into a smile or even a hearty laugh as with ready speech he made a "hit." Then instantly gravity succeeded, as he applied his illustration or revealed the serious intention of his remarks.

One day he spoke upon

COMMUNION WITH GOD IN PRAYER,

weaving into his discourse the following essential elements if we would have power with God and prevail:—Adoration, confession of sin, restitution, forgiveness, thankfulness, faith, perseverance, definite petition, and submission. On other occasions he considered with great acceptance the emblems, the fruits, and the power of the Holy Spirit. Of the last some special mention must be made, for it was the experience of many present, who had been intimately associated with his meetings in Britain and America, that seldom if ever had they known his words to be clothed with such power, which was none other than that of the Spirit he was exalting. He spoke of the necessity in all Christian service of this power, which manifested itself so signally at Pentecost, and without which all labour is in vain. "Don't you covet it, young men?" he asked. "Does your soul long for it above everything else? If so, God will give it you right here to-day. But it must be for his glory, and not your own that you desire it if you are to have it."

In broken voice, he then expressed his own need of an enduement of power for the work to which he was to return in Chicago; and upon a widespread indication among the men before him that they were conscious of the same desire, he said "Then let us all this afternoon, where we can have it quiet to ourselves, and lay our need before God." Accordingly after dinner about three hundred accompanied him to a retired spot, where in seclusion from the outer world they met, as it were, God face to face, nearly two hours being devoted to deep and earnest supplication. In subsequent meetings, and also in private, there were many tokens that the Lord had been found of them that sought Him in that solemn hour.

Hardly less soul-stirring was the meeting at which Mr. Moody bade his audience farewell as he took his journey to the city of the west. With deep feeling he narrated the circumstances in his early life that led him to abandon his ambition to become a successful merchant, and to help every cause with whatever means he might acquire in that capacity; how God had led him out of the leadership of a large Sunday-school composed of a thousand children he had drawn in from the streets, in which he was "seeking great things for himself"; and how, having "tasted the luxury of leading a man to Christ," he had surrendered all his ambition and all his self-made plans to follow his Master in the path that He should choose. "And if I had a million lives, they should all be spent in the same way, and devoted to the cause of winning souls." Thus he pressed the cause of "personal work" upon his stalwart young hearers, in whose breasts, doubtless, the flame of ambition was already kindled; and thus unconsciously got back to the theme with which he had opened the conference, and which had pervaded all his utterances day by day, seeking and doing the will of God.

Then as the hands crept round the face of the clock to the hour at which his leave must be taken, he bade us all farewell with this appeal:—"I want to ask you if I should go to Chicago or stay here? I never spent ten happier days than these I have had in Northfield; it has been a great delight to me. My heart goes out to you young men, and I believe there are going to be fires kindled in Chicago that will spread all over this country. Eighty-three per cent. of the people in Chicago are foreigners or of foreign descent. There are settlements of Poles, Germans, Italians, each numbering thousands upon thousands, with their priests, and newspapers, and institutions. There are fifty languages spoken there. I have been swinging round the world for twenty-five years, but now in that city

THE WORLD IS SWINGING ROUND ME.

God may use the World's Fair to do the greatest work that has ever been done in America. The people are there, and it is a good thing to see, but it isn't as good as the Gospel, after all. That is the best thing in the world. Then let us go and publish it. Do you want me to go? Will you send me? For answer there arose a voice like the sound of many waters, as those four hundred men, caught by the holy enthusiasm of the speaker, simultaneously shouted "Yes! God go with you!" "God bless your work!" And borne upon the wings of their fervent prayers he sped away to the "White City" to proclaim the message of goodwill to men.

There is so much of interest in the proceedings of each day that it is sometimes invidious, and always difficult, to make selection for a descriptive report. But in view of the space which the addresses at Keswick will be demanding at this time, I shall next week give preference to that which is more especially characteristic of this Students' Movement.

It may be well to explain that the Y.M.C.A. in this country has obtained a far greater hold upon the universities than is the case in those of Great Britain, where an unhappy feeling of caste has relegated it to a position of "town" rather than "gown," their Christian societies being confined to their respective spheres of influence. But here the Y.M.C.A. has taken the matter right manfully in hand, with the result that it feels the pulse of religious life in nearly every college in the land. Consequently, it has an inter-collegiate phase to which we are practically strangers, the "Inter-collegiate Christian Union" of Oxford and Cambridge being a very small affair in comparison, and having no connection, I believe, with the Y.M.C.A. at all. This Conference, or "Summer school," then, is the annual rendezvous of the "Inter-collegiate Movement of the Young Men's Christian Association," attended by members of the different universities of the Union and Canada. There is a falling off of "foreign" delegates this year, only two being present, representing England and Japan. In other years there have been sometimes thirty or forty from the Continent of Europe and the British Isles. It is hoped, however, that the movement will spread further afield year by year as steps are taken to make it more widely known.

MADAME TEL SONO'S WORK.

Dear Sir,—On behalf of Madame Tel Sono and her work will you kindly say that, together with some other friends, I have carefully examined all her accounts and subscriptions, and find that they are scrupulously correct, and that the amount of her subscriptions agree with her certificates of deposit from her banker, the Yokohama Specie Bank, E.C. Madame Tel Sono has received from February 7 to July 21, £569 19s. 2d. from friends in Great Britain, besides £600 from America.

A detailed report is being prepared, a copy of which will be sent to each subscriber.

WOMEN AT THE WELL.—At a place near Marin (Spain) I found a woman washing, to whom I spoke of the blood that cleanseth from all sin. In a few moments several more came to fetch water, so I took a seat on a stone, and read to them from John iv. the story of the woman at the well, as they sat on their buckets. They were most interested, and one said with a sigh, "We have no such thing in our books." I felt deeply for them, for indeed they have no such blessed news, the Book of books being kept from them. On reaching the village I found the people ready to listen to the words of life, and I spent nearly two hours with them. One man told me, with evident delight, that he had read these words before, and also assured the people they were true, for he had bought the book three years ago in Barcelona, and had read it for himself.—*B. MR. GRUBB'S MISSION PARTY.

In a volume entitled The Same Lord (Marlborough. 4s.) Mr. E. C. Millard gives an interesting and inspiring account of the missionary tour of Rev. G. C. Grubb and his party. As the best way of commending the book to our readers, we propose, as briefly as possible, to give a few incidents from it.

As an illustration of how not to do it, nothing could be better than the account of a missionary meeting held in a gentleman's drawing-room. The chief speaker was a lady missionary from India, who told many interesting stories of work among the women there. After she had pleaded for more than an hour for £6 to pay for one more Bible-woman for a year, the guests were taken in to a magnificent supper that must have cost at least £20! Mr. Millard adds, "A young lady sitting in front of me had been talking nearly the whole time to her neighbour about the price of her diamond rings, etc. The glittering of jewels, the delicious ice-creams, the superb wines, of course added to the beauty of the scene; and the majority seemed quite pleased with themselves, and as if it only wanted someone to strike up a waltz, with free liberty to dance, and their evening's enjoyment would be complete!" (page 42). How does this story of a feast read by the side of the missionary fast in Acts xiii.?

As a contrast to this, the story of what occurred at

of the Geelong Convention is refreshing. As the benediction was about to be pronounced, a slip of paper was put into Mr. Grubb's hand. He read it, then announced that "a lady had sent in £2 for the China Inland Mission." Other donations quickly followed. An archdeacon gave his archidiaconal ring. The story continues: "Another lady sent a cheque for £100, a gentleman for £50; several gold watches followed, also numerous articles of jewellery, from sleeve-links to diamond rings. The greatest solemnity prevailed, and there were subdued expressions of 'Praise God!' 'Glory to his name!' when another man offered a cottage and nine acres of land, and a lady and gentleman promised £120 per annum to support a missionary in the foreign field. This scene continued altogether for half-an-hour, and the value of gifts in articles, money, and promises amounted to over £1000" (page 164). This is the kind of generous support the missionary cause ought to receive.

For the expenses of Mr. Grubb's Mission, God moved many hearts to great liberality. One or two instances may prove interesting. At one of the thanksgiving meetings for blessing received during a mission, among many other letters sent in was one "From a Little Girl," who wrote, "Please accept the enclosed 7s. 6d.; my sister and I have sold our dolls and toys, and twelve bunches of flowers, and got 7s. 6d. for the Mission" (page 114). The amount was small, but it represented a degree of real self-denial which the Lord of the treasury would value highly.

We give the following in Mr. Millard's own words:—

A knock was heard at the rectory door, and a foundryman, in his working clothes, asked for me. Through the black of the foundry I recognised a man who had asked me one night how we lived, "because," said he, "you have no collections." I had told him that we lived on Phil. iv. 19, and that He pays our expenses. He now said, "Good morning. Will you please accept this toward the Mission?" and handed me a £1 note. We did not like to take so much, but he assured us that it was nothing. "I've been converted through the Mission, and this is only a small thank-offering." We thanked him, and said, "May the Lord bless you for this," and he went away, looking as if it had given him the greatest joy to part with his hard-earned pound (pages 89, 90).

PRAYER MEETINGS

are not always so full of the spirit of liberty as they ought to be. Here is a specimen of one of the most unsatisfactory sort, yet we fear that our ordinary prayer meetings are sometimes something like it. The women's meeting conducted by Mrs. Millard showed the idolatry of some of these women—for "stubbornness is idolatry" (1 Sam. xv. 23). Not one of them would join in singing the hymn, and as to praying aloud, they would no more dream of it than of peeling potatoes with a fork. After at least ten minutes of dead silence while on their knees, one voice only made itself heard, "O Lord, we can pray to ourselves, we can" (page 139).

A footnote on page 156 presents us with a delightful contrast to the above:

Fully twelve hundred men were present, and at the close Mr. Campbell, who took the chair, summed up the meeting by saying, "The three points of the meeting are these—forgiveness, cleansing, and power for service." We all knelt in prayer, and Mr. Campbell said, "Now ask, take by faith, then stop." One after another prayed for whatever they severally felt they needed, and in the course of twenty minutes eighty-five prayed. Then there was a pause, when the chairman said, "Now let us rise, and those who have received by faith what they asked for, stand up and testify." Fifty-six did so during the next thirty minutes.

We commend as useful for other prayer meetings the chairman's excellent counsel, "Now ask, take by faith, then stop."

WORLDLINESS

in various forms comes in for notice in the course of this Mission. It does not appear whether Mr. Grubb or his companions said anything in condemnation of smoking, but if they did not, God did, and made it clear to many that their testimony would be much more for the glory of God if they abandoned the practice. The father of a family, which had been greatly blessed, said one morning that he had yielded his all to God, when his boy said, "You will have to give up smoking now, father." "No, my boy," the father replied, chuckling, "because I gave that up yesterday." After a sermon by Mr. Grubb on "The woman left her waterpot," one young fellow, outside the porch, took out his clay pipe, threw it on the ground, and stamped upon it with his heel, saying, "Here goes my waterpot," and then added, "Now I'm going to trust the Lord to take away the desire" (pages 67 and 100).

Bazaars, as another form of worldliness, could have no better reproof than the following striking description of one into which David, the Tamil evangelist, strayed. We give the conversation in full:—

"Where were you?" "Oh," said he, "I was walking along the road there, and I saw a place all lighted up, and thought it was the Salvation Army, so stopped, and a gentleman asked me to come in. So I said 'What is it?' 'One shilling,' But I said, 'Is it a good cause?' 'Oh yes,' he said, 'it is a good cause.' So I paid my shilling and went in, but when I got in there I saw people all funny, and like shops round the room, and many people there, and some ladies came round with all sorts of things and wanted me to buy. So I said, 'Oh, my Lord, what is this? Why hast Thou brought me here?' Then a lady said, 'Will you go in for a raffle?' So I said, 'What is a "raffle"?' and she told me, 'You may get a prize.' So I said, 'But I don't want raffle. I'm satisfied; I have got Christ inside.' By this time a crowd of people had gathered round. 'And now I see why God has brought me here, because I didn't know; but He has brought me here to tell you how I am satisfied, and you can be satisfied too. It is like this: I have a bottle full of good milk, and you come to me with water for me to buy, and I say, No, I've got my bottle full of milk, and I don't want water to mix with it. I have got Jesus, and am satisfied, and what can a satisfied man want more?'" (pages 110, 111).

That is not the kind of talk usually heard at bazaars.

The way in which a difficulty concerning was settled is interesting. Before the mission began a girl had promised to act in one of these representations, but having learned to hate the whole thing, she wanted to get out of it, while her mother kept reminding her, "You know you promised to act, and you must not break your promise, my dear." Special prayer was offered in connection with it. At the evening meeting, after Mr. Grubb's sermon on "Wilt thou be made whole?" twenty-two persons, including the vicar's wife, knelt at the communion rail in token that they trusted God to make them whole. The following day Mr. Millard overtook two girls, and one of them said to him at once, "It's all settled about the tableau vivant." "How is that?" he asked. "The whole thing has fallen through because all the girls who were going to act have got saved and don't want to go." One could very heartily wish that every tableau vivant might collapse for a similar reason (Pages 105, 107).

With the following incident we draw this present notice to a close. Erroneous teaching puts a very serious difficulty in the way of all earnest evangelical work. We shall let Mr. Millard tell the story:

A lady from a distance came up to Mrs. Millard at one of her after-meetings and said, in great distress, that the real hindrance to her definitely receiving the blessings brought forward so prominently in the Mission was, that the clergyman in the parish where she lived had told her that every blessing was received in baptism and confirmation, viz., regeneration at baptism and the power of the Spirit at confirmation. The lady told him that Mr. Grubb preached quite differently, and she had heard him say that many needed forgiveness of sins and the power of the Spirit, although they had been both baptized and confirmed. "Oh," said the clergyman, "that is easily accounted for by the fact that Mr. Grubb belongs to the Church of Ireland, and their prayer-book is totally different to the Church of England" (pages 120, 121).

In a footnote Mr. Millard says: "There is no material difference. Let readers compare for themselves"; and the story concludes with the fervent ejaculation, "Lord forgive him!" to which we respond "Amen," and add the further petition, "Lord, enlighten him, and all who are in the same darkness!"

RITUALISM RAMPANT IN EAST LONDON.

BY A CLERGYMAN.

Such is the title of a startling pamphlet issued by the Council of the Church Association upon the East London Church Fund, under the supervision of Right Rev. Dr. Billing, the Bishop of Bedford. It is a most sickening revelation of the rapid progress which Romanism is making in the Church of England; and, if similar advance is being made all over England, the sooner the Established Church is deprived of her endowments the better for the civil and religious liberties of our country. On examining this remarkable document, we find that no fewer than sixty-five East London churches having the idolatrous "Eastward Position" receive amongst them nearly £8000 a-year, or about one-half of the Fund. Out of these churches forty-five have Romish "altar lights" and have Romish "vestments," sixteen have "coloured vestments," and twelve have "incense." Of the vicars of these churches, twenty-three belong to the English Church Union, which is pledged to the Eastward Position, vestments, altar lights, mixed chalice, incense, purgatory, and visible communion with the Papal Antichrist; while thirteen belong to the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament, which circulates in secret intercession papers, mass, prayers for the dead, fasting communion, penance, reserved sacrament, etc.

In addition to these statistics of Romish progress in the Established Church, an account is given of two visits paid to the church of St. Clement, City Road, E.C. We are assured that this is by no means a solitary, or the most extreme, case. All we can say is, that if there are many such churches in England, we are rapidly going back to Popish darkness and mediævalism. At St. Peter's, London Docks (another church aided by the East London Fund), the clergy say that they heard 3500 confessions during 1892; and recently after their Dedication Festival Mass they had a Cinderella dance!! The visitor to St. Clement's says that he saw as follows: 1. On the west wall of the church a list of the names of dead persons, for whose souls in Purgatory prayers were asked and being offered. 2. The Romish Stations of the Cross hung round the church as on the Continent. 3. A large crucifix—not a cross—over the back of the pulpit. 4. An altar, with a brass crucifix and an image over it. He says that he found two chapels inside this church—one, "The Chapel of the Sacred Heart," the other that of "Our Lady," the Queen of Heaven. In the Chapel of the Sacred Heart is an image of the Lord Jesus, before which fifteen candles burn, with fifteen more candles which are lighted, and two crucifixes. And more besides.

We are informed that this same church of St. Clement has a ward of the Romish Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament, mass every month for the Romish Guild of All Souls in Purgatory, and High Mass every Sunday morning. Our informant says that he went to the High Mass, and found things said and done in this building belonging to the Established Church which fill the hearts of the faithful in Christ Jesus with deep shame and grief. He found the Eastward Position adopted, Manual Acts after the Romish fashion, six tall altar lights, and two candles lit on the Credence Table. Four more lighted candles were brought in for the act of Transubstantiation, and were raised aloft to salute the sacrificial wafer. The three priests who officiated wore birettas. The chief priest, or celebrant, wore a coloured chasuble, with albe, stole, and girdle; and the other two wore dalmatics, also with albe, stole, and girdle. There were eight acolytes, who wore scarlet cassocks, with white cottas, on which deep lace was worked. Four of these wore little red skull caps. There were the processional and recessional, during which lighted tapers were held aloft, while INCENSE was burnt at various parts of this Romish Mass in the Church of England. The wafer-bread was employed for the sacrifice, and was worshipped. The Sanctus bell was rung, and an attendant rang the outside church bell to let the parish know that the miracle of the mass had been accomplished by the priest. There were no communicants.

This is called the legal service of the Church of England; and St. Clement's receives the sum of £115 from the East London Church Fund. It is stated that the Fund receives support from some clergymen who are widely known as thorough Evangelicals. If this be so, we ask, with all Christian gravity, how can Evangelical clergymen subsidise such rank Popery in the Church of England?

DOMINION DAY AT STRATFORD.

The first of July and following days was a time to be remembered by the workers at the Stratford Home. Dominion Day is the special holiday which commemorates the formation of the Dominion of Canada, and coming, as it does, just before the busy harvest, it affords us opportunity of reunion with many young men and women who in their childhood have been our peculiar care. Various trains brought to us on the 1st inst. grown-up boys and girls, to stay over Sunday. Nothing was wanting in the arrangements for their comfort and enjoyment that Mr. and Mrs. W. Merry could think of. All seemed to look upon this place as their home. As they had arrived in the land of their adoption by various parties, and at different periods of time, some of them had to make each other's acquaintance, and naturally they wanted to see the photos of their own special party. In these groups they discovered their former selves, and we heard frequent exclamations, "That was me ten years ago," etc. How the hearts of the readers of The Christian would have rejoiced with us! Those who have borne us up during long years by prayer, and with self-denial have aided us to rescue and train those we now behold growing into manhood. Doubtless in their early years the world would have counted them useless, rough material, from which little could be produced, but now we had to adore Him who had called them by his grace, and who would yet use them to show forth his glory. How sweet it was to note the glistening eye and the rapt attention, as one and another of the workers spoke to them of Jesus Himself! Deeply touching was the testimony of a dear lad, who only two years previously had been on the streets of London. None could refrain from tears of sympathy as he recounted the goodness of the Lord, in raising up a lady to care for him, and as he traced the hand of the Lord in leading him, step by step, since the death of his parents. We praised the Father of the fatherless together, thanking Him for his compassionate love.

The Lord's Day was one of the happiest ever spent. We were awaked by hearing some of our favourite hymns resounding from a group gathered on the verandah soon after six o'clock. In the morning we all assembled in God's house, and the afternoon was spent over a Bible reading on Lydia, "whose heart the Lord opened." After the evening meal a tremendous thunderstorm broke over the town, making it plain that all must remain at home. A couple of hours were spent in conversation, singing, and prayer. Mr. F. McCarthy (one of our visitors among the children for the present) gave illustrations from his experience in China, telling of answers to prayer resulting in precious souls being gathered in from among the heathen. A closing message was given by Miss Kilpatrick, followed by a hallowed season of prayer.

On Monday there were fresh arrivals, of those whose duties would only permit of a short visit. How our hearts overflowed with joy and praise, as we greeted many a well-dressed, modest young woman. One, who had been out in Canada many years, asked about her antecedents. Turning to our history book we gave her the account, as she was able to bear it—father dead, mother a street-singer. She suppressed her tears, and whispered, "I guess my mother is very poor." Gladly would we have suggested her mother coming out to Canada, but the sad habit of drinking absolutely forbade it. One of the greatest needs of our Homeland is for the women of England to unite as one, in seeking to win back our suffering sisters to the Gospel and the temperance cause. Meanwhile may our life, while it lasts, be spent in saving poor children, who are the innocent victims of this awful curse, which is slaying its tens of thousands in our land.

We have not kept from the beginning a complete record of the marriages of our children, but at a rough calculation they number some hundreds. The latest union that we know of has given us much joy, as both husband and wife are our former children, and are sincere followers of the Lord Jesus. Said John, when giving an account of himself, "Miss, Amy and I were two who never had a home in England, so we pray that ours may be and his children." Then he proceeded: "Will you take this 5s. back to the old land and spend it at ——— lodging-house in giving a free bed for some poor fellows, for it was a fourpence given me there, one cold winter's night, which first showed me that someone cared for me?" It was beautiful to see their delight in carrying off a family Bible and texts for the walls of their cottage, exacting a promise from us that we would visit them before returning to England.

Before leaving Stratford several young men evinced a longing, in private conversation, for further education. One of the ministers visiting us told his own experience. "Look to the Lord about your future. During winter hire out to do a farmer's chores for your board; see that it is near a High School, then in summer you can earn good wages, and go forward the next winter as your way opens up in your studies. Don't take help from anyone, but prove that you are in earnest to help yourself. I was twenty when I began thus, and at thirty I was through the University." We ask prayer for our young men, that many may be called to go forth in his name to the heathen.

Through The Christian we ask all those who have gone forth to China, Africa, or India, to write a letter to the sixty-six bands who have come to Canada, giving their own experience in the foreign field. Such letters would be published in the quarterly magazine called Home News, which is edited by W. H. Merry, Boys' Home, Stratford, Ontario.

Ere long we shall all meet beyond the river. Our Lord is coming speedily, when He will give to each one the reward—his own smile, the "Well done." Meanwhile let us pray more for one another, and let us "trust and not be afraid."—Yours till He come,

ANNIE MACPHERSON.

GOSPEL WORK IN MADEIRA.

In the little Scotch Church next door to the Sailors' Rest, there is a native congregation, with over thirty communicants, worshipping, as it has done for seventeen years. The missionary is provided by the Free Church of Scotland, and the number of its adult adherents may perhaps be seventy. These comprise all the Portuguese in the island who wish themselves to be considered Protestants. There are five mission schools (not counting the school kept by Mrs. Smart's sisters). Two of the five are in Funchal, both kept by Portuguese converts from Roman Catholicism, the number of scholars averaging from thirty to forty, and the mistresses receiving pecuniary aid from Wales and Scotland. The three other schools are in the mountains, one being maintained by American friends who left this island during the persecution nearly fifty years ago; and two, connected with the Scotch Church, are supported by voluntary subscriptions.

All these schools are taught by Portuguese, and were almost all begun voluntarily with no pay at all. The teachers felt impelled to give the Bible to all who cared to receive it. This is their one weapon against the teaching of the priests, the one light they have to guide them. It is their reading and recitation book. The children know whole chapters by heart, and verse after verse is copied and hung upon the walls. The teachers and their converted scholars form an earnest little band, standing faithfully shoulder to shoulder against the common enemy. Besides the weekly service in the church there are cottage meetings, Sunday Schools and prayer-meetings, and any English friend is cordially welcomed who, by words or deeds, can help them in their struggles towards light.

It is not so much new openings of schools which are needed as kindly succour to those which are at work. A school like Mrs. Smart's, where the mistress is well paid, can give no idea of one of these cottage mission schools, where the mistress knows every child's home, its hunger and nakedness, its wants and capacities, and can but seldom give a mouthful of boiled corn or a little piece of bread taken from her own narrow store. These children are menaced by the priests with hell for their heresy, taunted in the roads by their neighbours, and stoned by their playfellows, and yet they come.

Anyone desirous of knowing more of the work of the Gospel in Madeira, of its progress, difficulties, and needs, can obtain information, or be put into direct communication with the mission workers, by writing to Rev. A. Drummond Paterson, Quinta Pico Sao Joao, Madeira.

A RESIDENT IN MADEIRA.

THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The "people called Methodists," to use the old phrase, which the Wesleyans love, are holding their one hundred and fiftieth annual Conference, and holding it for the first time in Wales. Roath-road Chapel, Cardiff, has since Tuesday week been crowded day by day by the ministers forming what is known as the Pastoral Session. The first business (the Legal Hundred having been completed) was the election of the president, Rev. H. J. Pope being chosen for this honourable post.

Dr. Rigg, the retiring president, said, in introducing his successor: The same Providence, I trust I may say, which has enabled me to discharge the duties of the year, and brought me to its close, has now called you into the place, the head of this conference. You have been known to the people of our Church as well as to the ministry for many years past, because of your disinterestedness, your single-mindedness, your unostentatious zeal and services on behalf of your Church. No man has made less of himself personally. No man has more entirely devoted himself to the work of the Connexion. You are known and trusted because you have the complete mastery of the system of the Church to which we belong. You will be a wise guide on those Connexional occasions which will arise, requiring counsel, and through which we shall have to be piloted. Now, you are about to begin your tenure of office with a prayer-meeting—by the joint, united prayers of ministers and people for the blessing upon you now, and for a blessing throughout the whole term of the Conference. God's blessing helps president after president. The prayers of the whole of our Church are continually arising on behalf of the president of the Conference. May God's blessing abundantly rest upon you. That is the prayer not only of all here, but of tens of thousands of persons, even to the ends of the earth.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Rev. H. J. Pope, the new president, reviewed in his inaugural address the present-day condition of Methodism, maintaining that it is sound and healthy, and full of promise for the future. As to missionary matters, he said:—If there is one thing in Methodism to-day which gives me concern more than another, it is our relation as a Church to the great subject of foreign missions. I tremble for Methodism when I think our zeal in that department may be decaying. Is it so? I doubt whether we can expect a grand and glorious work of God at home if we are unfaithful to the cause of Christ abroad. Sometimes it seems to me as if our Lord, seeing the goodly array, our stately edifices, our perfect appointments, our growing numbers, our steadily increasing influence—nevertheless, whilst looking upon these things, says, 'One thing thou lackest," and that one thing dearer to the heart of the Redeemer. We can't be true to Him if we are not true to his last and highest and most difficult commission. I do pray that the spirit of enthusiasm may come upon our people and preachers in relation to the great foreign mission enterprise. There is nothing more likely to lead to a grand and glorious work of God at home than fidelity in the carrying out the work of our foreign missions. And now I ask an interest in your prayers. No one ever needed it more than I do. It would be idle to pretend that I do not know the business of the Conference, having seen thirty presidents in succession occupy the chair. But I shall need your sympathy and prayers, and I ask for an earnest now. Nothing could be more appropriate than that we should meet together at the opening of the Conference, that we may spend some time in prayer. I am glad that there are representatives of our churches here present. May God grant that we may leave only good behind us, and that our people may have to thank God for the first Conference held in Cardiff.

A stirring and vigorous prayer-meeting followed, for a great revival of the Lord's work in the coming year.

Says The Methodist Recorder:—"Seldom has any Conference listened to a more than that delivered by the newly-elected President. The conditions were, it is true, more uplifting to a speaker than has been hitherto the case on such occasions. The presence of the general public, who crowded the gallery, and helped to form a deeply sympathetic and enthusiastic audience, was a great improvement on past years; and few speakers with hearts in the right place could have resisted the contagion, or failed to become themselves enthusiastic and eloquent."

INSPIRING INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Having dealt seriously with the president's words of warning, our contemporary concludes:—"God is testing us with calls louder and more imperative than any that have come to us in all our history. These calls are couched in records of success such as we have never before received, which lay upon us new and heavy burdens of pastoral care, and open great and effectual doors which would have made our fathers sing for joy. Are we going to respond or not? Opportunity is the authoritative guide of an aggressive Church. What God makes possible it is for us to make actual; but if we are to do this, if we are to rise to the honour laid upon us, and worthily respond to the call of God, a wave of new enthusiasm must sweep over our Church."

The succeeding sessions were devoted to necessary business details of practical importance to the Wesleyan Church, but presenting little of any general interest.

On Thursday Rev. J. Ernest Clapham brought forward a recommendation of the Home Mission Committee that the request of the Australian conferences and the mission district of Ceylon be granted, and that the well-known Connexional evangelist, be accorded permission to proceed on a lengthened evangelistic tour in Australia, Ceylon, and India. Leave of absence was given, the churches of Australia undertaking to bear all expenses.

Considerable time was occupied in the question of admission of candidates for the ministry. In consequence of the demands of the pulpit of the present day, it is being increasingly felt that the greatest care must be shown in the selection of suitable men. This year 120 young men have been sent up by the May district synods. These came before the conference for acceptance or otherwise. The secretary stated that about eighty men were required for the work. Each case was then considered singly, certain cases giving rise to lengthened discussion, especially the case of a married man in the Hull district, who was ultimately accepted. The allocation was as follows:—Forty-three were accepted for institution and home, twenty-three were accepted for college training and missions, three for immediate work at home, five for institution and Welsh work, one for immediate mission work, one for immediate Welsh work; forty-two candidates were declined, two were withdrawn, bringing up the total to 120.

On Friday, the secretary read a letter received by the president from the Venerable Rev. Dr. Williams, author of the "Policy of Methodism," and formerly secretary of the Conference, expressive of his continued attachment to Methodism, and speaking in terms of eulogy of the president's inaugural address, notably his reference to foreign missions.

The much-vexed question of the extension of the franchise in the election of the president of the Conference came up for discussion, when the report of the committee appointed by the last Conference to consider the subject was brought in. At the last Conference Rev. W. L. Watkinson proposed that all ministers of ten years' standing, both at home and abroad, and whether at the Conference or not, should have the right to vote. The Conference referred it to a committee which has sat during the year, and now brought in its report, recommending that no change be made. Dr. Rigg said that while sympathising with the sentiments involved in Mr. Watkinson's proposal, he regarded that proposal as, first, impracticable, and secondly as objectionable, on the grounds of the principles which governed their Methodist constitutional life. After an animated discussion, in which Revs. W. L. Watkinson, H. Price Hughes, and G. W. Olver took part, it was finally decided that the committee's report be adopted, and no change made.

A CORRESPONDENT ABROAD writes:—"Please direct the attention of distributors of printed circulars to the expense to which they put their friends by sending them insufficiently paid in closed covers, whereby they are liable to double letter-postage. Often 10d. is demanded for printed circulars, which would come open at the end for a few halfpence. Charitable institutions are the chief offenders in this respect."

SOUTH-EAST AFRICA MISSION.

Mr. and Mrs. Osborn-Howe, in an occasional letter, describe evangelistic work in their South African sphere. We make some extracts:—"The mission-hall for Zulus, opened last April in Durban, is proving, in Mr. Suter's hands, most useful. The night-school already numbers over one hundred. It is attended chiefly by men after their day's work. They are taught to read and write their own language. The hall seats 300, and of those who attend the services the large majority are heathen; a few are nominally Christians. Two gospel meetings are held on Sunday, and the many inquirers have been formed into a class.

"An advance has been made in the Majuba district, about three hundred miles from Durban. Here we have just placed a native evangelist, Umtonga, to help the Misses Grieve, who have charge of this centre. They visit the kraals on horseback. Besides holding meetings they have a night-school in our cottage. The want of a schoolroom, which could be used for meetings also, is greatly felt. At present twenty-five adults are crowded into the dining-room of 12 ft. square to write as well as to read. This work is entirely among heathen Zulus and Swazis.

"Mr. and Mrs. Olsen-Feyling have left a native in charge of their hut and stores and garden near St. Lucia, whilst they are itinerating. They write: 'We have had very blessed times and many good meetings. One very interesting meeting was with the chief on the other side of the Umkusi. We left our boy in charge of the cart, as we could not cross with it. We waded across the river, and got a long way towards the chief's kraal, where we met the chief, three of his wives, the heir of the chieftain, and another. They were on their way to see us, bringing with them a very large fowl and a pumpkin, as a present. The women had never seen a white woman before, and Mrs. Feyling is the first white woman in these parts of Zululand. It was the first time these people had heard the Gospel. We stayed at the Umkusi for two days, and crossed the river several times to hold meetings, as there were many kraals on the opposite side. They say that no white man can live there in summer.'

"Mr. Herald sends good accounts of himself from the Zambesi, where he has been preserved from the dangers of that deadly climate for nearly a year. After repeated attacks of fever he has been raised up to witness for Christ amid the few Europeans and many natives around him. He pleads for help in spreading the Gospel in that dark and densely-populated region. Another member of the S.E. Africa Mission, Mr. Cox, is going, or is already gone, to the Zambesi, also a self-supporting missionary."

Communications to Mr. and Mrs. Howe may be addressed:—"Mayfield," Lancaster-road, Wimbledon, London, S.W.

IN AN OPIUM DEN.

A lady sends the following extract from a letter just received from Mr. W. Raju Naidu, of Madras, dated June 21st, in which he describes a recent visit to an opium den:—

"Yesterday evening I went to an opium den situated very near my house. In that hell, for it is nothing short of a hell, I saw men, poor men, lying down on dirty mats and smoking the poison, without any hope for life either in this world or in the world to come. These opium-smokers themselves tell me that they are sure of going to hell, as they are wicked men in the sight of the holy God. But they deplore, as they ought to, that the vice is forced upon them. The opium-smokers in my city look like so many idiots. I am glad to tell them that Christian people in England are interested in them, and are trying to close the dens all over India. They smile when I tell them this. They feel that this should be done soon. One old smoker told me: 'We are already ruined by the Government, which gives us opium; but we would be very sorry if our children are also ruined.' Such is the light in which the unfortunate victims to opium view the vile trade."

Surely (our correspondent comments) these burning words must stir the heart of every Christian reader to a sense of shame for the injustice which is being done to our fellow-subjects in India and our fellow-creatures in China. Constant and earnest prayer ought to be sent up to God that He may cause our rulers to discontinue this cruel means of obtaining revenue.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, JULY 30.—JOB XXXI.

Job had specially guarded against impurity, for its heritage is one of calamity and disaster. He is sure that even if he were weighed by God Himself there would be no iniquity discovered in him, He even goes so far as to invoke the most awful results if he had sinned against the seventh commandment. It is well for us if we are able with similar sincerity to appeal to the verdict of God, and of our own heart. Let us ask the Holy Spirit to beget in us the purity and separateness from sin which characterises our Lord, that we may walk with unsullied garments.

Job also protests the even-handedness of his dealings with his servants, alleging the principle which underlies the whole Christian teaching on the point, that we all have been made by the same Creator, as we have been redeemed by the same precious blood. He also insists on his benevolence to the widow and fatherless. He is careful to show that he had not failed in doing all the good that was within his reach. Alas, how few of us can say as much. How many occasions are drifted to our feet every day, which we heedlessly let pass.

Job had not boasted in his wealth, or worshipped the sun and moon, or rejoiced in the calamity of others, or failed in hospitality, or concealed known evil; in none of these things was he conscious of wrong. Instead of examining ourselves in a general way, it is wholesome to divide our life into compartments, and cross-question ourselves on each.

With this appeal he goes into the presence of God, and asks for a reply. In the strong Gospel light we are too convicted of sin to dare to do this, and must rely upon the merits of Christ. In these alone can we approach the uncreated light.

MONDAY, JULY 31.—JOB XXXII.

Elihu had probably been attracted by the controversy and had preserved a modest reticence during the debate. He claims to speak, not with the experience of age, but with the quick inspiration of the Almighty. Wisdom is often hidden from the wise and prudent and revealed to babes. Let us seek the child-like heart of Samuel to which God speaks, in night visions, things which are not divulged to Eli.

The young and eager as they wait, find it no easy thing to preserve silence; but if we are patient, our opportunity assuredly will come. Always in life those who are too hasty in speech commit themselves to statements which they repent of, while those who can wait for the conclusion of an argument often carry the laurels of the fray.

It is not the act of true friendship to use flattering words, a true friend does not look for them, but prizes sincere and honest speech. We should be very careful to avoid leading our friends to expect a fulsome and exaggerated effusiveness. Let them understand that true love needs not wrap its counsel in unreal and sugared words. On the other hand let us never forget that we must speak the truth tenderly and in love. The hand of the surgeon must be gentle, but it need not be gloved or bejewelled.

TUESDAY, AUG. 1.—JOB XXXIII.

It is not wonderful that Elihu has been mistaken for the Mediator Himself, so helpfully does he interpose between Job and his Maker. He expatiates especially on his likeness to Job in his manhood, and quotes this as the reason why He could specially help him, "I also am formed out of clay." There was, therefore, nothing in his presence that would terrify or aggrieve the much-suffering patriarch. Thus our High Priest is Man. He takes up Job's words which he had heard, protesting his innocence, and he insists that he was not right in those protestations, or in the conclusions that he drew from them, as though God was counting him arbitrarily as his foe.

Then follows one of the grandest passages in the book. He tells how God speaks in nature and conscience, and is often disregarded; and how then he speaks by revelation, opening the ears of men to withdraw them from their purpose. He shows that God often lays a man upon a bed of pain in the emaciation of disease that he may speak to his heart. Happy is he if an interpreter stands beside him to point the path to repentance. Then broken and penitent he turns back to God, and sees his face with joy, and sings before men the story of his restoration. Thus Elihu argues that affliction is often sent as discipline to read to man God's deepest truth.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 2.—JOB XXXIV.

In his second speech Elihu appeals to the friends as having tasted words by the ear as meat is tasted by the mouth. He calls on them to choose the right, amid the many perversions which had been suggested. Again taking up one of Job's remarks that there was no profit for a man to delight himself in God (9), Elihu says that this statement infers that God could commit iniquity. It would be surely unjust if a holy life met with no Divine recognition, and if the righteous suffered as the wicked. Godliness must be profitable in this world and the next.

The absolute justice of God is necessarily based on his absolute sovereignty. There is no need for Him to do unjustly, since He respects not princes, nor regards the rich more than the poor. He puts down one, and lifts up another. He is under no obligation to give an account of Himself to any. There is, therefore, no inferior motive to clash with the movement of his absolute integrity. There is no friction to account for the slackening of the pace of his justice. Take shelter in the thought that the Father is absolute Sovereign, and the Sovereign absolute Father. If He gives quietness, rest in it, none can trouble thee. If He hides his face, be patient till the sunshine again. But in sun or shadow trust absolutely in God's Righteousness and Love.

THURSDAY, AUG. 3.—JOB XXXV.

Elihu continues to answer Job's conclusions. He quotes Job as asking, what advantage his righteousness had been to him? And he replies by saying that Job's words implied injustice on the part of God, as though He were slow to acknowledge and welcome consistency and integrity of life. Then he proceeds to show that there is no inducement to God to make Him diverge from even-handed justice. In the previous chapter he argued that God was too far above the ordinary inducements that man can offer to bribe the judge, and here he follows the same line of argument, only pressing home his premises on Job himself. If we sin, Elihu says, God is not injured; if we are good, He is not enriched. This argument has not the same force with us, because we feel that to God's heart at least the sins or holiness of his children do make a profound difference, though his love and pity never make Him swerve from his inflexible justice.

It is sweet to look to God as our Maker. He knows our frame, and what is in us. On Him must rest the responsibility of redeeming what He has made, and his grace is adequate. He gives songs in the night. He teaches us. We are much more to Him than fowls or beasts. Sometimes, as Job found it, God seems slows to answer us, but we must see to it that we are not impeding his answer by any arrogance or wilfulness of ours.

FRIDAY, AUG. 4.—JOB XXXVI.

To confirm the argument of the foregoing chapters Elihu now proceeds to speak on God's behalf, and to assert his greatness. He prides himself as being perfect in knowledge (4) and he takes a wide range of subjects.

First, the universality of his Providence (5-14). He despises none. His eyes are specially upon the righteous, and in his good time exalts them to sit with kings. If they have yielded to transgressions, He opens their ear to instruction, commands them to repent, and gives them years of prosperity.

Second, the severity and certainty of his judgments (15-21). When men rise in rebellion against God, their suffering is inevitable. No ransom, however great, no wealth however profusely scattered, no forces however strong, can then avail to avert the blow.

Third, the unsuitableness of God (22-26) who teaches as He does! We can never know Him or search out the number of his years.

Fourth, the wonders of the formation of rain (27-33). God draws up by evaporation the drops of water, which descend in rain. The clouds are his tent, the thunder is his voice, the lightning the weapon that He wields against his foes. The cattle, as they low and seek for shelter, announce the coming of the storm. These latter words were probably suggested by the gathering of the tempest from which God was about to speak.

SATURDAY, AUG. 5.—JOB XXXVII.

As Elihu spoke a thunderstorm was gathering, and much of the imagery of this chapter is suggested by that fact. The little group listened to the sound of God's voice in the thunder. Peal followed peal without cessation (4). The lightly-falling snow, and the drenching showers are alike his work, when they restrain men from their labour in the fields, and drive the beasts to their dens (8).

From the storm, Elihu turns naturally to the winter, with its ice and snow, and the frost that binds up the flow of the streams (10). But the clouds do his behest, and perform his bidding in the earth.

How little we know of atmospheric phenomena! Why the north and south wind blows, and what is the real nature of the azure spread out as a molten looking glass, and what the gold of the northen lights is. We cannot find the Almighty out. He is great and glorious. He cannot be unjust. But let us be more eager to look for the bright light in the clouds. It is always there. But we too often consider the clouds and not the light—a rainbow for every storm: an arbour for every difficult hill; a sure hiding-place in every storm. Such is Jesus to all who love and trust Him.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

AUGUST 6.

PAUL AT MILETUS, Acts xx. 22-35.

GOLDEN TEXT, Heb. xiii. 7.

PAUL remained at Ephesus about three years (xx. 31). Miletus, the capital of Ionia, once a celebrated city, was on the mouth of the river Meander, and was about thirty miles from Ephesus. Paul called the Ephesian elders to meet him here (17), to avoid the delay which would have been caused if he had called at Ephesus.

HIS JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM (22-25).—The Holy Ghost had revealed to him enough of the future to call forth his courage and resolution, yet concealed enough to keep him quietly dependent upon God's leading. So far from shrinking he was impelled urgently to go forward. This is what "bound in the spirit" means. (See xviii. 21; xix. 21.) Was it not by this inward impulsion that God was directing the apostle's way? To refuse to yield to this impulsion because of the trials awaiting him would be cowardice and distrust; to go into bonds and afflictions without such a sense of necessity would be guilty recklessness. His courage in facing danger was not the result of a passing impulse, but of a settled principle (24). Not that Paul would throw away his life needlessly, but he did not believe that his chief business here was to lengthen out his existence by avoiding the path of duty when danger was connected with it. Compare Luther's reply to those who would have turned him from his purpose to attend the Diet at Worms.

HIS RETROSPECT (26, 27).—It was only after unswerving fidelity in service that Paul could declare himself "pure from the blood of all men." We are reminded (1) That some may be lost under the most faithful preaching. Even when Paul was the witness there were some who did not receive Christ. We ought to be grieved, but should not be surprised, if all to whom we speak are not saved. (2) That it should be our chief business to be "pure from the blood" of the unsaved. What can be more terrible than to go into the presence of God guilty of the death of some souls! The business of the watchman is not to save the city, but to give the faithful warning, so that the guilt of the city's doom may not lie upon him. That is our duty concerning those we teach. (3) That in order to be free from the blood of men we need to "declare all the counsel of God." To substitute an interesting story for God's own word, to keep back such parts of it as may not be popular, to tell only that which will attach our hearers to us, to withhold some of the more solemn warnings and denunciations of the Gospel, or to unsay with our careless lives what we have taught with our lips, is to incur this awful guilt.

HIS FAREWELL COUNSELS (28-35).—The attachment between Paul and these elders was so close that parting was painful to them both (see 36-38). This warmth of affection gave to his counsels the greater weight. The two-fold direction in which he counselled should be noticed. "To yourselves" first, for the value of the work depends upon the character of the workman. Then "to the flock." Not to a part of it, but to "all." It is easy to be interested in some; but all are equally dear to God. A faithful servant will care for all the Master's concerns committed to him. These counsels are urged by various considerations:—(1) God made them overseers. The Holy Ghost still works in the Church distributing to each one his proper gift, and appointing him his proper service. It is a great motive to fidelity to know that we are where we are not as the result of chance, but by the appointment of God. (2) They minister to those who are dear to God. The price He paid for the Church proves this (28). We must not be careless of that which He values so highly. (3) There will be need for all the care they can exercise. Dangers from without (29) and from within (30) awaited the Church. The vigilance of their great adversary rendered such experiences certain. Events proved the truthfulness of Paul's prediction. (4) The grace of God could keep them faithful (32). Its provision for the present, and the inheritance it promises to us for the future are enough to keep us confident and faithful. Dwell much upon what God is able through grace to do in and through you. (5) The example the apostle had set them (31, 33-35). He had done his work among them in the midst of difficulty and danger as great as any that awaited them.

The closing words of the lesson contain one of the sayings of Jesus, recorded nowhere else, and yet well known among the early Christians. How it contradicts the maxims of the world! The whole of our Christian life is an education in the direction of unselfish giving. This is the blessedness which God knows, which Christ on earth experienced, and which we are invited to share with Him.

Letters to the Editor.

THE MILDMAY INSTITUTIONS.

Dear Sir,—Will you allow me to correct an erroneous impression which has found its way into the Press?

The "Mildmay Deaconess' Missions" do not benefit at all in the distribution of Mr. T. M. Russell's estate; the "Mildmay Mission to the Jews" will receive about £25,000 (not £40,000), and the supposition that the general missions of Mildmay will participate in this fund is calculated to stop contributions to the Deaconess' work and other operations, which at present greatly need support. We are in warm sympathy with the Jewish Mission, but its funds are quite distinct from ours, and its management is under Mr. Wilkinson's wise guidance.

J. F. Morton, Colonel,
Supt. Mildmay Institutions.

[We give this letter lest unfortunately a wrong impression should prevail, but no such mistake as that corrected was made in our columns.—Ed.]

CHRISTIAN PROGRESS IN INDIA.

Sir,—Many missionaries in India are continually troubled in mind as to how to develope the independence of the Indian (Native) Christian Church, and yet not spiritually to starve it. In certain parts of India large numbers have been gathered into Christ's fold, and the organisation of pastors, schools, etc., seems complete, but at whose expense? Do we find that the churches are growing in independence, and that they are, as a rule, sending out numbers of ambassadors for Christ to all parts of India?

If the work spread all over India, as it has done in a few favoured places, no societies could afford to spend all over India at the rate they spend in these favoured places. Are we then at work on the right lines, or rather do we not need guidance to start additional lines to supplement and draw out the zeal of the churches already formed? Can none of our friends aid us with their suggestions? They can all aid us with their special prayers.

RATIONALISM AND ROMANISM.

Dear Sir,—I observe in The Christian of July 13, p. 7, an editorial reference to the opinion that the conflict looming in the future is one, not of Evangelical religion with "science or human criticism," but one between Evangelical religion (such as our fathers held) and the insidious, widespread, and infidel-producing spirit of ritualism or nascent Popery.

Having had an ever-deepening conviction, arising from the close observation and experience of thirty to forty years in our Nonconformist, and principally Congregational, bodies, I am more and more convinced that (1) the development and progress of rationalism are the chief factors in (2) the development and progress of ritualism or semi Romanism, and that (3) the root of that rationalism lies in the departure (disguised or avowed) from the foundation principle of the sufficiency and supreme authority of Holy Scripture as the infallible standard and guide in truth and practice.

It is easy for anyone who will look into the working of principles, to see how our Nonconformity, especially Congregationalism, instead of being, as it was, a glorious bulwark against incipient Popery, has rather become, in so far as above developed, its ally and feeder, no less than of (or along with) infidelity. And it has been pressed upon my mind respectfully to suggest that in your position you might (D.V.) be directed to do a noble service in awakening the Congregational and other Nonconformist bodies to the above fact at this time.—Yours faithfully,

Thos Green, M.A.,
Ex-Chairman Congregational Union.

PAPAL ARROGANCE.

Sir,—History repeats itself. At an eventful period in the history in this country, an important manifesto was issued to the nation, the very language of which bespoke its uncertain sound. "We, the people of England," were the solemn and high-sounding notes in which the appeal to the national conscience commenced. It is true the nation did not respond as it should have done to the lofty tones in which the "three tailors of Tooley-street" thus addressed it—owing to its stupidity and indifference to the blessings which the tailors had in store for it.

We fear that the apathy and want of perception of the people will again be manifested on the occasion of the dedication of England to St. Peter by the clerical gentlemen on whom the mantle of the "three tailors" has so evidently fallen. They have precisely the same right to hand over England to St. Peter which their predecessors of Tooley-street had to speak for "the people of England"; and it may not be a rash conjecture to say that the nation will prove as insensible to the value of the blessings thus thrust upon it, as it did in the case of the historical appeal issued from Tooley-street. It would no doubt be a great boon to restore the filthy confessional in our midst, the tender mercies of the Inquisition, and the fires of Smithfield, and to have the country covered with monasteries, and multitudes of idle monks and nuns devouring the land like noisome swarms of locusts; but it is not an unlikely event that the people may prove obstinately and stupidly indifferent to the value of these blessings, so kindly offered them by the lineal descendants of the "three tailors of Tooley-street."

The truth is, the whole performance is a farce, but it is a most audacious act, and should put Englishmen on their guard, and act as a warning to them of what are the real intentions and aims of the Papacy in this country.—Your obedient servant,

Watchman.

ABERDEEN FISH-GIRLS.

Dear Sir,—I see in the Christian for July 13 a quotation from Miss March-Phillips, making grave charges against the fish-curers of Aberdeen.

I have no time to enter into any refutation of the statements made, but send you a few lines to say that the whole is a complete misrepresentation.

I have been, as you know, all my life connected with mission work, and ought to know something about working girls. They have higher wages than is given in any factory in town. Twelve shillings is only their minimum. They work in covered sheds, doing only what is done daily in every kitchen on the small scale. The sheds must be freely exposed to air for the girls' own sakes.

They work overtime only when a large take comes in. They are comparatively idle on other days, but receive the same wages. They do not work thirty-six hours on a stretch. Besides being a physical impossibility to the girls, fish would not keep so long, and must be gutted within a few hours. They wear overalls and thick boots to protect them from damp. I might say more, but I merely wish to correct the false impression likely to be produced by the articles referred to.—Yours very truly, Aberdonian.

THE Y.M.C.A.

One of the members of the Sydney Y.M.C.A. is now labouring for the Lord at Poona.

New Associations have been formed at Radcliffe (Lancashire) and Woodchurch (Kent), and a resuscitation has taken place of the work at Rochdale.

The Lydd Y.M.C.A., which is doing a good evangelistic work, is much hampered financially, and appeals for the help of friends to prevent the closing of its doors.

The work of the Association at Sydney has been happily revived and strengthened. The recent serious crisis affected it greatly, but the effects seem to passing off.

The Fakenham Y.M.C.A., which has just moved into new rooms, is doing an excellent work. Sir Lawrence Jones, Bart., of Cranmer Hall, has accepted the office of president.

Mr. Hind Smith has been deputed by the National Council to visit Bradford, with a view to the reorganisation of the work there, and to the placing of the Association in a position of greater usefulness to that large and populous centre.

Two parties of young men from the Hackney Y.M.C.A. have lately visited St. Paul's Cathedral upon the invitation of Archdeacon Sinclair, and both, after inspecting the historic precincts, under the guidance of the Archdeacon, and attending afternoon service, were entertained by him to tea in the chapterhouse.

At the Anglo-American Y.M.C.A., 160, Rue Montmartre, Paris, on Sunday last, Rev. W. J. Woods gave quite an ideal young men's address, which riveted the attention of all. After the usual tea another informal talk was given by Mr. A. J. Shepheard, and was much appreciated. The secretary would be glad to hear of the intended visit of Christian workers who might be willing to give an address on Sunday afternoons.

Returns from the Y.M.C.A.'s of the Metropolis were laid before the Metropolitan Council on Tuesday last, giving a present total of 11,684 members as against 10,770 for last year, and showing a net gain for the year of 914. The average weekly attendance at the meetings has been 12,546. Increases are reported for the educational and physical departments, and also in the aggressive and missionary efforts carried on outside the association.

The Rambling Club, connected with the Trowbridge branch of the Y.M.C.A., have made several interesting and enjoyable excursions this season. Visits have been paid to Chalfield and Wraxall Manor Houses, and Lacock Abbey, the latter of which was founded in the thirteenth century, and is now one of the most perfect and picturesque remains of a monastic institution in the country. Various gentlemen have acted as leaders, and explained the history and various points of interest associated with the main object of each excursion. This has been found to be a useful addition to the work of the Y.M.C.A.; it has brought the members together more frequently, provided them with healthy exercise and extended their knowledge of the history of the locality in which they live.

THE Y.W.C.A.

Somerset House, Reigate, has been opened as a holiday home by the Y.W.C.A.

The affairs of the Sydney Y.W.C.A. have been very seriously disorganised by the commercial depression, and the committee intimate the necessity of giving up the Association rooms.

The Sevenoaks Y.W.C.A. Home of Rest has accommodated 209 visitors during the year, and 863 since its establishment. At the annual meeting the Hon. Emily Kinnaird gave an address.

The good work carried on by the Y.W.C.A. in East Dulwich is greatly in need of funds. This branch has a home for Christian workers and young women of all classes. Bible meetings for women and children are held three times weekly, besides a pleasant reading-room open daily for members and others. The secretary is Miss Ethel Langham, 4, Primrose-villas, Overhill-road, East Dulwich, S.E.

IRISH NOTES.

A donation of £10,000 has been given by Mr. Jas. Bruce, of Belfast, to the Hospital for Incurables at Lisburn.

The Baptist church at Tubbermore, co. Derry, so long occupied by the late celebrated Dr. Carson, has been rebuilt to seat 400 persons, and has been opened by Rev. Hugh D. Brown, of Dublin.

A series of Gospel meetings, held in the Methodist Mission tent at Ballinamallard during the past few weeks by Rev. Jas. Kirkwood, has been a great blessing in the neighbourhood, and many have professed decision for Christ.

The Centenary Methodist Church, Dublin, which is about to celebrate its jubilee, has under consideration the establishment of a home in the city where Christian young men coming from the country could reside and be a mutual help to one another.

Owing to Sir Wm. M'Arthur's bequest, eight entrance scholarships, value £10, and tenable for two years each, have been established in the Methodist College, Belfast; also four of £20, tenable for two years. These are open to boys and girls in the proportion of half to each.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

It is proposed to build a new Free Church in Falkirk.

The Free Church at Portmoak has resolved to call Rev. C. Mason, of Govan.

The Dundee Mission to the Blind is doing valuable medical mission service among the poor of the city.

Mrs. Baeyertz has been labouring at Cowcaddens Glasgow, and her addresses have awakened great, interest.

Dr. Baxter, of Blairgowrie, has had Rev. M. Reid, of McCheyne Memorial, Dundee, appointed as his assistant.

During the Glasgow Fair interesting meetings were held for the showmen and their wives and children by Mr. Joseph Wright, Miss Millington, and others.

The Moderator of the Free Church Assembly will preach this year the sermon before the assembly of the Congregational Union, which meets in London in October. Dr. Walter C. Smith thus returns the courtesy shown by the visit of the delegates of the Union to the Jubilee Assembly.

The Free Church of Scotland's Livingstonia Mission has just sent out two additional ordained men from Glasgow, Messrs. Dewar and Macalpine, who are to be followed immediately by more artisans. It is understood that not only men but women are in training to go out to Nyassaland next season to found a new training institution on the comparatively healthy uplands of Bandawé.

BRAY.—At this charming watering-place, near Dublin, open-air testimony has been borne for several Saturdays by a small band of workers from the city. Considerable interest has been manifested, and genuine work done.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Mr. JOHN KNOX BOKWE, of the Lovedale Mission, South Africa.

In order to give our readers an adequate report of the Keswick Convention, we have been obliged to hold over a large number of communications.

We are sorry that the P.S.A. movement, which was intended by its originator to be a spiritual and God-honouring institution, should in some cases be dragged through the mire. We have a letter informing us of an announcement of P.S.A. services for the people where two ministers were to give addresses, interspersed with solos, hymns, etc., and in bold large letters was the following:—"A pipe full of tobacco will be given to every man who attends." This needs no comment.

It is said nowadays that it is a mistake to speak of the salvation of souls; we should aim at the salvation of men. But the Holy Spirit speaks of the salvation of souls (1 Pet. i. 9). We cannot seek the salvation of the soul without seeking the well-being of the entire man for time and for eternity. But it is quite possible to seek the temporal welfare of men in this life without thinking of their souls or of eternal life.

The Bible speaks of men as "souls"; the manufacturer speaks of them as "hands."

Love is power. God is love. The Holy Spirit is the essence of God. The Spirit, therefore, must be the Spirit of love. Power is the outcome of love. The outcome can never exceed the source. The evangelist, in Christendom or in heathendom, will only be powerful in proportion as the love of God brings forth in him love to God, love to his brethren, love to the souls of men.

The Apostle Paul places love in three very suggestive lights before us when he says that it is the soil in which we have to be rooted and grounded, the bond by which we are to be held together, the energy by which the body of Christ is to be built up and increased. "Rooted and grounded in love"—the only element that can attract the soul, and into which it will throw all its powers. "Love, which is the bond of perfectness"—the only influence that can hold together men of divers races and natures: the only bond long enough to go round the whole world, elastic enough to admit of differences, and strong enough to resist sin. "Edifying itself in love"—"love buildeth up." Love is the health of the soul; each love-filled soul helps to make the body healthy and to grow.

In his commentary on Philippians, Dr. Rainy has some suggestive observations on the difference in the impression made by the Church on different minds. He says that Paul is in "nothing more enviable than in this victoriousness of faith over the earthly show of things, and over the unlikelihoods which, in this refractory world, always mar and misrepresent the good work. We, for our part, find our faith continually abashed by those same unlikelihoods. . . . The mere commonplaceness of Christians, and of visible Christianity, and of ourselves, is allowed to baffle us. . . The great fire burning in the world ever since Pentecost is for us scarcely recognisable. But if the quick faith and love of Paul the prisoner were ours, we should be sensitive to echoes and pulsations, and movements everywhere, we should be aware that the voice and the power of Christ are everywhere stirring in his churches." There can be no doubt that with purer hearts we should see more of the work of God everywhere; with more faith we should be more assured of its triumph.

Dr. Stalker has been "At Home" to receive a visit from a representative of the Sunday Magazine, to whom he has said several interesting and important things. The majority of Free Church ministers, and 92 per cent. of the students are abstainers. The young ministers almost to a man support the temperance cause, and are in favour of imperial and municipal authorities using their legislative and administrative powers to clear away the temptations of the people. It appears that "probationers working as missionaries in the large towns always become enthusiastic on this question, because they find that no progress can be made with the poorer classes until you get them to abstain from drink." This is the testimony of all who go down into our dark places; they also all agree in insisting upon the necessity of attending to social work, of doing it on Christian principles and in a Christian spirit.

Dr. Stalker thinks that the great drift in theology at present is towards the mastery of the Bible as literature. "Much of the continental criticism is inspired by the opposite of the spirit of faith," and he does not think that our native scholars assume a sufficiently defensive attitude towards it, although they are generally strong believers in the supernatural and are devout in spirit. He believes that God has a great message to deliver to our age through criticism. He gives no hint of what he thinks may be the nature of the message, and one wonders whether, as the attacks of Strauss and Renan were the means of directing men's minds more intently to Christ, so the literary sifting may be the means of revealing the simple historic accuracy of Scripture. We may, in any case, go on with our work, and wait quietly for the self-vindication of the Word of God.

The Review of the Churches relates a story of Dr. Gladden, of Columbus, Ohio, who is a powerful preacher and writer on Christian economics, which is worth the notice both of ministers and business men. A manufacturer having heard Dr. Gladden expound his views, and being impressed with their shrewdness and soundness, sent him a complete statement of his business, turnover, wage-bill, profits, etc., for the year, and asked to be told what he ought to do. Dr. Gladden wisely disavowed any priestly desire to dictate details to another man's conscience, but indicated in a general way how the business might be Christianised. The suggestions were acted upon, and with the happiest results, for when a commercial struggle shortly afterwards arose the manufacturer's work-people stood by him. Now, from this we see that ministers may preach a very practical Gospel, and that business-men may learn from them. A little more courage on one side, combined with knowledge and sympathy, and, on the other hand, a little willingness to learn how to conduct one's own business in accordance with the Gospel, would be of great service both to the Church and the world. The above, however, can scarcely be taken as a rule to be generally followed. Not all ministers would be able to give sound advice to a business man.

Christ's witnesses must be more than preachers: they must be living illustrations of what they preach. They must live among the people long enough to win their confidence. They must commend themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. Until they believe in the man they will not believe his message so as to trust themselves to it. This may explain the long years during which the Moravian missionaries in Greenland waited for the reaping; and the almost imperceptible advance yet made among Mohammedans in North Africa. "But though the vision tarry, wait for it: for it will surely come; it will not tarry." The above consideration also leads to the conclusion that it would not be an adequate testimony to send missionaries through the heathen world, so that in every city, town, or village, or even to every individual, the message might be once at least declared. The message must so be understood as to be intelligently accepted or rejected.

Dr. Josiah Strong mentions a leading business man of one of the large cities in the United States, who remarked that he had not been inside a church for seventeen years, and that during that time no Christian had addressed him personally on the subject of religion, although thousands of them had met him in his store and in social life. But, we may ask, had none of the thousands addressed him indirectly, with an obvious intention of doing him good, and at the same time avoiding giving him offence? Some may require personal dealing which amounts almost to bluntness, but others need the gentlest of handling; and happy is the servant who has the tact for both. A business man informed us in Cheapside awhile ago, that his chief work was to speak for his Lord in business houses; he felt he was called to it.

How essential it is for the soul to abide in Christ as opposed to fitful and emotional contact with Him! The renowned John

Owen defines abiding in Christ to be an experience in which the soul is "always nigh unto Christ, in the spiritual company of Christ, and in communication with Christ"; and he makes an important point when he adds, "there is in it something of an especial, spiritual activity of the soul." It is well to remember, the religion of Christ is as truly practical as it is experimental. Its principal graces are vital and energetic, calling for action as well as for possession and enjoyment. Faith, if it is real, acts and exercises itself; hope aspires, and animates with zest for holiness and heaven; while love burns and glows with holy ardour and self-denying zeal. Abiding in Christ is no sleeping partnership, but a vigorous and responsive affection pervading all the life.

Dr. Rudolf Buddensieg, of Dresden, has sent a "communication" to the Critical Review "on the History and the Work of the Wyclif Society," which is full of present-day interest. While glad because a distinguished English Reformer has some justice done to him, we are still more glad because of the history which is contained in his own works of the origin and progress of Reformation doctrine and practice 500 years ago. The struggles and development of Wyclif's own mind may be traced in some of the Latin works now edited with the utmost diligence and care. How widespread was his influence on the thought of Europe by means of his great work "On the Church," is also shown by one of his editors, how it became the centre of a special kind of literature, "including not only the writings of Huss, but many other literary productions of the Bohemians of the fifteenth century. His opinion ruled theological thought for nearly two centuries, on to the time when Luther arose."

The contentions of Wyclif's great work are: No mere man can be head of the Church; no Pope, therefore, should affirm that he is the head of it. It is no article of faith that one must obey the Pope in order to be saved; for there were holy men in days before the Romish Papacy was known. In the days of the apostles and martyrs, and even at the present (Wyclif's) time, there have been, and are, individuals, as well as whole nations, who never heard of the existence of a Pope. He is the head only of a particular church, and this only so far as he lives in accordance with the laws of Jesus Christ. If a Pope gives his rules, bulls, and decrees to the church, the Christian is entitled to inquire whether those orders, emanating from "the high authority of a Pope," are in harmony with the Word of God. And this is one reason why every Christian ought to be acquainted with the Holy Scriptures. In the "Dialogus" he affirms that the temporal possessions of the Pope make him an "obstinate heretic"; "his name is unknown to the Holy Scriptures," and "it might be good for the Church to be without a Pope."

In Wyclif's famous sermons, which he put into the hands of his simple preachers, that they might proclaim them in the market, in the street, in the field, he declares that the preaching of the Word of God is the first duty of the pastor, and is in itself much more important than the administration of the Sacraments, for Christ Himself speaks through the preacher, and provides by him spiritual children for the kingdom of God and for the heirship of heaven. Here he advances to the position of absolutely and unconditionally calling the Pope antichrist. He declares that Church property belongs to the poor of the country, that big churches and cathedrals are not suited to lead the hearts of men to God; they spoil them of their piety; God despises such buildings. His total emancipation from sacerdotalism and from the fear of the Pope is evidenced in his affirmation that the Church would not perish, even if the sacraments and sacramental usages were taken away. To the Christian, Christ the Saviour is pope, bishop, and priest, and He has the power to bestow the grace of salvation without these symbols.

If Wyclif found the Word of God enough for all purposes in his conflict with the dominant Church of his time, so shall we in our conflict with masked Romanism in the Church of England and with open Romanism elsewhere. But on that alone we must depend; and further, if it is to be mighty in our hands, it must not be emasculated by the notions of men.

The children are at home again from school, some returning full of honours, some disappointed and depressed, some morally wrecked. Only too late is attention being called to "Our Public Schools: their Methods and Morals." For if the anonymous author of an article on this vital question in The New Review (who deserves to be warmly thanked), be correct in his estimate of public-school life, the sooner both parents and masters bestir themselves the better. Parents must teach their children to be pure, as they teach them other moral duties.

Englishmen will have read with shame and astonishment all the world over of the violent scenes in the House of Commons when the Home Rule Bill passed through Committee. We thought these things belonged to other countries. The heated and violent language of debate has borne its inevitable fruit. Let our law-makers cease at once and for ever from being law-breakers.

It is apparent that progress is being made on Lake Nyassa in the suppression of the slave trade, through the vigorous efforts of the representative of the German Government. The latest news published by Rev. Horace Waller is of a most assuring nature. Major von Wissmann, on board his well-equipped gunboat, is directing his attention to the inland traders, who are doing their best to meet a brisk demand for slaves at the coast. He is now in possession of the Arab dhow, formerly employed to carry slaves at Deep Bay, crossing from the west to the eastern side. In an inland expedition he attacked a caravan of slaves, and liberated a large number of men, women and children, taking the Swahili prisoners. Britain is to share in this much-needed work; a gunboat is on its way to co-operate with the German force. But one step more is needed. If but our Government would order that the legal status of slavery shall be ignored in the Law Courts of our protectorates of Zanzibar and Nyassaland, the roots of this inhuman traffic in these regions would be destroyed.

"FOLLOW ME."—To follow Christ is to go where He leads, without questioning or demurring. It may be to a life of trial, suffering, or sacrifice—but no matter; we have nothing whatever to do with the kind of life to which our Lord calls us. Our only simple duty is to obey and follow. We know that Jesus will lead us only in right paths, and that the way he takes slopes upward and ends at the feet of God.—Dr. J. R. Miller.

"Borderland."

We may safely predict that Mr. Stead's new venture is safe to succeed. At the close of the present century, so rich in scientific discoveries, there is a widespread conviction that the veil which has hitherto separated the Seen from the Unseen has been rent in twain from the bottom to the top. Not so long ago, a hard materialism, believing in nothing outside the range of physical tests, was dominant in science and popular thought; at the present time, a belief in occult phenomena, having their origin in the action of some supernatural or hypernatural intelligence, is decidedly growing in favour.

Thinking that modern enlightenment had dispelled for ever the darkness of superstition, Mr. Lecky, in his "History of Rationalism," pronounced the delusions of witchcraft dead and buried beyond the hope of recovery and renewal. And yet behold, in this age of superior subtlety and skill all the wildest speculations of the darkest times are eagerly embraced and extolled. Half-a-century ago few would have thought it possible that the principles of Romanism would ever succeed in ousting the Scriptural truths regained at the Reformation; and yet who does not know that the errors then renounced are now welcomed enthusiastically in the very Church boasting itself, not without reason, as the bulwark of Protestantism. So within the memory of living men necromancy with all its allies seemed among the ever-to-be-forgotten fancies of an unscientific era; nevertheless, it is revived in the present day as an all-important subject, demanding, and promising largely to reward, the most serious study. Truly, "the times change and we change with them." Above all others palmistry and astrology were reckoned among the exploded fads of a thoughtless generation; but now they are well to the front again, demanding the most careful examination on account of their alleged right to rank with real and accepted science.

That a quarterly journal should be devoted to the examination of these claims need occasion no surprise. It is sure to be widely received and read. But we may well ask, what is the reason and significance of its appearance? Instead of our having reached the sobriety of mature age, is it not rather the sign of senile decay? The superstitions of the Dark Ages are again upon us in full force, and we are asked to examine them anew in the white light of modern science. Speaking generally, we need not fear the result. Yet we must take serious objection to all attempts to establish forbidden communication with spirits outside the ordinary sphere. Already we have too good evidence of the danger incident to any such action. Believing as we do that communications from any such source are certain to come from beneath rather than from above, we are reasonably suspicious of their influence. The marked tendency of spirit intercourse during the past half-century has been to discredit belief in the Bible and in the redemption wrought by the Son of God. At the outset the so-called spirits were profuse in their acknowledgment of our Holy Redeemer. Of late they have become either reticent or resolute in their denial of his authority. Our Lord refused to accept their testimony; and when a spirit of Python proclaimed Paul a servant of the Most High God, showing unto men the way of salvation, he silenced it by expulsion. Our wisdom is to abide by the revelation God has given, and resolutely to refuse all information which pretends to come from any other quarter.

Keswick—and After.

Not only does Keswick Convention grow, but others on the same lines multiply. There were said to be a thousand more visitors at the Tent this year than last, and the same increase characterises all the other gatherings; and still year by year new centres are formed, and they also grow in numbers and in influence.

What does it mean? It means that many are converted; that many half-converted,* like those in Acts xix., receive the Holy Ghost; that backsliders are restored; and that lives of comparative barrenness are made to bear rich and abundant fruit. Night by night many have definitely presented and yielded up (Rom. vi. xii.) spirit and soul and body to their Lord; and as they have counted Him faithful that promised, it has been unto them according to their faith. Many who came reluctantly have returned home with shining faces, and some who came with exalted views of themselves have gone down into the valley of humiliation, the valley of the shadow of death, and found that to be the valley of blessing.

As a whole, the addresses have been remarkable—old corn of the land, grain winnowed with the shovel and the fan; evidently the result of deep searching of the Word, producing deep searchings of heart, and consequently very closely and intimately searching the hearts of the hearers. They obviously suggested altogether new and deeper thoughts of God and man, of Scripture and criticism, to preachers and teachers, and their effects will be manifest from many pulpits and in many pews during the coming year. On the other hand, not quite all were of this quality. Some men, having their hearts right, are excellent in exhortation, but they flounder in exposition, and (to use the word of a hearer) they muddle those who have begun to see things clearly. But we heard nothing of this kind from the main platform.

The act of surrender was emphasised; so also was the continuance in well-doing. The latter is not less important than the former. It is no small blessing to be taken for a solid week out of the ordinary routine of life, and to be, to a large extent, mentally and spiritually shut up to thoughts connected with "the rise, race, and royalty of the Kingdom of God in the soul of man." To have seven days' holiday from the newspaper and the absorbing things of earth, is a means of grace. The blessing obtained during these quiet days may be retained by keeping the wine of the Kingdom undiluted by the waters of this world; or it may be lost by those whose wine is mixed with water (Isa. i. 22). It must not be forgotten, however, that the newspaper, if kept in subjection, may be used for God, as Paul used the words of their own poet to enforce the claims of God upon the Athenians.

One feature of grave significance, with immense possibilities for good, must not be overlooked; but should be considered and appreciated in all its bearings. Over the entrance to the tent and above the platform are emblazoned the glorious words,

"ALL ONE IN CHRIST JESUS."

From the days of the Oxford and Brighton Conventions, whence that of Keswick took its rise, this has been the declared attitude, in conformity with the letter and spirit of the New Covenant; for we are members of his body—members one of another. In the words of the present Chairman, "The foundation of Keswick blessing is man being in the dust, in his right place, and the Lord alone exalted as Head of his Church, the Source and Centre of blessing." This means that at Keswick we are on Scriptural lines; and that the one condition of unity is oneness in Christ Jesus our Lord.

The true ecclesia—the called-out—the Church, the body of Christ, consists of all those, and only of those, who are children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. Present circumstances in a special way make the loyal manifestation of this unity a paramount necessity, not only at Keswick, but at home. Churchmen and Non-churchmen, Conformists and Nonconformists, with great delight, sit down together there, in the banqueting-house of their common Lord, whose fruit is sweet to their taste, and his banner over them is Love. Change of place need not alter the condition of the soul.

At Lucerne a series of conferences is being held, the chief desire and design of which is the reunion of the churches of Christendom. At Grindelwald last year, great sacrifices were offered to be made on either side. These have been repeated at Lucerne. And during the intervening months the purpose has been steadily and uncompromisingly studied and promoted by those interested in it.

The difference between the Reunion Conferences in Switzerland and the Union Conventions at Keswick and elsewhere, is that the former seek the outward reunion of churches; the latter seek the union in heart of the individual members of Christ, to gather together in one (of one heart and of one soul) the children of God which are scattered abroad.

Will every man and woman who have been to Keswick this year, leaders and led, teachers and taught, make as real and generous sacrifices for the exhibition of the Divine union which they seek, as the representatives of different Churches have been prepared to make for the reunion which they desire? In the history of the Church, there never has been a grander opportunity than is now presented to the Keswick platform—sinking all ecclesiasticisms of man, to stand by and for the ecclesia of God.

As the heavens are higher than the earth, so is the heavenly calling higher than all earthly denomination. We may not cease to be Churchmen or Dissenters, but shall we not set the vital union with Christ as high as heaven above the mortal ecclesiastical union? Will each one live this out in his own sphere at all costs, even though it should seem that the more abundantly he loves, the less he is loved?

Latter-day Christianity is blighted by the three R's of Romanism, Ritualism, and Rationalism; the doctrinal foundation-stones of Evangelical truth are the three R's of Ruin, Redemption, and Regeneration. The slaves of the former three are working disunitedly to maintain the vain manner of life by works, received by tradition from their fathers; will the freed men, who rejoice in the liberty wherewith the Son makes free, calling Him Father who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, work unitedly shoulder to shoulder, heart knit with heart, to bear witness to the Redemption by the precious blood of Christ, and Regeneration by the Holy Spirit, of men Ruined by the fall?

Nothing less than this is worthy of or consistent with the confession of faith of which Keswick has become the synonym; only this can preserve it from declining into a "Keswick Sect." Let us all, who give thanks to God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ for the rich blessings of these nineteen years, unite in prayer, that thus the later glory may excel the former.

* We remember fifty years ago a little book called "Half-conversions." We should much like to see what was thought half a century ago on this subject. Perhaps there may be one of our readers who has a copy of the book. We should be thankful for a sight of it.

Inspection? or Suppression?

Cela va sans dire—"That goes without saying." Things which are self-evident need not be proved; they prove themselves. "Rivers to the ocean run; fires ascending seek the sun: both speed them to their source." Solomon's judgment of the two women respecting the dead and the living children has never been questioned. There were neither witnesses nor jury; but the wise king appealed to the law of nature, and the women revealed themselves.

That immorality must exist in convents goes without saying. Where women are kept in durance and men have admission to the house, as in convents, in the nature of things there will be sin. When ascendency over the conscience is obtained and the malign power of the confessional is brought into requisition, the God-ordained relation between the sexes is overturned, and fallen human nature will assert itself. Not only will there be moral corruption, but cases of violence, outrage, and murder.

It goes without saying that if the safety-valve of a steam-engine be fastened down the boiler will explode. It goes without saying that if God's laws are violated the weak must yield to the strong, and virtue succumb to violence.

Therefore, it is not necessary to appoint a Committee of Inquiry to verify or disprove the statements of escaped nuns, who assert the demoralisation of nunneries; the conditions of their existence infallibly prophesy the result, not in every individual but in a large proportion. Given dogs and hares, the dogs will hunt the hares; given priests and nuns and the conventual system, and the priests will hunt the nuns; or human nature is not fallen, and the history of Popery during more than a millennium is a lie.

It is not enough to demand the inspection of convents. It has too long been petitioned for in vain. The system is pagan and satanic, and we should be content with nothing less than the total suppression of religious houses, falsely so-called. Human nature is the same in Great Britain and Ireland as on the Continent, and that fact assures us that, given the same conditions, deception and oppression, outrage and murder, will follow here as well as there.

A SAFE PASSION.—As a guarantee of sterling principle, an antidote to worry, a pledge of wealth, a potent secret to transmute everything, if not into gold into the imperishable, a means of making temporal work a meetness for eternal work, there is nothing comparable to the inspiration of Christ's young life. "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" It is the only example in which the intensity of spiritual passion is absolutely safe. Such intensity, centred on an unworthy object, would be degrading and dangerous. Earnestness, like fire, may be a great good or a great evil. Fire, wisely controlled, will propel your ships and convey your cargoes; it will spin and weave your cotton and wool into useful fabrics; it will minister to health, and comfort, and pleasure; but ungoverned fire, or misdirected fire, will desolate and destroy. So it is when the passion of the soul becomes strange fire; it no longer refines and glorifies, but blights and devours the worshipper. In Christ only, spirit and principle blend to make imperious passion a safe and hallowed movement of human life.—Rev. J. M. Bamford.

The Key-Notes of Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

THE HOLY SPIRIT.

The Holy Spirit is the special promise of the Father, made to those who are one with his Son by a living faith. Wait, said our Lord, for the promise of the Father, which ye heard from Me; and immediately on his exaltation to the right hand of God He received the promise of the Holy Spirit, which He poured forth upon the suppliant Church. That promise is still open to as many as the Lord our God shall call. If, then, thou art among the called, thou mayest claim that most precious gift for thyself, and know by blessed experience "the Holy Spirit of Promise."

Eph. i. 14. He is Real and Earnest.—Upon the yielded soul the blessed Spirit descends, bearing with Him the image and likeness of Jesus, which he imprints and fixes, as a stamp will leave its die upon the softened wax. Only melted gold is minted; only moistened clay is moulded; only softened wax receives the die; only broken and contrite hearts can take and keep the fruit of heaven. If that is thy condition, wait beneath the pressure of the Holy Spirit; He shall leave the image of Jesus upon thee, and change thee into his likeness from glory to glory.

This gracious operation is God's seal of authentication. It is as though by an act that could not be mistaken, He said: This soul is mine; redeemed and appropriated for my own possession; and it shall be mine in the day when I make up my jewels. We place our seal on that which is unmistakably our own, and deem to be of value; so the likeness of Jesus wrought on us by the Spirit is the sign that God counts us his, and reckons us to be his peculiar treasure.

It is also the earnest of our inheritance. The love, and joy, and peace, which are wrought in us by the Blessed Spirit, are fragrant with the scent and beautiful with the hues of Paradise. They are the grapes of Eshcol; the peaches and pomegranates of the Homeland; the first notes of angelic symphonies; the first flowers of the everlasting spring; the herald rays of a morning that shall rise to the meridian glory of a nightless day. We know that there is a land of pure delight, because we have tasted its fruits, just as Columbus knew that he was drawing near land, when the land-birds lit on his ship, and the drift in the waves told of human habitations. Nay, more, we know, as we experience the gracious work of the Holy Spirit, the quality, though not the infinite measure, of the blessedness of heaven. The Spirit's work is not only the pledge; it is the specimen of our inheritance.

Eph. ii. 18. He is the Inspirer of Prayer.—However diverse the saints are, in national birth or religious customs, they become one in the exercise of true prayer. Because as suppliants they pass into the presence of the Father through the One Mediator, or because their prayers emanate from the same Holy Paraclete.

There are two Advocates or Paracletes, one is on the throne, Jesus Christ the righteous; the second is in our hearts (1 John ii. 1, Rom. viii. 26). And because He pervades all holy hearts, as the wind the variety of organ-pipes, He makes them one. Men as wide apart as Jew and Gentile have access by one Spirit unto the Father, so they are no more strangers but fellows.

"If two of you agree on earth," said our Lord. The Greek word is symphonise. A symphony is a perfect accord, not necessarily of the same notes in different keys, but of different notes in the same key. Struck by a master-hand, they make delightful music. So when souls are touched by the Holy Spirit, though in many respects they differ, yet they may accord in the same prayer. Peter and Cornelius, Saul of Tarsus and Ananias, though far apart and totally diverse in temperament, respond to each other in perfect harmony. And such accord indicates the purpose of God.

Eph. iii. 22. He Indwells the Church.—Other passages clearly teach that He indwells the individual believer. But this, that each several Christian community, fitly framed together, may grow into a holy temple in the Lord (see R.V.). The High and Holy One, who inhabits Eternity, makes his home with humble and contrite hearts. He tenants thee and me, if only we could realise it. But, in addition to this, when a company of believers is gathered in the name of Jesus, there is a habitation of God. "There am I in the midst of them."

This gives each company of disciples the mysterious power to bind and loose. Their acts receive Divine sanction, and achieve eternal results, because they are decided upon beneath the prompting of the Holy Spirit, and therefore in the presence of the living Saviour. The Spirit conveys the will of God to the saints, and bears back their prayers and decisions to God. Thus the Church keeps in step with Heaven, and utters, though sometimes unconsciously, the purposes of God.

Eph. iii. 5. He is the Spirit of Revelation.—There are deep things of God, mysteries, hidden things, of which the Apostle Paul often speaks. The eye of the natural man cannot discern, nor his ear detect, nor his heart conceive them. Deeper than the azure depths above us, or the fathomless lakes beneath, they defy the wise and prudent of this world. But they are revealed to babes, not in the land of light and glory, but here and now, through the grace of the Holy Spirit. "God hath revealed them unto us by the Spirit."

This is what Jesus promised, that when He, the Spirit of Truth, was come, He would lead us into all the truth, and take of the things of Christ and reveal them unto us. Let us be apt pupils of so transcendent a Teacher. Be willing to do, and you shall know.

Eph. iii. 16. He is the Source of Spiritual Strength.—There is no limit to the spiritual power we may receive and exercise. It is said of the Gadites that came to David, whilst he was in the hold, that the least was equal to an hundred, and the greatest to a thousand (1 Chron. xii. 14). And this might be typically true of each of us. We might, like Micah, be full of power by the Spirit of the Lord, and of judgment, and of might.

There is one preliminary condition, however, which we must fulfil. We must be weak enough, willing to abjure the use of those sources of success on which others boast themselves, content that the thorn in the flesh, or the test of the stream, or the wrestle at the Jabbok-ford, should reveal our utter helplessness, that the power of Christ should rest upon us. When we are weak, we shall be strong. When we are worms, God will make us new sharp threshing instruments.

Eph. iv. 4. He is the Secret and Source of Unity.—There is one body, the mystical body of Christ; and as the human body, in all its different organs and members, is one living unit by reason of the spirit of life that pervades it, so the Church, with its manifold diversities of organisation and belief, is one, because animated by the one Holy Spirit.

Many earnest and holy men refuse outward fellowship with those who do not belong to their communion; but they are still one with them, since the Holy Spirit is in them all. The outward unity of the disciples of Christ will never come by minimising our points of difference, but by accentuating the common possession of the one Spirit.

Eph. iv. 30, v. 18. We must watch carefully our own Attitude to the Holy Spirit. He is not merely an influence, He is a person, and may easily be grieved. The Dove of God is very tender and gentle, and if there are thorns in the nest, He cannot remain. The things that grieve Him are instantly recognised by the holy soul by an immediate veiling of the inner light. They are enumerated here as bitterness, wrath, anger, clamour, railing, with all kinds of malice. There is no secret of the inner life more necessary than to retain the inner presence of an ungrieved Spirit.

But let us also seek to be filled by Him. We have drunk of Him, as Jesus has placed the pitcher to our lips; but we should never rest till He has become in us a spring of water, leaping up to eternal life. The Holy Spirit is in every believer, but He cannot be said to fill each. There is all the difference possible between a few drops at the bottom of a bucket and a brimming well, between a few stray flowers scattered sparsely through the glade, and the myriads that make it blue with hyacinths or yellow with primroses.

To be filled with the Spirit was the blessing of Pentecost, but it awaits us all. Indeed, we are here bidden to be Spirit filled. It is a positive command. We have no option than to obey it. Mentioned in the same paragraph with the love of husband to wife, and the obedience of child to parent, it is as obligatory as either. Let no reader of these lines rest without seeking and receiving by faith this blessed gift, which God is able to make abound toward us.

Eph. vi. 17—18. He is equally needful in Service and Prayer.—In conflict with Satan, whether in our own experience or in the attempt to rescue souls from his accursed thrall, there is no weapon so useful as the Spirit's sword, which is the Word of God. Our blessed Lord parried the devil's attacks by "It is written," and we shall not improve on his method. The armour of the enemy is impenetrable to all blades save that which has been forged in the celestial fires of the Holy Spirit.

This is one reason why so much Gospel preaching, which is earnest and faithful in many respects, fails so utterly in the conversion of men: there is so little of God's Word wrought into the texture of the words of man. The Holy Spirit searches in vain for his sword with which to smite the conscience with a deadly wound.

And if you would acquire the habit of intercessory and earnest prayer, so as to be able to watch thereunto, and to persevere, pouring out supplications and entreaties for all saints, you can only do so "in the Spirit." He alone can teach this holy art, or give this eager temper of soul, or perpetuate its practice. Let us earnestly seek it at his hand, for there is nothing that so refines or ennobles, purifies or strengthens the spirit, as this constant breathing out of prayer and breathing in of the fulness of God.

LUX IN TENEBRIS.

SONNET.

Should not a people seek unto their God?
The living spirit to the Lord, who made,
And all life's barriers and boundaries laid?
There is a path the lion hath not trod,
Nor vultures' eyes hath seen—nor fire or flood,
Nor cry of man can pierce its awful shade.
Footfalls that enter into silence fade,
No echo comes back from that breathless road.
Yet we, who know that Christ holds every key,
Of life, of death, of silence, as of sound,
Nor seek to wrest their secrets from the dead;
We see the torch of Faith shine clear and free,
And by its light we travel, homeward bound,
Content in heaven are life's enigmas read.

DUBLIN UNITED SERVICES.

The committee in their new report state that they seek to exhibit to the world that "notwithstanding the existing outward diversity of organisation there is a real substantial unity of faith and love in the Evangelical churches; and that owing to this unity they can co-operate for the promotion of true religion. The fusion of all denominations into one Church may be neither possible nor desirable, but it is both possible and desirable to give opportunities for the manifestation to the world of the essential oneness of all true believers—that oneness for which, shortly before his passion, our Saviour prayed.

"The means employed for this end and object have been and are: the Noon Prayer Meeting held every week-day except Saturday; an Evangelistic Meeting held every Sunday afternoon at four o'clock; work amongst the poor at various times; the Annual Christian Convention and United Evangelistic Missions. In all these efforts we seek to gain the sympathy and co-operation of the various Evangelical churches which recognise Christ as the Head over all."

Details follow of these various operations, and it is stated that "the Free Breakfast Fund provided during last year (1892) about 26,000 breakfasts. The workers have been greatly encouraged by evidence that their work and labour of love have not been in vain in the Lord. Besides the free breakfasts upwards of 30,000 penny and 600 free dinners have been provided, as well as a Christmas tree and a day in the country for waifs and strays." An earnest plea is made for aid. The secretary is Mr. R. Cotter, Christian Union Buildings, Lower Abbey-street, Dublin.

CONFERENCE ON MISSIONS.—A few Christians, who deplore the sad neglect of the Church with regard to the Lord's command to "preach the Gospel to every creature," propose meeting in conference at Malvern on Sunday and Monday, August 6 and 7, for prayer, counsel, and friendly criticism. Information may be had from Mr. N. Northey, Cowleigh, North Malvern.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

By Sir S. Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B.

XX.

THE SIXTH TRUMPET.

"One woe is past; and behold, there come two woes more hereafter. And the sixth angel sounded, and I heard a voice from the five horns of the golden altar, which is before God, saying to the sixth angel which had the trumpet, Loose the four angels which are bound by the great river Euphrates."

And again the prophet beholds pouring down upon one of the three divisions of the Roman earth still spread out before him (this time the Eastern third, the capital of which was Constantinople, now the seat of Empire) a vast number of strangely-attired horsemen, their horses having heads like lions, having mouths belching forth sulphurous smoke and flame. The enormous force of this strange army is specially impressed upon him. "I heard the number of them." The period during which they were to "slay the third part of men," is precisely mentioned, and the object and reason of their sanguinary irruption is declared. It is another infliction of Divine chastisement upon apostate Christendom, abandoned to idolatry and crime of every description.

From the neighbourhood of the great river Euphrates, that in the far distance bounded the terrestrial scene, these hordes of wild and mysterious horsemen were to emerge. They are under the supernatural guidance of angelic powers, powers which we gather from Scripture (see Dan. x. 20, 21; xii. 1) have apparently the guardianship or control of nations, just as of individuals (Matt. xviii. 10).

We have now to ask whether any such event as might be fairly represented by the appearances in the vision took place about the period which we have reached in our historical interpretation. The Saracenic scourge had passed away in its aggressive character, as we have seen, in 762 A.D. Established at Bagdad, near the Euphrates, their once terrible power gradually declined; the fervour of religious fanaticism had greatly subsided, luxury and licentiousness had wrought decay, and strifes for sovereignty accelerated their downfall. Towards the end of the 10th century they were no longer an enemy to be feared. Meanwhile the apostasy of Christendom had been steadily advancing, image worship having been decreed lawful by a General Council (the second of Nice). "Murders," or persecution of heretics to the death—"sorceries," or lying wonders, and pretended miracles—"fornication," the terrible immorality promoted by the confessional and practised in monasteries and nunneries—and "thefts," the rapacity and greed of the hierarchy and the religious orders, leading to the sale of indulgences, of licences to live in sin, of masses for the dead, and of ecclesiastical dignities—all these cried to heaven for judgment.

And it fell. The 1000th year of Christianity had passed, the eleventh century was drawing to a close, when the voice from the four horns of the golden altar before God gave the signal, and from the distant East there issued forth the hosts that were to be the direct instruments for the infliction of judgment. It was from the incense altar that the voice sounded, as if to show unmistakably that it was the truth which that altar represented—the accepted sacrifice and the One Mediatorship of the Great High Priest—that the Antichristian apostasy had so denied and dishonoured.

The numerous Turkman tribes which were included among the subjects of Sultan Mahmoud, rising in revolt, chose Togrul Beg of the house of Seljuk as their chief, and stood forth before the world as the chief power in Central Asia. Having embraced Mohammedanism with fervour, they were called by the prophet's vicar, the Caliph of Bagdad, to his assistance, and there, near the great river Euphrates, Togrul Beg was solemnly appointed his lieutenant. On January 11, 1057 A.D., at the head of his Turkmans, he quitted Bagdad to enter on a long career of war and conquest.

The description of the invading host, partly symbolic, partly literal, given in the vision, will show how far it represents the leading characteristics of the power just referred to.

First, as to their numbers. "Myriads of myriads" is the expressive phrase. Gibbon tells us that the Christians estimated the strength of the Seljukian cavalry at between 200,000 and 360,000, and he speaks of the "myriads of Turkish horse overspreading the Greek frontier from the Taurus to Erzeroum," or of the cavalry from Mount Altai as being "proudly computed by millions." The report of the magnitude of their armies echoed throughout Christendom; they "heard the number," and the alarm that was sounded aroused the Crusades.

Next, as to their personal appearance. They had breastplates of fire (i.e. fire colour) and hyacinth (blue), and sulphur (yellow). Similar descriptions of the attire of Eastern warriors occur in the Old Testament, as, for instance, when the Assyrians are depicted as "horsemen riding upon horses, clothed with blue, captains and rulers" (Ez. xxiii. 6); and when it is said of the destroyers of Nineveh, "The shield of his mighty men is made red, the valiant men are in scarlet, the chariots shall be with glaring torches" (Nah. ii. 3). That scarlet, blue, or yellow were prominent colours in the warlike apparel of the Ottoman cavalry, and continued to be such until a comparatively recent date, is well known. And probably many of my readers have, like myself, seen the gay and variegated garments of the Turkish horsemen as they start from Stamboul on the pilgrimage to Mecca. The colours of the vast masses of mounted warriors covering the earth would be a prominent feature in the scene which the vision presented.

Further, as to their weapons of destruction. Both from the mouths and the tails of these lion-headed horses fire and smoke and brimstone seemed to come, and it was by "these three" that "the third part of men were killed." This is indeed a mysterious emblem or symbol; and yet the instruments of warfare used by the Ottoman armies, and by which the Eastern third of the Empire and its capital, Constantinople, were overthrown, as they appeared to the seer, could hardly have been more accurately represented.

For it was to "the fire and smoke and sulphur," the artillery and firearms of Sultan Mahomet, that the capture of Constantinople, impregnable for eleven hundred years, since her foundation by Constantine, was owing. "Canst thou cast a cannon of sufficient size to batter down the walls of Constantinople?" Such was his question to the founder of cannon that had deserted to him. Then the foundry was established at Adrianople, the cannon cast, and the siege began.

Well does Gibbon describe how "the long order of Turkish artillery was planted against the walls; fourteen batteries thundering at once on the most accessible places"; how "the fortifications which had stood for ages against hostile violence were dismantled on all sides by the Ottoman cannon": how "as from the lines, the galleys and the bridge, the Ottoman artillery thundered on all sides, the camp and city, the Greeks and the Turks, were involved in a cloud of smoke which could only be dispelled by the final deliverance or destruction of the Roman Empire"; and how, the besiegers at length rushing through the breaches, "Constantinople was irretrievably subdued, her empire subverted, and her religion trampled in the dust by the modern conquerors." "By these three was the third part of men killed; by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the sulphur, which issued out of their mouths. For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails."

Was it possible to exhibit the scene to the prophet's eye more vividly, more expressively? He seems to see even the change of position of the artillery as it is brought into action, the hinder part, or "tail" now, as the "mouth," vomiting forth its flame.

Nor let this assumed fulfilment or interpretation of the symbol be deemed unworthy of the dignity of prophecy. If the nails that pierced the Saviour's hands and feet, the dice which the soldiers threw for his vesture, and the very animal on which he should enter Jerusalem, could be predicted; if the engines of warfare to be employed against Tyre (Ez. xxvi. 9), the precise form in which Babylon was to be captured by the Medes, the turning off of the stream (Jer. li. 32), were also prophetically specified, why should it be deemed unsuitable that the invention which has played so great a part in modern warfare, and was for the first time used to any considerable extent on the occasion of the subversion of the Eastern Empire—an event of such supreme importance—should be pourtrayed on the prophetic canvas?

Lastly, as to the time within which the commission to "slay the third part of men" was to be accomplished; "an hour, a day, a month, and a year."

On the principle that a day in symbolic prophecy represents a year, the period in question would be calculated as follows:—

A year (the Julian year),	365¼ days	= 365 years 91¼ days
A month.....	30 days	= 30 years
A day		= 1 year
An hour (1-24th of the day) ...		= 15½ days
Total.....		369 years 106½ dys.

The main difficulty in interpreting the periods mentioned in prophecy lies in the uncertainty which attends the commencing dates. This is the case in several of the chronological predictions of Daniel, and it now no doubt exists with regard to some of those in the Apocalypse. This ambiguity was probably intentional, for prophecy was to conceal from the merely casual reader that which it revealed to the spiritual mind, to stimulate reverent inquiry, and by a measure of uncertainty to keep the servants of God in a watchful and expectant attitude.

In this instance, however, the difficulty does not exist. We know that it was on Jan. 18, 1057 A.D. that Togrul Beg commenced his career of conquest. To his Seljukian armies succeeded the Tartars, under Gengis Khan, who was followed by Timour (or Tamerlane) with his Moguls, and finally Mohammed II., at the head of the Ottoman Turks, took the capital of Constantinople. And what was the day on which the great city fell? It was May 29, 1453 A.D., or exactly 396 years and 106 days from the first-mentioned date—"an hour, a day, a month, and a year!"

Again and again on the verge of destruction, the capture of Constantinople had been strangely averted—now by the Crusades, now by the wars of the various Turkman races against each other. "But," to quote the words of Elliott, "when the predicted period had elapsed, and the Sultan Mahomet was pressing the siege, then no intervention occurred to delay the catastrophe. On the dial-plate of heaven the painting of the shadow-line told that the fatal term had expired. No longer could the fate of the unhappy Greeks be averted. The artillery of the Ottomans thundered irresistibly against Constantinople; the breach was stormed, and the city fell. Amid the shouts of the conquering Turkmans from the Euphrates, and the dying groans of the last Constantine, 'the third of men' were slain—the Greek Empire was no more!"

"UNTIL HE FIND IT."

Over the thorn and thistle,
Along the stony way,
From the Shepherd's care to the desert bare
Wandered a sheep one day;
And a Voice fell sadly from far away:
"My sheep, how long wilt thou love to stray?"

Over the thorn and thistle,
Along the stony way,
With feet that bled, the Shepherd sped
To where the wanderer lay.
He had heard it crying from far away:
"Lord, fetch me home to thy flock, I pray!"

"Over the thorn and thistle,
Along the stony way,
I have sought for thee; now trust to Me.
I will bear thee home to-day.
The wolf and the lion flee far away
When safe in my bosom my sheep I lay."

Instead of the thorn and thistle,
The myrtle bedecks the way
Where the Shepherd feeds and tends and leads
The sheep He won that day:
And others He leadeth from far away
To rest in the fields of cloudless day.

YOUNG MEN FROM THE PROVINCES.—The Polytechnic Reception Bureau is carrying on a much-needed work in arranging for the organised reception of young men and women coming to London from the provinces; but the difficulties of placing the scheme before those whom it is intended to benefit, without incurring the danger of unduly increasing the immigration to the Metropolis, are considerable. Young men and women securing situations in London and needing respectable lodgings, should write to the secretary, Polytechnic Reception Bureau, 309, Regent-street, London, W.

Summer at Northfield.—III.

A WEEK WITH THE COLLEGE BOYS.

(Concluded.)

"Early to bed and early to rise" is a maxim upon which the routine of each day is based. I am not sure that it was carried out in its entirety, but I can vouch for the prevalence of the latter portion. How else, indeed, could so many sessions have been crowded in without in a measure impairing the health of body and mind? Here is a specimen of the daily round:—7 a.m., breakfast; 8, Missionary Institute and Bible training classes, held simultaneously; 9, College Association conference; 10, Bible studies and central training class; 11, platform meeting; 12.30 to 6, dinner and recreation; 6, supper; 7, outdoor meetings on various topics; 8, platform meetings; 9.30 to 10, college delegations. For a "holiday" programme this is pretty liberal! Yet, with full knowledge of what it is to be, succeeding generations of college men spend nearly two weeks of their vacation year by year to learn more deeply the things of God, and how to carry them out in effective service. Nor must it be supposed that these were occasions for the utterance of mere platitudes that fall easily upon the ear. In most cases they involved close application of the mind, and genuine study, not only at the moment when pen and pencil are busy at the work of "taking down," but for many an hour in after days when the contents of the notebooks have to be evolved and developed. It will be noticed that some hours daily were given to recreation. This Mr. Moody considers of supreme importance. "No mind can stand a perpetual strain," he told us; "it must unbend at times or it will break"; and this principle he applies with equal emphasis to Christian work, believing that a continual pondering over of the "cases" met with, and other phases of service, must tend to a morbidity under which in time the worker will break down. Relaxation is an integral part of his religion, and to this, under God, may no doubt be traceable the robust health which the evangelist has so long enjoyed. Thus it was that, in addition to the games that were enjoyed every afternoon, one evening was also devoted to festivities in celebration of the historical when every true American looks down with compassion on those who own another flag than the star-spangled banner of the land of the free. And who shall say that the religious exercises of each day were not enjoyed all the more for the recreation which, not less than those exercises, was undertaken "to the glory of God"?

The weather throughout the week included in this report was perfect, the days being sunny and warm, the evenings cool and refreshing, with sunsets of a brilliancy to which the Britisher is unaccustomed; and, to clear the atmosphere, an occasional thunderstorm, in which the lightning indulged in vagaries which with us are equally seldom seem. In these respects we judge from the newspapers that we have been more enviably situated than our friends, who have had to endure excessive heat at home.

Yet, strange as it may appear, these scenes of peace and plenty have in reality been the foreground of a battlefield. Many a hard conflict has been fought out in these glens and within these walls. The case of Mr. J. R. Mott, the leading spirit of the Conference, will illustrate this. Although the events narrated below did not actually occur at Northfield, they are quite typical of many that have. Here is the story he related at one of the meetings:—There are a number of men here to-night who are fighting a severe battle. My heart, and those of other friends here, goes out in deep sympathy to all such. It reminds me of the greatest battle of my life. I had been a student in one of the Western denominational colleges, and the religious impressions began to be so strong that I was afraid they would drive me into the ministry, so I made up my mind to go away from them as soon as I could. I wanted to enter the legal profession, and as I was going to make a change in college, I decided to go to where I would have as few religious influences as possible. I picked out an institution of which in those days probably that was as true as of any university in the country. I went there fighting the Spirit of God; and thought that if I could get away from those influences, this terrible battle would cease. Several weeks passed and there was no peace.

One day I saw a notice that a prominent English athlete, Mr. J. E. K. Studd, would speak in the association meeting that night. I wanted to hear him because I had heard of him a good many times, but I thought the old fight would become more intense if I went, so I decided not to go. The hour came, the meeting began, but I did not go. At last something drove me out, and just as I entered the door—the meeting had been in progress for some time—Mr. Studd gave two sentences.

I have forgotten everything else he said, but those two passages fastened themselves into my memory like barbs. I went out of that room into a fiercer fight than I had ever had before; it became so fierce that I could not sleep for nights. It involved this whole issue; the changing of my plans, the yielding of my will, and being ready to go anywhere at any time and do the whole thing. The fight went on until the holiday vacation, which I spent among friends, hoping to get away from the impressions. They became more and more intense. I returned to college, and one night a friend and myself came together to study our Latin; but we took up the subject of this fight, finally went down on our knees, and the Holy Spirit of God won the victory.

Bible study and personal work among their fellows in college, general evangelistic work and methods, and the cause of foreign missions—these are the subjects which draw these young men together every summer for instruction and stimulus. Brought to the Lord themselves, many of them by their classmates, their desire is to work and live for Him, and in every college represented there is a branch of the Y.M.C.A. which bears the name of a "College Association," and to which these men belong. Classes for are formed under a suitable leader, and this forms the foundation of all the effort put forth. At this conference (see the programme given above) the "central" training class under Mr. Jas. McConaughy is made up of the leaders, who conduct it each morning in turn; while the "group" training class is for the ordinary members, who assemble according to delegations, colleges, or States and by their numbers. These hours were occupied with very useful studies in the life of Christ, which are likely to prove of great service in the work of personal dealing with men.

At the sessions of the "Association Conference" were discussed the helps and hindrances to progress in spiritual things during the preceding terms. Mr. Mott was in charge, and held the reins with a really masterly hand, eliciting from one and another the essential points of information, collecting in brief and concise form, their sum and substance, and passing rapidly on to the next topic, which was treated in the same way. Verily an ideal chairman. Oh, what hours of precious time would be saved in meetings of various kinds, if there were more like him! His queries were on this wise: "What institutions here have had special difficulties this year in connection with Bible study, that you have not been able to remove, or upon which you would like to get light from other delegates present?" Hands are raised, and the first man is asked what college he represents, and what form the difficulties have taken? Then, "Have any others had this same obstacle to contend with?" Yes. "Then tell us how you dealt with it." The reply is noted, and a second offers his solution, and so on. Thus each college profits by the experience of another, all the hints are collected, and each delegate is fortified against a recurrence. Thus the practical working of the Association is carefully threshed out, cleared of any element which is foreign to its success, and made ready to undergo the test of another year's operation.

Sometimes the question is how to get men into these Bible classes, and how to hold them when they come; sometimes it is in the lack of a capable leader, or to appoint a time suited to all. In answer, some advised to place the responsibility of the class less upon the leader than upon the members, making each take an active part both in gathering it and in contributing to its interest. As to time, no hour would probably suit all, but most men could suit themselves to the time. "There is always time to do the will of God," said the leader pointedly, "and when a man says he cannot give the time to Bible study, find out how much he spends in converse on other subjects apart from those of his college course." This hint may profitably be applied to a much wider circle of professing Christians whose time is not so fully occupied as that of college students. In the result, delegates from twenty-four colleges reported distinct progress since last summer, of whom twenty said it was CLEARLY TRACEABLE TO THESE NORTHFIELD SESSIONS.

The colleges which sent most representatives had the best results.

Next would follow some practical advice how to ensure success, such as this: Get a few men to realise the need of such work, to face the plain facts about the college, and to consider how Christ would deal with them. Let the Christians, even the most spiritual, be revived; let there be confession of all sin and inconsistency of living to God and to those who had witnessed it; keep well to the front private prayer and Bible study; also helpful literature, such as Finney on "Revivals," William McArthur's "Tongue of Fire," etc. Organise classes promptly after commencement of term, before athletic and other interests have appropriated the time of new men.

Then "incentives" would be considered, some suggested by the audience, others by the leader. Let us note a few: The promises of God, the value of the soul, the activity of adverse influences, the conditions of college life (by which men are thrown much in each other's company), which impose peculiar opportunities, as well as responsibilities; the fact that if men are not reached at college there is less likelihood of influencing them in after life.

On another occasion Mr. Mott exhibited a map marked to indicate the number and location of the colleges in which this inter-collegiate movement is sustained throughout the United States. He showed that steps have been taken in every department, and the organisation is more firmly established in the universities, colleges, and schools of North America than ever before. The number of associations has increased during the year from 410 to 441. The thirty-one new associations are pretty evenly distributed throughout the United States. The most important addition to the inter-collegiate movement is the University of Chicago. Fifteen years ago, when the movement included less than fifty colleges, it was comparatively an easy matter for one college secretary to keep in close touch with the entire league. Now it would be impossible for one man, giving his entire time to visitation, to do a thorough work in even one-fourth of the existing associations. The international secretaries have devoted in the aggregate over one-fourth of their time to conferences and conventions. This includes four college conferences, three summer schools, two deputation conferences, seven presidential conferences, seventeen State conventions, and one international convention. At these gatherings they have met from 400 colleges and have co-operated with them in determining the policy for the entire association field.

Having now seen an outline of one of these Conferences, it will be of interest to obtain a glimpse at Bible studies upon the Divinity of our Lord, a specimen of which I append in very brief form. In this case the class leader was Mr. Robert Speir, a young man of singular ability and deeply taught in the things of God. Alike at the Ladies' Conference, held two weeks ago, and at that of the men, his ministrations were highly valued. It will be seen that such a subject affords an unlimited field for diligent study, and the outline here presented is in itself sufficient to suggest material for several discourses. The subject is a study of the life of Christ in reference to its INTERNAL EVIDENCE OF HIS DIVINITY.

First, his perfect childhood. Second, his plans and methods of work. 1, Undertakes to organise on earth a new and universal spiritual society, called the Kingdom of God, which obliterates all class distinctions; 2, the immense and revolutionary character of his plans; 3, they take uncompromising precedence over all human ties; 4, they cover ages of time; 5, their originality; 6, their boldness and audacity; 7, begins from and works with the poor, but is respected and followed, but still becomes no demagogue; 8, set a perfect moral standard, reached it, and demanded that others should; 9, his ability to impart spiritual ideas to dull and prejudiced people; 10, knew and touched men's personalities; 11, charitable but not liberal; 12, never anxious for his success; 13, his superiority to human intercessions and judgments; 14, never caught off his guard; 15, the way He handled men; 16, his personal ways of doing things; 17, the freeness and selflessness of his deeds. Third. Active and passive traits of his character: 1, sincerity; 2, simplicity; 3, humanity; 4, unselfishness and personal dignity; 5, generosity and love toward his enemies; 6, tenderness; 7, the perfect evenness of his life; 8, knowledge of little things and love for them; 9, universality of his character; 10, the perfect balance of his character. Fourth. The testimony borne to Him by the different relations into which He came: 1, of his power to supply; 2, of his power to command; 3, by his attitude toward woman; 4, by his freedom from current superstitions; 5, He called forth the instinctive obedience of men; 6, the impressions He produced; 7, better He was known, the greater his acknowledged superiority. Fifth. Traits in Him inexplicable unless He is divine: 1, He presents the perfect ideal of friendship; 2, his piety is unrepentant and yet sustained; 3, the strength and strangeness of his emotions; 4, his superhuman knowledge; 5, He recognised and asserted his own uniqueness; 6, He dared to prophesy the course of human history. Sixth. His bearing at his trial and death. Seventh. Testimony borne to Him by men who do not concede his full deity. Eighth. The influence of his character on the world. Ninth. The significance of it all.

I now turn to the missionary interest which manifested itself during these days. Not a few of the "battles" referred to above have arisen over this question. As one young fellow testified, he had been advised by his friends to keep away from Northfield lest a visit should result in his receiving a call to the foreign field, and as a matter of fact not one of these conferences has passed without the number of missionaries being augmented by new recruits, for Christianity is a commodity of which the more we give away the more we get.

The presence of Rev. H. P. Beach, for some years located in China, invested the cause with a personal interest, and his addresses were always listened to with great attention. Near the hall of meeting is a wooded knoll where, in the cool of the evening, before the chief session was held, the students and their friends would gather two or three hundred strong, to receive instruction on this and kindred topics. These were termed a feature of the conferences that has proved very helpful in previous years. At the first of them Mr. Robert Speir led off with the searching proposition, "Every honest man facing God and the world is bound to ask himself, 'What is my duty?' And this, in the case of a Christian, resolves itself into 'What is the will of God for me?'" Assuming his willingness to come thus far, there are certain principles by which decision may be facilitated. Our life-work must be in accord with the example and spirit of Christ, in which He was unbound, and free to go to 'other cities also,' wherever the Spirit led Him. It may be that our work may lie in a lesser field than we think ourselves capable of filling: our ideas may have to be lowered. Or, again, we may have had a training which we intend shall fit us for a certain work, while God may see that that very course is the best possible training for a different work altogether, as, for instance, in the case of Paul. We may, therefore, safely put ourselves in the hands of Him who never played false with any life that submitted itself to his guidance.

Mr. Beach gave very practical hints to those who were moved to consider the mission-field as their future home. First of all, find out as much as possible about it from persons who have already been at work there. Read all available literature on the subject. Get into touch with mission work at home, especially among foreigners, and thus get accustomed to speaking and thinking in a new language. Prayer, above all, must have an important place; "for I can tell you, said he, "that when you get face to face with 360,000,000 of men who know no Saviour, there is not a man here who would not be driven to pray as he never had prayed before. That is when you learn to pray, when you find you are perfectly powerless to do anything of yourself."

On another occasion the same speaker's counsel dealt with an aspect of a missionary's work which is too seldom considered until too late, with the result that when he reaches his destination he is faced by difficulties of a material character such as he had never contemplated, or which he had quite lost sight of when preparing for the more spiritual side of his duties.

At another of these gatherings Dr. Peck, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, gave an equally stimulating talk on missions in India. Coming nearer home, the New York City Mission was represented by Mr. A. F. Irving, who is associated in that work with Rev. Dr. Schauffler. As the result of his special pleading eight men from various colleges volunteered to spend their vacation, in whole or in part, among the submerged and outcast in that great city, while by those who were unable to go in person, eight hundred dollars were contributed toward the attendant expense. These college boys are splendid givers. They contributed, aided by other friends present, no less than three thousand seven hundred dollars during the Conference, to be expended as follows:—800 dols. in response to Mr. Moody's appeal for the widow which I noted last week, 800 dols. for the New York City Mission, and 2100 dols. toward the maintenance of the Inter-collegiate Y.M.C.A. Movement, the expenses of which are very heavy, owing to the long distances to be travelled by the secretaries, &c. Truly, they laid up for themselves treasure in heaven.

I have not attempted to give a detailed report of the Conference as a whole, but such a selection as will indicate its most salient features. Other speakers contributed their share of work during the remaining days, until the boys dispersed at last to digest what they had heard, and to formulate their future plans, under the directing Spirit of God, who created and redeemed them to show forth his praise.

Mr. Geo. C. Needham, who has been laid aside for some time from active work, is now in greatly improved health. He is spending the summer at Northfield, where in an informal way he is able to give occasional Bible readings to the visitors attending the Conferences there.

———

The Lord is still prospering the preaching of the Gospel in Chicago. Rejoined by Mr. Moody, and re-inforced by Pastor Theo. Monod, of Paris, Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, and Major Whittle they are holding the fort in two theatres, five tents, two or three churches, and some lesser halls, although one after another the places of worldly amusement are closing their doors for lack of patronage. They are determined that "the devil shall not have it all his own way," and God is giving them to rejoice in the fruit of their labours.

Passing through Niagara town I paid a hurried visit to an old friend of many of my readers, Miss Rye. She is still carrying on her work among the little emigrant girls, who are taken from want and weariness in our crowded cities and given a fair start in life. Like many another devoted worker whose name has a frequent place in the prayers of Christians at home, Miss Rye is beginning to feel the weight of years, and is anxious to meet with a man and wife who would take up the work under her guidance, with a view to assuming ultimately its entire responsibility. "These little ones" utter a strong plea which will, I hope, soon be answered.

LONG JOURNEY OF A ROSE TREE.—Mrs. E. M. Denney, of Ashland, Oregon, U.S.A., has received by mail a living rose tree, from the Garden of Gethsemane. It was sent by Mr. T. J. Alley, of the Jewish Relief Mission at Jerusalem, in appreciation of that lady's untiring interest in his work. The plant was packed in a condensed-milk can, the package weighing less than a half-a-pound, which is the weight limit of the international post. The brave little traveller is growing beautifully in its new home, after accomplishing the long voyage of eleven thousand miles.

NEWBURY, BUCKS. — The "William Goode" Protestant Van has been stationed in the Market-place since Thursday evening. The van is in charge of Mr. Samuel Evans, a man trained for missionary work under the late Hugh McNeile and other good Protestants. His work is to preach the Gospel, and spread the truth by word and by books, of which he has a good supply, suitable for all ages, and all of a distinctly Protestant character, some being expressly designed to warn the unwary against the advancing tide of forms and ceremonies, which are regarded as a danger to all spiritual religion by reason of the "attractions" they possess for the natural senses. Addresses were delivered each evening, and the attendances and sale of books have been such as to show an appreciation of the work,

PRISON SYSTEMS AND DISCIPLINE.

By CHAS. COOK.

The question has often been asked, "Why is our prison system a failure?" That it is in many respects a failure is proved by an "Ex-Chaplain of Prisons" who, writing in The Times recently, said, "To prolong their lives amidst the association of cold-blooded criminals and perfunctory warders, is to damn their souls to gradual petrifaction and to the hardness of the nether millstone, and to put them, humanly speaking, outside the probabilities of repentance whilst on earth."

Several suicides have occurred amongst prisoners lately—barely mentioned in the outside world, and then forgotten—added to which there has been an outbreak and mutiny in the prison at Wormwood Scrubbs, necessitating the drafting of scores of men to other penal establishments.

What causes these suicides and mutinies? As a rule, the worst criminals make the best prisoners. Why are so few prisoners reformed and converted? For surely we do not imprison men merely to punish them. Should not the English nation seek to correct and improve her criminals as well as deter them? A convict, speaking of C——, said: "There's many a bloke here as is druv to suicide, it's such a 'ell upon earth. My mate had been bashed twice, and then he chucked hisself under the engine wot works the trucks."

I solemnly believe it is because in many prisons they have no possible chance of being brought into contact with the life-giving power of the Gospel of the grace of God.

The United States prisons are not thus exclusively put into the hands of one official. There is no exclusion of judicious visitation, and while there are serious and grave defects in American prison systems, yet in some things they are ahead of us.

Professor Wayland, of America, says: "I tell you that the power of the Christian religion in the Michigan State Prison does more than all the discipline we can get there. I have been a military man for many years of my life, and I have the reputation of being a disciplinarian."

Having credentials from the chief Governments of the world, I have the entrée into all the foreign gaols, and as I am somewhat incapacitated from continuing my own large meetings through overwork and a bad throat, I have arranged (D.V.) for a few months' rest from England, and purpose visiting the prisons of America, and of holding special services in them from New York westward. This I can manage to do where I cannot now speak to an audience of thousands with any comfort.

There are hundreds of Roman Catholic prisoners who need the Word of God and the Gospel of Christ, and there are desperadoes in the Western States prisons that nothing but God's grace can touch, but I have had ocular demonstration of the worst of men being changed by the power of God. One poor prisoner scratched on the back of his bolted and barred cell-door:

> "Oh, Jesu, Thou art standing > Outside this fast-closed door!"

Thank God he soon afterwards opened his heart's door to the Saviour.

> "Call them in, the poor, the wretched;
> Cowering 'neath the brand of shame;
> Speak love's message low and tender,
> 'Twas for sinners Jesus came."

And I desire to have fruit from America also.

The need of visiting such places was evidenced by me when I first visited an American prisoner in H.M. Prison, Portsmouth, some five years ago. He was under a life-sentence, and he said to me, "This is the first time anybody has visited me for sixteen years." I expect to find my fellow-countrymen similarly placed in America. I found his brother to be a clergyman in America; and I eventually got the prisoner released, and he is now at home with his friends.

It was said of Howard, "He remembered the forgotten," and a greater than Howard says, "I was in prison, and ye came unto Me." When Howard reached St. Petersburg, the Empress sent for him to visit her at Peterhof; but he refused to go, saying: "I was not sent to visit palaces, but prisons."

It is not the pleasantest work in the world, and not always the cleanest, but it is Christ-like; and I ask the readers of The Christian to remember me in their prayers. I sail (D.V.) on August 26th.

If any care to help me in this work, they can write direct to me at 6, Frithville Gardens, Shepherd's Bush, W.

For the Young.

THE STORY OF THE FIG TREE.*

When I was a child I had a peach tree, of which I was exceedingly proud. Its branches were nailed to the wall at the end of my own little garden, and all the fruit it bore was always my own. One year, I remember, it had four large peaches upon it, and I was so delighted with them, that I said to a lady, "I shall sow these stones in the ground, and then I shall soon have more peach trees." I remember she laughed at me, and said it would be of no use; I should only have wild trees for my pains, which would bear bitter wild fruit. Often and often after this I puzzled over the matter, and when I was told that it was just the same with the pips of apples and pears, and any cultivated fruit tree, I was more and more astonished. It seemed so strange that if I sowed their seed I should only have different kinds of crab-apple trees or wild pears come up. I could not understand it at all then, but I do now. I see that the nature of a tree cannot be changed by any amount of cultivation; the fruit outside will be improved, but the wild nature will be still within it.

It was just so when Jeremiah's "good figs" (the Jews—Jer. xxiv.) were planted again by God in the sheltered vineyard (after the captivity in Babylon). For 500 years the tree grew on, and then the Lord of the vineyard in which it was planted came in person to see if, after all his patience, his care, and his culture, any really good fruit was to be found upon it. He did nothing hastily; for three years He sought for fruit upon its spreading boughs, but He sought in vain. Then He said to the dresser of his vineyard, "Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" What a terrible moment this was for the fig tree, was it not? For nearly two thousand years it had been cared for and cultivated, yet it had nothing but leaves to offer to the Son of God when He came seeking fruit upon it; nothing but leaves when God saw Adam—its stock; nothing but leaves when, four thousand years afterwards, Christ came to it again, seeking fruit upon its branches. Man had nothing but leaves; nothing but the outward profession of being a fruit tree; nothing but the outward acknowledgment of being responsible to bear fruit for God. And yet even then it was not cut down at once. "Lord," cried a voice of intercession, "let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it; and if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that Thou shalt cut it down." (Luke xiii.)

A gardener will tell you that if he has a fig tree in his garden which runs to wood and leaf, and bears no fruit, he has to dig a deep trench round it, that he may cut back the roots; then he has to fill the trench with brickbats and hard, dry rubbish to keep the tree from rooting too deeply in the earth again, after which he can manure it, and then he will hope the next season to see fruit upon it. The wood of the fig tree is good for nothing, and if it bears no fruit it only cumbers the ground. I remember, when I was a child, that in a meadow near our house there grew a tree which never bore any fruit. It stood among some apple trees, which season by season had yielded their useful apples. But this tree was not an apple tree; the leaf showed us that. What could it be? Strange to say, no one about the place knew what it was, for no one remembered ever having seen any fruit upon it. "What is the use of it?" said my father one day; "it may as well come down; the grass will grow better without its shade."

I do not know how it was, but I always had a sort of affection for trees, and I daresay I should long ago have forgotten all about this incident had it not been for the sorrow I felt for this mysterious, fruitless tree. It seemed so strange to me that my father, who had always lived in the country, did not know its name. Oh, for just one piece of fruit at the end of one little bough, to tell the secret and save the tree! But there was not one, and now its doom had gone forth, and it was to be cut down. I do not know how it was that the execution of the sentence was so long delayed; but so it was that before the axe was laid to its roots another spring came round, and the mysterious tree, as if it had known that it had but one more chance for its life, burst into flower. Beautiful white blossoms covered its boughs, and when the autumn arrived it was a sight to behold, for the golden fruit was peeping through the soft green leaves on every branch. The tree was saved; it was known by its fruit; it was a quince tree, and the large golden quinces were most beautiful to look at. No one would cut down such a tree, and I dare say it stands there still, and bears its beautiful fruit for those who own it now.

But alas for the ancient fig tree! neither care, nor culture, nor delay, could avail it aught. We read that the Owner sought fruit on it only once more. He was hungry, and seeing its leafy boughs, "He came, if haply He might find anything thereon; and when he came to it, He found nothing but leaves" (Mark xi.). There were not even the little green figs there, which should come before the leaves; there was not even promise for the future. Then, as He turned from it for the last time, He cried, "No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever." He would not have looked on a thorn-bush for figs, nor on a bramble-bush for grapes; but this tree, which professed to be a fruit tree, had utterly failed. And so it was that on that day the ancient fig tree in the vineyard of God withered away; its leaves hung down, faded and shrivelled, so that all men could see its bare and fruitless boughs. Alas for the ancient tree! The Owner had given it up for ever. He came to it hungry, but it offered Him nothing but fair professions and barren boughs.

It is thus that the history of Israel proves that human nature cannot be changed. I daresay you have heard people talk about man "being on probation": it means being on trial; and so he was in the nation of Israel, and this sad story gives the end of his trial. God proved his nature to be wild and fallen by its fruits. He did not mean to look for any more fruit from that tree for ever, and no blessing would ever come from the nation of Israel to other men while it stood on its own merits as a fig tree.

SEASIDE SERVICES IN IRELAND.

During July special services for young people have been held daily at 4 p.m. on the rocks at Portrush, by Mr. A. G. Dodderidge, assisted by Mr. Butcher (Sidney College, Cambridge) and Mr. Thornton (Trinity College, Cambridge), and the attendance has been well kept up throughout. Over 700 gospels were sold, and 150 new members of the Scripture Union enrolled, several visitors having also promised to open branches of the Union on returning to the various centres of influence.

One day a large map of Africa was traced on the sands, with the outline in white pebbles, the rivers in green seaweed, and the lakes in brown; the mission stations being represented by mud-pies. Large audiences gathered to hear accounts of general mission work in Africa. This is the first time that such a map has been given in Ireland, and all who attended expressed high appreciation. The Bible talks for Christian workers, at 11.30 in the Town Hall, were much enjoyed, and many sent in requests for praise for definite help received.

CHILDREN'S S.S. MISSION.—SEASIDE SERVICES. 1893.

THE NATIONAL BIBLE SOCIETY OF SCOTLAND has made a new departure of the greatest interest and significance in connection with Bible circulation in China. This is the production of the Gospel of Mark in Chinese, with explanations calculated to make the narrative intelligible to the people of the Celestial Empire. Numerous testimonies to the value of this annotated issue have already been received from missionaries in China, including the oldest and most experienced of that body.

SUMMERTIDE.

Beauteous summer, sea of glory,
Flooding land and wave with light,
Clothing earth in emerald raiment,
Fragrant blossoms, fair and bright.

All the earth is thrilled with music,
Singing birds and humming bees,
Murmuring streams and balmy zephyrs,
Gently rustling 'midst the trees.

Gurgling cascades dash and sparkle
Down the mountains wild and steep,
Azure wavelets, softly sighing,
O'er the sand and shingle sweep.

Crystal lakes, fair landscapes' mirrors,
Sapphire arches smile above;
Tenderly sweet nature whispers,
God is beauty, light, and love.

Welcome summer, breath of Eden,
Type of peace, and joy serene,
Smile of God, and ray of heaven,
Wrapt in folds of golden sheen.

Waft us upward, homeward, sunward,
On thy pinions of delight,
Till we pass the pearly portals,
Entering the Lamb's pure light.

MISS MITTENDORFF'S HOME.

I do not often nowadays see in your paper donations for the Orphan Home, Clayton House, Epsom, formerly Miss Mittendorff's, now under the superintendence of Miss MacGrath. I think the principle is a sound one, "Ask the Lord, and tell his people," and I am sure that if Christian friends knew the great trials through which the Home is now passing they would gladly help our dear sister, and relieve her of the great anxiety which she cannot help feeling at the present time. Your readers are perhaps not all aware that Miss Mittendorff's health has failed, and that she has retired to Germany. She does not receive a penny from the funds of the Home. Miss MacGrath needs our sympathy and prayers, as she has had no proper change or rest for mind and body for three years. There are from sixty to seventy little girls in the Home. They have had their "daily bread," but it has sometimes been "dry bread," and nothing more. Once this was only obtained with difficulty, the little children contributing the pennies which friends had given them for their "very own."

Another important matter which Christian friends should know about is that the house is in need of repairs; at least £100 is wanted for this purpose. Miss MacGrath does not know that I am "telling the Lord's people" of her needs, but I believe that the Lord has put it into my heart to do so, and in this way to answer her prayers.

Industrial Home for Boys.

I observe that in the sketch that accompanied last week's portrait, the writer referred to the Industrial Home for Boys in Copenhagen-street, Islington, which was founded by my father-in-law, Captain Mann, R.N., and has for more than twenty years since his death been carried on by my sister-in-law, Miss Sarah Maria Mann. May I venture to inform the readers of The Christian that in this Home nearly one hundred boys, not convicted, but in danger of crime, are cared for; that all the work is carried on in dependence on the Lord Jesus, and for his glory; and that Miss Mann greatly needs increased help under the incessant strain of raising the funds? She can be addressed either at the Home, or at my residence, 130, Haverstock Hill, N.W.

"WORK FOR WOMEN IN FRANCE."—A lady worker in Paris writes: "People everywhere receive with joy the glad tidings of the Gospel, and ladies have been very helpful even in work among men. In Paris splendid work would be done if we had more help. Let a lady keep the door and invite the people to come in."

SIERRA LEONE.—Rev. S. Trotter Williams, native superintendent of the Countess of Huntingdon's Churches in Sierra Leone, has recently dedicated two mission chapels in heathen localities, occupied by Sherbros and Mendies tribes. The entire cost of one of the stations was defrayed by Mr. William List, J.P., of London, a gentleman of great liberality among that body.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 6.—JOB XXXVIII.

In this chapter the Almighty appears on the scene, and He puts a period on the long controversy by this wonderful account of his operations in nature. He does not exactly answer the difficulties that have been raised, but just describes his power and glory, the inference being that mortal man should leave his concerns in the hands of One so wise and mighty.

Job is first conducted to the day of creation, and asked if he knew aught of the mysteries of that mighty creative act, when God began to build the earth, stretching the line upon it and laying the corner-stone.

He is then led successively to the sea, as it flows into its decreed bed (8-11); to the breaking forth of the morning, when the earth is turned as clay to the seal; to the ocean depths; to the home of light; to the treasure-house of snow and hail; to the parentage of rain and dew; to the stars in their mazy orbits through the sky; and finally to the recesses of the forest, where the lions couch; and concerning each of these he is asked what he knows about them. Of course he can but confess his ignorance, and in doing so puts himself out of court as a judge of Divine Providence.

MONDAY, AUGUST 7.—JOB XXXIX.

The series of questions is continued, and God asks more especially with respect to animated and organic nature. The wild goats, (1—4); the wild ass (5—8); the wild ox (9—12); the peacocks and ostriches (13—18); the war horse (19—25); the hawk (26—30). In each case some special point is asked, hidden from the observation of ordinary men, and in which the patriarch must stand on a level with them. And if he were unable to know more than they do on such matters as these, how could he expect to know more than they of the reasons that dictated God's dealings with his people?

There is mystery in every part of the universe of God. He hides Himself, so that we cannot discover Him. His thoughts are deeper, his ways profounder than our mind can fathom. There is not a single pathway leading out of the garden of life, along which, if a man goes for however short a distance, he presently comes to a point when the track dies away in the grass, and there is no further progress. This is rather a reason for believing in the God revealed to us in the Bible, that He is the God whom we know in nature. In each case we have to deal with the inscrutability of his ways. Nor can we wonder, if the God of the Bible and of Nature be the God of Providence, to find mystery also there.

TUESDAY, AUG. 8.—JOB XL.

God asks whether he who had been contending with Him, as Job had been doing, was in a fit state to carry on a further argument, and Job's reply is a confession that he was conscious of his sin, and would proceed no further. This is the man, who a little before, had so persistently demanded an interview with the Almighty, that he might have an opportunity of laying his whole cause before Him. It makes us think that those who, now that God's glory is hidden, are so bold and arrogant, will speak in another tone before the judgment bar.

The argument is now taken up again by God Himself, on the same line as previously. Hast thou an arm like God? Canst thou thunder? It is as if God said, When you are able to do what I do, then you will be able to discuss the questions of my Providence on equal terms.

There follows then a magnificent description of the hippopotamus, "The chief of the ways of God," that lies under the shadow of the lotus trees, wallowing in the river, and invulnerable to the sword. Man stands appalled before the massive strength of such an animal, but how great must He be whose mind designed, and whose hand produced it, and how deep therefore must his ways be, and past finding out.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 9.—JOB XLI.

The last paragraph described the hippopotamus, the whole of this chapter is devoted to the crocodile. In a series of striking questions, the voice of the Almighty suggests his greatness. He is not an animal with whom you can play, or to whom you can speak soft words, or whose skin can be reached with sharpened weapons. His scales (12-17); his eyes, mouth, and nostrils (18-24); his fearlessness of human attack; his power to lash the sea into a fury, making it to boil (30-34)—each of these features is described in graphic terms.

As before, it is clear that the object is to throw into strong contrast the puniness and littleness of man. Perhaps in our days we should rather quote the marvels of the telescope or of the microscope, the vast profound above us and beneath. We are not so much given to speculations about the organic world in which we live. But we are able to appreciate the argument. Surely He who tells the number of the stars, and weighs the mountains in scales, will have his pathway through the deep, and his footsteps in mighty waters. Being the God He is, he could not but baffle the eye of man, but the heart can fully trust Him. We know that He does all things well.

THURSDAY, AUG. 10.—JOB XLII.

Job's confession worthily heads this chapter. For long his heart had been impressed with the greatness of God, and he confesses that he had uttered what he understood not, and had been trying to penetrate mysteries for which he had neither plumb-line nor scaling-ladder. He had been out of his depth, he says, uttering ill-considered and foolish sentiments. In addition to this, he confesses his sinnership. "I had heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear, and thus had thought too highly of my own integrity and goodness, now mine eye seeth Thee, and I confess that I had measured myself by too low a standard, that I had been content to compare myself with myself, and with others, but now in the full blaze of thy glorious purity, measured by thine own infinite standard, I abhor myself."

Then the Lord vindicated his much-suffering child, and refused to accept his friends except at his intercession. Intercession for others should accompany every deliverance for ourselves, and to intercede is sometimes the only way of turning the captivity of our souls. Then came the end of the Lord. Prosperity, children, old age. Not one thing failed. Job's cup of life was filled. All ages have learnt and been enriched from his sorrows, and compared with the eternal weight of glory, which they have wrought out, they now seem to be light and for a moment.

FRIDAY, AUG. 11.—PSALM I.

The contrast between sinner and righteous comes out very clearly in this Psalm, which anticipates the beatitudes in its promise of blessedness. Blessedness wells up from the soul on the condition of its avoiding certain negatives, and obeying certain positives. And if each of us would carefully avoid the one and follow the other, we should begin to drink deep draughts of the stream of heavenly joy.

Negatively.—Be careful of your walk. Do not loiter within earshot of sinful talk. Choose your seat far from the neighbourhood of those who indulge in flippant criticism on sacred themes. Do not fear the obloquy and scorn that you will incur, for the wicked will soon pass away as the chaff from the threshing floor, and their judgments will not stand.

Positively.—Read the Word of God until you come to delight in it. Accustom yourself to meditate daily and hourly on Scripture. Strike the roots of your nature deep down into the river of God, which is full of water. Be righteous, first in the righteousness by faith of Christ towards God, and secondly in the righteousness inwrought by the Holy Spirit. Then you will bear fruit all the year round. You will show no signs of withering. All that you touch will prosper. And over all God will bend, blessing you, prospering you, interested in every step you take.

SATURDAY, AUG. 12.—PSALM II.

God's will always excites tumult in the heart of man, and his first endeavour is to set it aside. Whilst the nations chafe against the rule of his government, the heart chafes against his arrangements in daily life. The bands were meant to bind the heart to God, but we senselessly desire to break them. The cords were intended to draw us back from wandering, and to tie us to the horns of the altar, but we wish to cast them aside. Mortal man, in his pride, refuses to accept God's will, God's thought, God's way.

But, do as we will, we cannot alter it. We might as well try to pull the sun down from his place in heaven as break the purpose of God. We only dash ourselves against the bosses of his shield, as seagulls against the lighthouse tower, or chafe sores in the neck which refuses the yoke. But God's King must still reign and his will be done.

In his resurrection power (Acts xiii. 33) Jesus comes to us, declaring his right to reign. He shows the authority of the Father promising him the empire of hearts. He asks for our heart, thine and mine. Let us yield it to Him lest we suffer the inevitable doom of refused love.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

AUGUST 13.

PAUL AT JERUSALEM. Acts xxi. 27-39.

GOLDEN TEXT. Phil. i. 29.

LEAVING Miletus, the Apostle continued his journey to Jerusalem. The disciples whom he met at Tyre (xxi. 4-6), and Agabus at Cæsarea (10-11), repeated the prediction of the troubles awaiting him at Jerusalem. The urgent entreaties of the saints in both places failed to turn him from his purpose. As a good soldier of Jesus Christ he was prepared to endure hardness. His aim in visiting Jerusalem was probably twofold: he hoped to unite more closely the Jewish and Gentile believers; and, next, he was filled with fervent zeal for the conversion of his own people (Rom. ix. 3; x. 1).

He was not long left in doubt as to the suspicion with which he was regarded by many brethren in Jerusalem (20-22). In order to remove this suspicion he consented to the proposal of James (23-25), and took upon himself the legal charges of four Christian Jews who were about to fulfil their Nazarite vow in the temple. Some have condemned Paul for this; but it was only one evidence of his desire to "become all things to all men, that he might by all means save some" (1 Cor. ix. 20-22). The fact that it failed of its object, and only introduced him to another danger, as this lesson shows, does not prove it to have been wrong.

PAUL IN DANGER (27-30).—How suddenly it came upon him. Neither the sacredness of the building nor the object of the Apostle in entering it saved him from the violence of his enemies. While seeking to remove the suspicions of some, he was exciting the bitter opposition of others. The charge urged against him was twofold (28). Matthew Henry describes it as a charge of "bad doctrine and bad practice, and both against the Jewish ritual." As to the doctrine, his presence in the Temple for such an object disproved that. The other item of the charge was a serious one. The outer court of the Gentiles was open to all, and was separated from the inner court by a stone wall "four-and-a-half feet high, with small obelisks at regular distances, bearing inscriptions in Greek and Latin that no Gentile might enter on pain of death." The charge was based on mere supposition, "they supposed" (29). A little inquiry would have corrected their mistake. The fact that Trophimus was seen with him in the city is a poor foundation for a charge that Paul took him into the inner court of the Temple. How often have others to suffer under a false accusation which has nothing more than a supposition as its foundation! The danger was very great. The passions of the mob were easily excited, and before help could be obtained Paul was being beaten (32), and was in danger of losing his life (31).

PAUL RESCUED (31-33).—His rescue was remarkable considering (1) the person who effected it. The chief captain was Claudius Lysias (xxiii. 26). He was in charge of the Roman cohort, a body of 1000 men, then stationed in the castle Antonia. "Centurions" (32) were captains of 100 men. God used this man for the deliverance of his servant. He works his will by what instrument He pleases. (2) The manner in which it was effected. The castle was so conveniently near the Temple that the rescue could be prompt. Delay would have been fatal to the Apostle. But when delivered he was bound with two chains (33); in which the prophecy of Agabus receives a literal fulfilment (11). It is evident that Lysias believed him to be guilty of some crime. He was actuated not by concern for the Apostle, but solely by concern for Roman law. How the Jews regarded Lysias for this rescue may be judged from the words of Tertullus (xxiv. 7). Learn how secure are his people while God needs them for his work.

PAUL PERMITTED TO SPEAK (34-39).—It is a proof that God was over-ruling all these events when Paul obtained this permission. It was first necessary to correct the false impression of the chief captain. It was impossible to get any intelligence from the angry mob (34), so Lysias drew his own terrible conclusion, identifying Paul with a certain Egyptian impostor (38). Josephus speaks of this man as having gathered about 30,000 followers, but among these were 4000 men called Sicarii, a name derived from Sica, a dagger. They were assassins, and were accustomed to mingle with the people and do their deadly work. The fact that Paul could speak Greek proved the suspicion of Lysias to be incorrect (37), and prepared the way for his fuller account of himself (39). What a strange pulpit, the stairs leading to the Roman barracks! What a strange protection—a company of Roman soldiers? What a strange audience—an infuriated mob, eager for his blood! How come such a company to listen so quietly (xxii. 1)? It was a proof of Psa. lxv. 7. God has overruled all events to secure Paul his opportunity of testifying for Him.

THE KESWICK CONVENTION.

BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

IT is an interesting fact that Mr. Robert Wilson, whose figure and voice are so familiar to attenders in the tent, was one of the two original Conveners of these meetings in Keswick for the deepening of the spiritual life, which have had such a wonderful world-wide influence. His co-convener was the late revered and sainted Canon Battersby, vicar of St. John's, Keswick. Both these friends had attended and received personal blessing at the Oxford Convention, from which may be said to have sprung the latter-day Holiness movement in this country. They were also present at the Convention held in Brighton a year later, and it was there that Messrs. Battersby and Wilson resolved that, God willing, a similar gathering should be called at the beautiful northern lake town of Keswick, with which they were so closely associated. The invitations were accordingly sent out the summer following the Brighton assembly, and Christians were summoned to attend "Keswick Union meetings." The great importance of sinking all sectional names and distinctions was recognised and acted on from the first; ever since, the wisdom of this course has been growingly apparent, and the familiar line at the entrance to the tent, as well as over the platform, has been the ruling motto of the Keswick convocation, and has, I doubt not, been a main cause of the wondrous blessing that God has caused to attend and to follow the meetings year by year.

"ALL ONE IN CHRIST JESUS,"

Some years since, when Canon Battersby was called to his eternal rest, you gave his portrait (which you may think it well to reproduce). I am sure every reader, whether he has been at Keswick or not, will be glad also to see the strong and placid countenance of the much-esteemed Chairman, and now sole Convener, of the Convention, Mr. Rober' Wilson.*

MR. ROBERT WILSON.

The anticipations to which I referred last week have been more than realised. In no former year have such crowds overflowed the great tent—sometimes into the Drill Hall, and also into the lecture room at the same meeting. While the chief interest centred, of course, in the tent, many of the smaller meetings were of deep and practical value; in a smaller gathering speakers and hearers seem to be more within range of each other, and the influence of the exhortation, with the personality of the speaker behind it, is in less danger of being dissipated by distance. The ministers' meetings and meetings for young men held in the Drill Hall were marked by much reality and power. At these conventions there has always been a very large proportion of young ladies in the audience, as they have naturally a good deal of leisure at command. It was observed this year that young men were present in greater numbers than in former years. This could not altogether be explained by the fact that so many students were in camp; so that the influence of the Convention teaching would appear to be reaching, in a growing degree, the young Christian manhood of the country.

Whatever they may do at home, Convention visitors for the most part certainly observe the practice of early rising during the week of the meetings. The early prayer meeting at seven o'clock always fills up the greater part of the tent. The earnest, pointed prayers and the brief exposition make this a time of quiet enjoyment and spiritual stimulus—giving a good start for the day. Breakfast is scarcely over when the time for the missionary prayer-meeting in the Drill Hall has come. The attendances here are of course limited, by comparison, but both numbers and freshness of interest are on the increase. Mr. Eugene Stock takes charge of these meetings, and he is able, from the ample resources at his command, to infuse much real profit into these gatherings.

Next comes the Bible Reading in the tent at 10.15. For some years this was left almost exclusively in the hands of Rev. Hubert Brooke; this year he only gave two of the readings, Messrs. Fox and Webb-Peploe being the speakers on Wednesday and Friday morning respectively. All the addresses, however, are largely of the nature of Bible Readings, from the free quotation of Scripture that is intermingled. Indeed, constant reference to the revealed Word, in support of doctrinal positions advanced, is one great feature of these remarkable gatherings. The Bible readings are among the most crowded meetings of the day; if it can fairly be said that one is more crowded than another. Note-books and parcels are in very general use, and many a helpful thought or telling exposition is noted down for future reference and cogitation.

Only half-an-hour intervenes between this and the first general meeting, which commences at twelve, and at which two addresses are delivered. While this meeting is in progress, either a ministers' or a young men's meeting is being held in the Drill Hall, and a ladies' meeting in the Lecture Hall. The ladies' meetings were conducted by Miss Nugent and Mrs. Bannister. Three afternoon meetings, specially for younger ladies, were under the charge of Mrs. Tottenham and Miss Gollock.

An interval for dinner comes between the close of the general meeting, 1.30, and 3 p.m., when the tent is again the centre of much interest. At this hour, on two of the four full days of the Convention, there were meetings for "first attenders," when the more general and elementary teachings as to the wholly consecrated life are expounded and enforced, and relevant questions are answered. Wednesday afternoon is set apart for the annual review of the Keswick Mission; while on Friday this year there was a testimony meeting, which was regarded by many friends as in some respects the most interesting occasion of the Conference. The brethren who testified were Rev. H. C. G. Moule, Rev. G. C. Macgregor, and Rev. George Wilson. Mr. Moule's testimony as to how he was led into an experience of the blessed life is one of great weight and worth, that are not lessened by his very modest way of expressing it. He told the story in brief to the students in the Camp last year, and it was reproduced in our report. The narratives of the other two brethren were also very definite and simple, some of the circumstances in Mr. Wilson's case being of a most pathetic kind. It was evidently a bit of a cross to these friends to elevate themselves and their experiences on to any public pedestal, but the intention was to be of help to others, and in this respect they were most welcome.

The evening general meeting began at 6.30, and continued for two full hours. Two addresses were given, and the last half-hour was devoted to an after-meeting. This part of the Keswick programme is almost invariably entrusted to Rev. Evan Hopkins, whose long experience and firm grasp of the truth in its simpler and clearer aspects, enable him skilfully to bring the hearers to the definite points of trust and committal. In this he is very successful, and evening after meeting as the

* In our last week's issue our usua notice of forthcoming portrait and sketch was inserted, announcing Mr. Robert Wilson, one of the two original conveners and the present chairman of the Keswick Convention, as the subject. The words "and sketch" should have been omitted, as Mr. Wilson had decidedly expressed to us his desire that no sketch of his life should be given. He much preferred, also, that his photograph should not be engraved for publication, but, in compliance with our wish he has not prohibited this. It may be permissible for us to quote from his private letter. This makes it evident that his desire is not to be made prominent, but quite the reverse:—

"I can only most respectfully and firmly decline, as far as I am able, any such notice in your valuable paper.

'I'm a poor sinner and nothing at all,
And Jesus Christ is my all-in-all.'

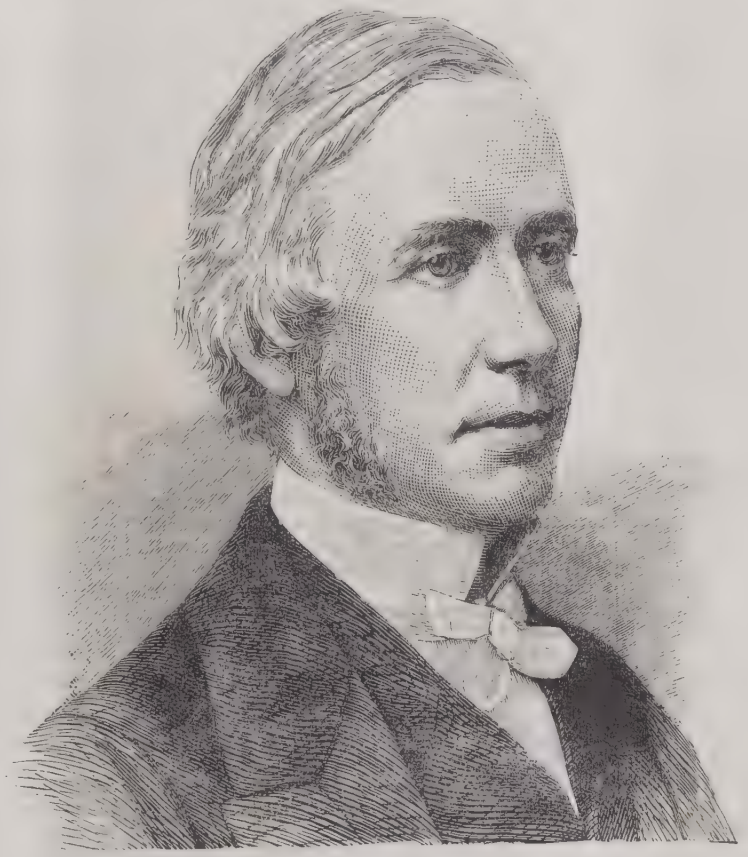
and that is all the record I care to have. Saved by his grace fifty years or more ago, and kept—too often, I fear, in a Jacob life; now desiring, in the humbled self, to be only for his glory, and used by Him; through his grace clinging, halting, trusting, and praising. May it ever be so—kept by the power of God. . . . Please, please, don't let me for one moment be thought to wish to be anything.—

"Very respectfully yours, ROBERT WILSON."

He tells us that he has received an anonymous letter, the writer of which, after seeing our notice, hoped that his portrait would not appear in THE CHRISTIAN. This question, like every other, has two sides. We once visited our dear brother George Pearse at Algiers, and found round his room many of the portraits which had appeared in our pages. "These," said he, "are my company;" and he went on to say how he was encouraged by looking in their faces. Many a lonely worker in far-off lands will be cheered when he looks upon the faces of the beloved original Conveners of this Conference, one of whom, as we have said, is the present Chairman. We all have our family photographic albums, probably not excepting the anonymous writer; why should not the family of God, scattered abroad, have the opportunity of looking upon the faces of some of their fellow Christians who have been used in the Master's service?—ED.

meeting draws to its close, numbers rise in their places to indicate, in the presence of God and man, their individual acceptance of the truths presented, whether it be in regard to confession of past failure, or a desire for clearer light, or a deliberate resolve to "leave it all with Jesus," either for acceptance before God, or for cleansing of conscience and heart, or for power in life and service. These after meetings are very solemn seasons indeed, and the closing moments of the evening gatherings are doubtless the turning point in many a young life, though not exclusively among those who are young.

This year the hour from nine to ten p.m. has been given up to prayer in the tent, and many joined in that holy, humbling exercise.



A word may properly be said as to the weather; though weather is a much less important factor at Keswick during Convention week than many would suppose. The meetings are crowded whether the sky be fair or foul. Of course fine weather adds much to the comfort of the visitors. I have thankfully to record that for the most part there was abundant sunshine, with cool breezes; while frequent rains during the night also conduced to coolness through the day.

In the following pages will be found ample notes of some selected representative addresses; others will follow in succeeding issues.

A FOUR-FOLD CALLING.

BY REV. HUBERT BROOKE.

Having read 1 Peter ii. 9, "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of Him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light," the speaker said that here we have a commentary on Paul's prayer for the Ephesians that they might know what is the riches of the glory of God's inheritance in the saints. The passage tells us what the Lord has in us as believers, and what He means when He teaches us to say, as in the Canticles, "I am my Beloved's and his desire is toward me." "Ye are," in order that ye should; He makes you this to start with. We want to begin where God begins: with what He makes his people, that He may get from them what He made them for. Mr. Brooke drew attention to the fact that the four phrases in this passage are very closely borrowed from Old Testament writings (Ex. xix. 5, 6; Isaiah xliii. 20, 21). In this description of what He designs his people to be, God begins at the top with Himself and goes down to the bottom, where we are; if we want to understand the matter perhaps we had better begin at the bottom, and work up to the top.

THE LATE CANON T. D. HARFORD-BATTERSBY.

(From a Photograph by Mr. Treble, Victoria Hall, Norwich.)

First, "Ye are a peculiar people"; that is, a people of God's own possession (margin of the A.V., "a purchased people"). There is a double idea in it; first of all, the idea of purchase—"the Church of God, which He hath purchased with his own blood" (Acts xx. 28); that is the foundation truth of all. But we are purchased also for God's own possession. In 1 Chron. xxix. 3 there is a striking translation of the same phrase in the Septuagint, where the Hebrew is the same as in my text: "Moreover I have of my own proper good...which I have given to the house of my God, over and above all that I have prepared for the holy house." Let me say in passing that this word "peculiar people" does not mean "odd people" at all. Some people seem to think that because they should be peculiar they must dress unlike everybody else—must wear a different kind of clothes, walk in a different gait, perhaps cut their hair in a different style, and so on. But that is not the sense of it at all; we are to be peculiar in a double sense—first as purchased, and then as God's own proper good.

"I KEEP MYSELF TO MYSELF."

Suppose you go out and make some purchase. You pay down the price and get the receipt, and tell the seller to send it home to you at once. The day goes by and it does not come. Weeks go by and it does not come. You send to the shop a message, "What are you doing with what I bought?" They reply, "We sent it up." "Well, it has not arrived." "Then the errand boy has kept it on the way; we suppose he is using it for himself for a bit before he gives it over to you." You do not make purchases on these terms. How often God's own people are like that errand boy. You have been bought with a price. Have you sent yourself home to the purchaser, or have you kept yourself on the way? "I keep myself to myself" people will say. That is the last thing a Christian ought to do; he ought to give himself away to God at once. Do not let us be like servants who are given to purloining—keeping for themselves something of what is their master's. Moreover, there are to be no "perquisites" or "percentages" in our service. Time, talents, possessions—God wants them all.

We are not our own; we are Another's. Suppose we take two sheets of paper and write down on one all we have which belongs to God. We begin to note down our time—that is his; our talents, our heart, our lips, our possessions, our members, our body; in fact, what have we that we have not received? All these things are the Lord's purchase, his own proper good to be sent to Him immediately. On the other hand, what can we write down that is ours? After we have written down on the second paper all we know that is ours we can use the paper for another purpose; for there will be nothing on it at all. Yes, we have got one thing; we have got the Lord Himself. I suppose the reason why many a believing soul does not know what it is to possess God is that they are not willing to be possessed of God. Here is the beginning of the whole matter. We have come here to be honest. Happily we have not got to put a notice outside this tent, as you see written upon metropolitan stations,

"BEWARE OF PICKPOCKETS."

But I think if we were quite honest we should have to put up: "Beware of Christian pickpockets." If we are God's own proper good and we are keeping for ourselves what belongs to Him, there is not much difference between us and a pickpocket, is there? They know a pickpocket when they find in his pocket that which belongs to somebody else. I have never known a dishonest heart quite comfortable; so long as there is something in our hearts not quite right with God there is no real comfort and joy and liberty. If we want all that God is willing to give, let us begin very practically by being honest men and women, and saying to God to-day, whether we have done it before or not, "O Lord, I am thine from head to foot; everything I have is thine. From henceforth I mean to belong to Thee as the owner." Never mind what the consequences are. They are sure to be consequences of blessing and of peace.

Then, when we understand this first thing, which lies between us and God and nobody else at all, we can go on to see how it lies between us and the world. "Ye are a holy nation." As you know, holiness here means separation from all other nations in a most peculiar way (Deut. iv. 34, vii. 6, xxvi. 18, xxviii. 8, 9; Lev. xx. 24—26). These passages describe what God wanted his people Israel to be, and what He wants us as Christians to be—holy before all the world, and separated unto Himself. See two or three wonderful consequences of this. If all believers are separated from the world, they are all united to one another. If any get mixed up and separated again from their fellow Christians, I think they have gone back into the world. It is easy to get separated there, and I think it is easy to be one up here.

Then, having told us what we are, God goes on to tell us what we are to do: "Ye are a royal priesthood." We are kings and priests unto God (Rev. i.). The royal part seems to lie in abeyance for the present. But if we suffer with Him we shall also reign with Him. The saints shall judge angels. If we overcome we shall sit down with Him upon his throne. I remember hearing Mrs. Amanda Smith say on this platform twelve years ago: "You might not think it, but I am a daughter of a King, a princess in Jesus Christ."

"NOBLESSE OBLIGE."

The word "royal" seems to lift us above the meannesses of life; meanness and royalty somehow do not go together. It is told of Alexander the Great that he asked one of his servants what he should give him as a reward for some trifling service. The servant replied: "Give me a thousand talents"—a very large sum. The king gave orders that it should be paid over to him. When someone said that the servant was not worthy to receive a thousand talents, Alexander replied: "It is worthy the king to give it." Noblesse oblige, we say. It is a grand thing for the believer to know that he is called of God to a royal priesthood. The mean things go when we begin to walk and bear ourselves like kings and queens.

If the royalty is in abeyance at present the priesthood is not; it is in full swing. Thank God this priesthood belongs to every believer. The only condition of this priesthood is that we have come to Christ. It is a matter of honour and of calling from God (Heb. v. 4, 5). No man taketh it upon himself. What is it to be called of God to this priesthood? You never heard of a priest without a sacrifice. So those poor people who say they are "priests" must have a sacrifice and an altar. They mix up the limits of the priestly office, the altar, and the sacrifice; that is all. But let us be very clear, that all those who have come to Christ—boys and girls as well as men and women—are priests. It goes very far. Romans vi. 8 and following verses, show us that if we are priests to God we are to sacrifice or yield up our members to Him; chap. xii. 1, that we are to present our bodies; then there will not be much left of the outside of us, at any rate. "My son, my daughter, give me thine heart"—the inside is gone too. Then we are to offer up "the fruit of our lips" (Heb. xiii. 15); as Hosea calls it, "the calves of our lips." Whatsoever toucheth the altar is holy. What a wonderful change must come over those lips when they are given to God to be his, to be offering the sacrifice of praise continually. That double stream of salt water and fresh from the same source and opening must stop. There is a new kind of tap invented with a single spout. You turn the tap one way and the hot water comes; turn it another way and the cold water comes. Praises to God and curses to men, or what seem curses, must not come from the same lips. Our whole lives are to be a sacrifice to God; who will offer this sacrifice to-day?

One thing more—"a chosen generation." The word generation conveys the idea of stock or family. We are of the family of God. This is closer than all that has gone before. We need to look back and see why He chose us. We read in Deut. iv. 37, "Because He loved thy fathers, therefore He chose their seed after them." So we are "accepted in the Beloved." "The Lord did not set his love upon you nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people, for ye were the fewest of all peoples; but because the Lord loved you and because He would keep the oath which He had sworn unto your fathers" (Deut. vii. 7, 8). We are chosen in Christ—that is the only solution. It is this that brings us back to the source of all things, leading us up to the very heart of God, who says that "his delights were with the sons of men." When we see our own hearts in God's sight, it seems marvellous that He should delight in us, till we remember that it is in Christ we are chosen, and made accepted and acceptable.

"A land which the Lord thy God careth for; the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it" (Deut. xi. 12). So we read "the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous"; they are God's promised land to-day. "The eyes of the Lord run to and fro through the earth, to show Himself strong on behalf of him whose way is pure." "I have hallowed this house which thou hast built, to put my name there for ever, and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually" (1 Kings ix. 3). Brethren and sisters, you are in Christ, his chosen generation. He chooses you that his eyes and his heart may be there perpetually. What a wonderful life. Do you wonder that we call it sometimes "the blessing"; because it has in it all blessing. What wonderful nearness to God. But this is the nearest of all. I spoke to some of you on Sunday night about coming here to learn how to possess our possessions. Here they are—a good four-square possession. What a wonderful calling!

Out of my poverty into his wealth,
Out of my sickness into pure health;
Out of the old into the new,
Out of the false into the true;
Out of what measures the full depth of "lost,"
Out of it all and at infinite cost.

Into what must with that correspond,
Into that which there is nothing beyond;
Into the deepest of joys ever had,
Into the gladness of making God glad.

Wonderful Person whose face I'll behold,
Wonderful story then all to be told;
Wonderful all the dread way that He trod,
Wonderful end—He has brought me to God.

THINGS THAT OFFEND.

BY REV. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE.

I TAKE a few words from Matt. xiii. 41, "The Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend." You know what is meant in the English of the Scripture by offend and offence and kindred words: a meaning far different to that which we popularly give to the words now. To give offence is a widely other thought from what we should now attach to the phrase—to provoke irritation, to cause estrangement, and the like. An offence is, in the English of the Scriptures, a stumbling-block, a thing that makes the foot trip, and those that walk fall; and those that are mentioned here as the things that offend are the things in the Lord Jesus Christ's kingdom that make feet stumble, and those that walk fall.

I have not read the whole verse or the connection. It points to the end of the world, to the eternal judgment; it tells us something of what the Lord Jesus Christ, the Righteous Judge, and Executor of his own judgment, will do when finally for His award, comes up the sinner, and the sin. All that I point to the passage and its contents for now, is to remind you in its awful light that there is something in the offence and in the thing that makes to offend, and, of course, in the person that makes feet stumble and those that walk to fall, that is unutterably evil in the eyes of our Lord Jesus Christ.

I suppose the first meaning in his most holy mind, if we may reverently define it, was of the most awful kind of laying stumbling-blocks in which a human soul deliberately, and of purpose, leads others into sin. Such a use of the word you have in Rev. ii. 14, where the Lord speaks, in his message to the seven churches, of Balak, and of Balaam the son of Bosor, who put a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, leading them into gross and grievous sin: to eat things offered to idols, and to commit fornication; his deliberate purpose being to make them displease their God, that He might cut them off from his blessing. I do not mean to say more now of that extremest and most direful form of offending. I rather take the passage to remind you that there are other sorts of offending of which the Bible is full, and which are more to the purpose to name in a congregation of Christians like this; the which all the more, therefore, need to be remembered with a reverent, self-examining care, which if we neglect ever, if we neglect to the end of our lives, we shall be RUNNING AWFUL SPIRITUAL RISKS.

So let us think now, as before Him whose eyes are as a flame of fire, of some things whereby those that are in his kingdom, those whom God, in his great mercy, is not going to cast out, yet may greatly grieve Him and bring down from Him his most stern chastening, through failing to remember the tremendous wrong against Him of laying things on which others may stumble and fall. There are several passages in the New Testament that speak of this. Turn, for instance, to Romans xiv. 13. There you find the Apostle is dealing with Christians in the Roman Church, whose temptation was, in a spirit very unlike the Master, in the pride or the defence of Christian liberty, to make others stumble and fall. "Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but judge this, rather, that no man put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way." You remember the case he considers in that passage. It is the case of Christians, strange to say (but it is always a possible case), who had found the secret of divine life and power, practically negativing it all by showing a Pharisaism of spirit towards those whom by comparison they were pleased to think weak. Paul calls them off from their miserable mistake, and entreats them to take themselves into the severest scrutiny and judgment, and make the verdict and sentence this, that henceforth definitely from that time onward, they would take care not to put a stumbling-block in a brother's way.

We have other kinds, again. Perhaps we may conveniently divide the ways which men in Scripture are represented as making others stumble, into two sorts—the sort of stumbling-block which consists in emboldening another to do wrong, and the sort whose effect is to repel with disgust of the Gospel those who should come across the thing we have laid in their way. The first kind is well illustrated by 1 Cor. viii. 10, a kindred passage to that in Romans, though dealing with the matter from a somewhat different point of view. You recollect the condition of that remarkable church of Corinth. There is no church in the whole of Apostolic Christendom to be compared apparently with the church of Corinth for the amazing outburst of special gifts; and there is no church, not even the Galatian, which Paul felt needed from him such tremendous rebukes. Compare the Corinthian Epistles with others, and you have almost to go to them alone to ascertain what the mysterious phenomena of spiritual chrismata were; practically we know nothing from other quarters about the gift of the tongues, about prophecy and miracle, and the like. It was rife at Corinth, and it needed positively to be restrained in its mighty outbursts in Corinthian assemblies. Yet these were the men to whom Paul had to say, about things truly spiritual, that he had to write as unto babes; that they could stand nothing but milk, and were a long way off being ready for solid food. Think of a church that needed 1 Cor. xiii. to be written to it—word after word, sentence after sentence, message after message, levelled straight at this miserable spiritual vanity and spiritual pride which were

DELUDING THEM ABOUT THEMSELVES.

In this Epistle Paul has to deal with the subject of meats and drinks, and he takes, with his mighty strength, and the considerateness learned and received at the feet of Christ, the side of the weak, the side of the tender-scrupled, the side of exaggerated reverence, the side which, if it erred at all, erred in the direction of thinking with trembling and wistfulness about duty and the will of God. What does he say to these men? "Meat commendeth us not to God." "If any man see thee which hast knowledge"—the word is used with the most heart-searching irony—"sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him that is weak be"—we have it "emboldened," but in the Greek it is "edified," or built up. Again, there is heart-searching irony, which takes a holy word and exposes its application to the unholiest purpose; "it shall be edified to eat those things which are offered to idols." And because it has seen those advanced and experienced, much-gifted, much-blessed men, acting as though conscience and duty were at an end for them, these shall begin indeed to act as though conscience and duty were at an end for them.

We have in that class of stumbling-block a tremendously level message to many a Christian life here and now. Thank God, we are in his mercy permitted to know a great deal in theory about the liberty of the Christian; and in his infinite compassionate mercy a great many of us have come to know something in a blessed reality we did not dream of once, of the fact of that liberty. But remember there is nothing so horrible as unregulated liberty, and the fact is just as true in the spiritual sphere as in the secular. There is nothing so positively terrible as anarchy—so fearful as a travesty of regulated freedom. And let every Christian man and woman in this tent remember—for it is plain on the surface of the will of God—that the believer's liberty is never for one instant to be unregulated; it is never unto himself. It belongs as much as everything else to Him who has bought us, body, soul, and spirit; affections, understanding, and will; and, therefore, having been set free that you may serve, your liberty must fall into line, and must be used scrupulously, reverently, watchfully, for the glory of God and the good of the man or woman at your side.

Are there not things in us that are meant to be remembered by such a memento as that? It speaks to the man who is careless as a Christian about his personal life in the details of to-day. It speaks to the man who thinks, forsooth, that he is so emancipated from rule, from the bonds of precept and of law, that he may be a law unto himself about how he spends his time, his money; about the recreations which he allows himself; about words concerning others that he

ALLOWS TO TRIP FROM HIS TONGUE.

It speaks with tremendous searchingness, shall I say, to the older young man about his example to the younger, to the boy. It speaks with tremendous searchingness to the Christian who has got, as he thinks, into further ranges of blessing: that it be apparent that whatever he is advanced in he is advanced in humbleness about himself, in considerateness about others, in the sense of the awfulness of duty, not only to the Master, but to his fellow-man. It speaks to the Christian who allows himself in tone and temper any irreverence towards the sacred name of God, which may lead another to drift into real profanity by degrees. It is a risk of our time. There is a sort of free-and-easyism, as I would call it, in many quarters, as to the use of the Eternal Name. I have been told—it may be a slander, but if it is it is one that may point a moral, and carry a truth along with it—that there is such a thing as using the word "Hallelujah" after a good hit at lawn-tennis. If there is such a thing it had better be given up; it is a hideous stumbling-block. The word Hallelujah contains what the word of God calls "the glorious and fearful name" of Jehovah our God. That is not to be kicked about like a football, or hit like a ball at tennis. Alas! if we think in that sense that we are free to make free with the Eternal Name.

Then there are the whole Christian tone and temper of life. If we let ourselves get out of the rule of "Henceforth, not unto ourselves, but to Him who died for us and rose again" in anything, we may be, we know not how soon and how deeply, leading another over whom we have influence, who looks up to us perhaps as the ideal of what is manly in man, or womanly in woman, into real trifling with conscience, or real decadence of estimate of the Lord's glory, and his claims on the tone and temper of the life that is to glorify Him. And the second generation of the influence

WILL BE WORSE THAN THE FIRST.

Far and wide, from the stone you have dropped into the lake of Christian life, there will go circles of hilarity and unspirituality, and you will be among those that offend in the kingdom of the Son of Man.

How much in detail might be said upon this. I have taken, quite at random as far as I know, a case or two. Would that I could speak more at length and more in detail. I have much to do constantly with young men, and I seem to feel so much en rapport with them that I seem to forget how long I have ceased to be young myself. But I say to all such here: See to it from your earliest Christian manhood, whether in the exercise of your strength and freedom you may not be causing others to offend through any personal habit. Have you entirely consulted your Lord and Master about the perpetual pipe? I can hardly conceive anything that falls more under the head of self-indulgence, and yet it seems very widely to be considered as consonant with a close walk with God. I do not think it is a matter to be left without the closest possible consultation with your Master; if from this point of view—Will it possibly, or probably; has it not sometimes been—an offence in this way, not that it will necessarily induce another who may just as well be without it, to copy you in precisely that habit, but may it not convey a far-reaching lesson as to the lawfulness of the purest self-indulgence in a man who has given himself to God?

But I turn to the other limb of the matter. There are stumbling-blocks—there are scandala, to use the word in the Greek Testament—whose cause lies in another direction; it disgusts of the Gospel those who are, it may be, really seeking it, or who might, by the grace of God, be blessedly drawn in. Let us take care that we are watching unto prayer—in which attitude alone we can receive the power and blessing which will enable us to avoid laying stumbling-blocks which shall disgust those that would enter in or might. How can I say enough here about the Christian's use of his tongue, and about his use, above all, of his tongue concerning other people?. If I am not wrong, there is no side of our Christian life in which we are more keenly watched by those who either are half thinking about entering in, or half wanting a reason for not entering in, than how believers use their tongues and talk about other people—the easily and comfortably passed-on slander; the irreverent remark about any set over us in the Lord; the sneer, the satire; the comparison of ourselves or those who think with us, with others, to the latter's disadvantage—all these things, day by day and in uncounted cases, are stumbling-blocks in the way up to the gate which make those who might enter in turn disgusted back.

The tone of our thought and talk about others—where are we not in the risk of being heard and seen? Our servants behind the chair at dinner hear the talk of people who profess to be earnest Christians and to do earnest Christian work, when they come to tear others' characters or opinions to pieces, and to pronounce their judgments upon them.

And as with the tongue so with the temper. In public it may be all very well; but to Christian men active for God, what does your wife know about your patience at home? Is it always the Lord Jesus Christ and his credit and glory first, there? Is He always sought after then, to save you from the stumbling-block that consists in your being seen to be upset by a petty annoyance, to be angered by a sudden interruption, to be made perfectly miserable at home by some problem, which after all is not so very tremendous, of action or duty? The Lord does not mean us to be indifferent to such things—to care nothing for human sympathy about such things; but He does mean us to shine at home if we would not stumble others from the Lord's Kingdom; if we would not grieve, and perplex, and dismay those who are not so far on in the Kingdom as we are.

May I speak of another and totally different sort of stumbling which we may view afterwards with such intense regret, if set before the feet of others—the stumbling which in Deuteronomy is called not "serving the Lord with gladness of heart." Do we bring up a bad report of the land; by knowing, it may be, a great deal of duty, but going through it after all with very much of the clouded brow and the tone which sounds so much like a sigh. There are such things, and they are great stumbling-blocks. A case in the past comes before me. I remember two earnest devoted Christian workers who had formed a great and valued friendship. The one was rather seeking decision for Christ; the other had already found Him, but there was that in the life that which made it a stumbling-block to her friend. She expressed to another party honest surprise and real perplexity; it was a problem she could not solve, how those who she knew were far above and beyond her in the life of God found their duties, which were certainly heavy, so burdening and bewildering. Yet it never seemed to occur to them to manifest the joy of having so much to do for their Lord and Master. Let us, not artificially but supernaturally, by the grace of God, out of the midst of busy lives, if He has given this to us, bring the opposite of stumbling-blocks, bring stones of edification,

PRECIOUS STONES OF THANKSGIVING,

to lift those among whom we may live above such mischiefs as that. It is a glorious way in which to glorify God. One thing is certain: if we are altogether the Lord's, nothing will be more sacred to us than his call to a life, if He gives the strength for it, of indomitable duty. Nothing will be more sacred than the thought of this obligation to which my Master has sent me—those letters through the post, all those attentions to give to the cares and the crosses of other people; the call to attend to their thoughts—mental, spiritual, or whatever it may be. He has sent me this, it may be perfectly secular, round of duty, to be done unto Him in loving help to others, in obedience to the King, and without affectation; so that what was once a burden has become a sacred thing to carry for the Master's sake, while He holds its heavy end, and we can continually sing,

Peace, perfect peace, by thronging duties pressed.

And God grant we may never be a stumbling-block, and disgust from the kingdom those that seek it, by our being found to be the least untrue. Do you think it possible for holiness and untruthfulness to take one step together? That cannot possibly be. Not the most sacred end in the world can for a moment justify a lie, or the falsehood of saying one thing and meaning another, the falsehood of saying one thing in public and another in private. A falsehood in things purely secular and common, so that we are looked on as not men of our word—that is a tremendous stumbling-block to honest doubt.

And now this fragmentary selection from the things about which one or another of us—God grant me to begin at home—may examine ourselves through and through and through, is over. What shall we do with it? If we are here for anything it is, first, that we may see the will of God and our own tremendous falling short; and then that we may come to Him whose sacred blood atones for the guilt even of the stumbling-block; whose mighty presence can transfigure that bit of our life which is defective, into something which shall be built up into the life of God instead. That is what we are needing to-day. You remember the verse in Heb. xii., "Make straight paths for your feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way." As much as to say, You Christians, see that you get your road straight, that those who look at you and watch you and follow after you may find, as far as the gospel of your example goes, that it is a straight road and a cleared road for them. He can do it. So let us begin to-night again to take as our motto, "The Lord Jesus only and alway for me." Let us watch unto prayer, and we shall be foundation-stones instead of stumbling-blocks, steps upward instead of things that stumble downward, to the praise and the glory of God's grace.

FIVE HEAVENLY PLACES.

BY REV. CHARLES A. FOX.

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ. (Eph. i. 3.)

You have observed that each one of the Epistles has its own peculiar message. The Epistle to the Romans, being the first, gives the foundation truths of the Gospel—God's holy teaching about justification and sanctification. Then we have the Epistles to the Corinthians, with the ministry of that same Gospel. After that comes the Epistle to the Galatians, where we find that a debased Gospel has already entered into the Church, and how it should be dealt with. From that we pass to this Epistle to the Ephesians, where we find the Church seated in her heavenly places. It is the Epistle of the heavenly places five times repeated. Following this there is the Epistle to the Philippians, showing the Church in earthly places, under human conditions. This is the Epistle of the Church under Divine powers and privileges and in her high places.

Let us glance at these five heavenly places; they bring out distinctively five different aspects of the truth. Observe, first, it is

THE HEAVENLY PLACE OF BLESSING.

For this epistle is the book of Joshua of the New Testament; it is the leading of God's people into the promised land; the entering of God's people on their inheritance; the spreading out before them of a whole blessed region and realm of God's great gifts to his Church; and it is the entering of that Church into her inheritance, and the glorying of that Church in her inheritance.

Notice, then, this place of blessing. God is ever blessing; thank God for it. We can out-preach the worldling and the philosopher on this point. God blessed at the creation, as soon as it was finished. He blessed his great chief creature, Adam. Then He blessed the very day into which He brought his child Adam, who was blessed in that wondrous Eden of God. Afterwards He went on blessing. He blessed Noah after the flood and each succeeding patriarch, until it came to the time when He actually ordained an institution of blessing—the priesthood. So it was until Christ came. As soon as He came He began to preach; his mouth poured out blessing—Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness; blessed are the pure in heart—blessing after blessing came forth until, when He had finished his course, when He was in the act of blessing, holding his pierced hands above his disciples, He ascended majestically of his own free will and power into the highest heavens. As if Christ would show by that last act of his that his wonderful course of blessing was only beginning; and with uplifted hands He ascends into the holy place, where they are still uplifted in blessing upon his people.

What, then, are these marvellous gifts and blessings? What are redemption blessings? We have them in verse 4: "According as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world." Here is the sovereignty of Divine grace—marvellous mystery, still infinitely true and precious to every heart; more precious, I think, as we get older, when we lean back on the will of our Father and rejoice in his electing mercy and grace. He has chosen us to be what? "That we should be holy and without blame before Him in love." It is no careless or arbitrary election. "Having predestinated us to the adoption of children, we are," as we read in the next verse, "accepted in the Beloved." Sweet word! Then in verse 7, "In whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins"; and again, "Wherein He hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence, having made known unto us the mystery of his will"; and again in verses 10, 12, 13.

It is a sevenfold redemption blessing: I have merely given the outline. What shall we do with it? Shall we not turn round and bless God our Father? It is good when a father blesses his little child; but there is something infinitely touching when the little child blesses its father. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ"—that is the pith of the whole.

Where are all those blessings stored? In the reservoir, Christ Jesus. The reservoir of a town is usually outside the walls of the town, on some high hill, like the adjoining Lake Thirlmere, up among the hills and cool breezes and pure air of heaven. So in our blessed reservoir Christ Jesus, on the hills of Zion, every blessing is safely maintained for us; we cannot destroy or spoil it. Have you entered already into "this valley of blessing so sweet"? Are you conscious that you have the smile of God upon you as He consciously blesses you? I know nothing so sweet as when the soul, bowed down with its own unworthiness, hears in the silence the voice of the High Priest Himself, blessing us in the holy place and consecrating us to his holy service.

In the same chapter, verse 19, we find the second heavenly place,

THE PLACE OF POWER.

"What is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe." This is what we all want to get. It is power that we are looking for. This is what the Church is crying out for, what every Christian heart craves. How often it is misunderstood. The power is already there secured for us. The Apostle prays for those who have received these redemption gifts, and have been sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, and he offers for them this remarkable prayer, "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him." This blessed stream of the Holy Ghost is for ever proceeding from the Father and the Son; there is no finality in this work. It is not like Christ's work—a finished work. And observe there is no expression in Scripture which limits the power of the outgoing of the Holy Ghost. There is no word to say that the Spirit of God has come, and therefore the door may be shut because there is no more Spirit of God to come. We may be ever receiving, ever expending, and ever expecting, at the same time. I trust we are evermore opening our hearts to receive further and further gifts and provisions—great waves of Holy Ghost power, truth, and love.

What, then, is the limit ascribed in this passage to the work of the Holy Ghost upon the believer? It is a very important question. The Apostle prays that the eyes of their understanding may be enlightened. Why, they were already enlightened; yet their eyes had to be opened afresh that they might know what was the hope of their calling in Christ Jesus. This is the wealth of the Christian, the hope of the calling in Christ Jesus; the hope of his coming in glory very soon, perhaps at one of these very conventions. They are the heralds of the coming of Jesus, and the proofs that the Bride is trimming her lamp, and preparing her garments for the meeting with her Lord. Then there is the wealth of Christ, as we were told yesterday—"the riches of the glory of his inheritance in us." Do you know that God looks upon you as priceless? You are his possession; may He not spend and use you, and command you, and give you away, and take you to Himself? Shall He not do what He will with his own?

Now we come to the spending money of the Church—"the exceeding greatness of his power"—or, as it is in the original, for the variety of words, "the surpassing magnitude of his power, according to the energy of the strength of his might." What an accumulation of words is here, to express the infinite and inexpressible power of God the Holy Ghost in the risen Christ. Here is the limit—"which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead." And this power is "to us-ward who believe." Is that not power enough? It is hidden or stored up in Christ for us, that the self-same power which raised Him from the dead may raise us from the death of sin into the life of righteousness, until every sin is subdued under the heel of Jesus. This is the crucial question of all—are we under the feet of Jesus?

If you want further explanation of the limit or extent of this power, trace out the "alls" in chapter i. There are there ten "alls," showing the supreme sovereignty which is Christ's. And it is all for the Church—"gave Him to be head over all things for the Church." The last verse brings out that fulness in its fullest expression—"which is his body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all."

What is the third heavenly place? "Hath raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." This is

THE PLACE OF REST.

It is always a blessed word, this word "rest." Here we have it indeed; after being crucified together, and buried together, and quickened together, and raised together, and ascended together, now we are "seated together." And from that point we work together in the glorious work of redeeming our fellow sinners. There is an important lesson here. The Christian greatly needs rest. There is great activity in the Church to-day—thank God, in every portion of the living Church. There is a going forth both at home and abroad such as the world has never seen before; a going forth of the Word of God, in the clearness and power of the Holy Ghost, hitherto unknown. In the midst of it all we have to emphasise the need of rest; and that we may know that the Church has entered into her Canaan, Christ Jesus her Lord. She has the calm of God about her; the rest which He hath won. Do we know this rest? Do we know the rest of coming? "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." The rest of taking? "Take my yoke upon you, and ye shall find rest unto your souls." The rest of entering on your portion in Christ? "We which believe do enter into rest." This is better than all the others. We come to Jesus, but we may leave him again. We take his yoke, but we may break down under it. But when we pass into Jesus we enter our promised land, and He undertakes all. We cast our burdens on Him, and He carries us and the burdens too. Wonderful rest. It is the power of the Christian ministry, and the power which makes the Word of God come home to souls.

We were created for rest. Adam and Eve were introduced into it the first day of their lives. It was on the Sabbath day that they opened their eyes. And God intends that we should ever live in one perpetual Sabbath. There is no word to say, "The evening and the morning were the seventh day." The Jew worked up to his Sabbath; but do you always remember that the Christian works down from his Sabbath. His Sabbath is the first day, and he goes down with the rest of the Sabbath of God into the work of the week. This is God's wondrous intention for New Testament Christians. Are you working from rest and in rest? The name of Noah, who built the ark, means rest. Solomon was a man of rest, as his father David was a man of war. It is only in rest that the temple of the Lord can be built. That is why so many Christians fail in being able to build up the Church, because they are not men of rest—men who bear about the consecration of the Lord into the common every-day things of life.

Remember, too, that this rest does not mean idleness. We have said so over and over again, and here it is explained, "Seated together with Him, that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us." The words are so remarkable—such a climbing of Alpine heights, such a marvellous divine accumulation of words, as though God himself could not express himself. "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works" (verse 10). Think of it—seated in the heavenly places, and created unto good works. Oh, for the good works of the Church; let us remember our prayer, "Stir up the hearts of thy faithful people, that they, plenteously bringing forth the fruit of good works, may hereafter be plenteously rewarded." This, I say, is the spending money of the Church; let us spend it freely, and bring in the sheaves to the Master. There must be a showing forth of what the powers of God are and of what his grace hath succeeded in doing.

THE PLACE OF MANIFESTATION.

I pass on to the fourth heavenly place. "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the Church the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10). Now it is manifestation. Who is to manifest this wondrous Lord and his wonderful redemption? Let us see in verse 8—oh, that we might read it every day in the week and every week in the year!—"Unto me who am less than the least of all saints is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ." Perhaps you have said that you are the least; but that will not do. You must be "less than the least." You say you have no power of position, or of reputation, or of gifts. You can have this gift at any rate—are you "less than the least"? God's work does not want height; it wants depth and lowliness. Is it not a great temptation to us ministers to think we are something more than "less than the least"—something above the common, as we say?

You say that Paul was an Apostle. Yes, indeed; and he was a very clever man, with all the gifts and graces of his time. There was none before him in intellectual powers, and yet he became a fool for Christ's sake. It is not your men without intellect who are to become fools, but the men who have intellect; they are to be less than the least for Christ's sake.

What, then, is the Church to do to-day, in her manifestation? "To make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery," or, in our English way, "What is the mystery of the fellowship" (verse 9). We are making the world and the Church see it through these conventions: there has been a marvellous growth of it even in my time. One would think, however, from what we see in some quarters, that God had written it down, and that we are to make men see what is the mystery of the separation, not the fellowship. It is almost inconceivable that the "holy communion" itself is sometimes made a source of division and separation. Yet so it is to-day in many a heathen field; there are those who follow missionaries and try to bring in the spirit of division and separation. Oh, shall we not all help to manifest this wonderful fellowship of the mystery, hidden so long, so that all men may see it to the glory of God.

"Unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places." We little thought who were looking. Have you considered that there are angelic beings around us and spiritual hosts close beside us? To these we are to make known the manifold wisdom of the living God.

What else is there to manifest? Paul stops his letter to introduce a prayer, "For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father . . . that ye may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge." It is something we cannot know, but for that love. I believe, after all, that love is the best test of the ripeness of the saints. It is not command of the Scripture, or of argumentative power, or the doing of great works for the Master; this height of all heights in Christian decoration is the very spirit of love itself; and to make men see the love of Christ. I pass briefly to the closing heavenly place—chap. vi. 12.

THE PLACE OF VICTORY.

Just what you would expect: "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and against powers." There are principalities and powers of evil. There is the flesh, of course, and there is plenty of that; but there are spiritual wickednesses in heavenly places which we have to fight and to overcome. Oh, what a scene it is! We little know here, on "the isthmus of this narrow state, of beings darkly wise and rudely great." We little know what is around us, and the conflict that is going on, on "this narrow isthmus" of time, in the body, the conscience, and the soul of man. Is it possible there can be victory over principalities and powers in heavenly places? As we course our way up to heaven, is it possible that we can pass through those dark, dread ranks? Yes; there is the god of this world to be dealt with, and his hosts. What is this heavenly place of victory to the Church? Why, it is this—that every believing soul must be wrapped round with God from head to foot. "Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God." That means that you are to be wrapped round in God and hidden completely. Any portion of self which stands exposed is an opportunity for the enemy, and will certainly be a vantage ground for his triumph. Though we are redeemed of the Lord and seated in the heavenly places, we must be armed to the teeth. We must take the whole armour of God if we are to withstand in the evil day and to stand. "To stand"!! But you say you thought you were to go out and fight. Nay, you are to stand. Christ has put you in the forefront of the battle. That is where He stood Himself and won. He places you there; you cannot go further, but you may go back. Stand! It is the mark of the British soldier that he can stand in battle better than any other soldier in the world. Let it be a mark of the Christian that he can stand in the forefront, where Christ has placed him, on redeemed ground, and in the power of the Holy Ghost.

Stand, therefore, being girt round with every piece of truth and grace, and all that wondrous preparation mentioned here. Even your feet are to be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; wherever you go you are to bring rest. "Above all taking the shield of faith." So many people leave that out; but the Apostle emphasises it. It is Jesus Himself who is to receive every hissing arrow of the enemy, every fiery dart, on the blood-stained shield—even our Jesus. "Take the helmet of salvation, the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God." Now, you say, we shall go out to fight. Nay, nay; you have made a great mistake, soldiers of the living God; it is not time yet. This is the secret of failure. What are you to do? You are to go down on your knees: "praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints, and for me that utterance may be given." Armed to the teeth with all prayer, not for yourself alone, but for all the Church of God, that you and they may conquer as an exceeding great army.

This is a brief outline of the heavenly places of the Epistle to the Ephesians. May God teach us something of these blessed truths.

Oh! there are heavenly heights to reach
In many a secret place,
Where the poor tempted child of God
Lies blindly on his face;
Lies languishing for love divine,
Which he can never see,
Till he goes forward at thy sign,
And trusts himself to Thee.

AN OLD PSALM IN A NEW LIGHT.

BY DR ELDER CUMMING.

Forgive my boldness in seeking to offer you a fresh reading of the twenty-third Psalm in the light of consecration. There are three difficulties in the exposition, one of them quite a serious one. First of all, what are we to understand by walking through the valley of the shadow of death? Does it mean my death, and that I should be comforted in going through it? In the next verse, you will observe, I am represented as alive; so it cannot be my death. Is it the valley of bereavement, where I lose my dearest? If so, then the blessing referred to in the Psalm is not to the chief sufferer who passes through the valley, but to the sufferer's companion. That is one great difficulty in expounding the Psalm.

Secondly, you have in the second and third verses two leadings. No doubt the original words are slightly different, but they are both leadings. Wherein do they differ? and how do they differ so much as in this Psalm to have a double expression? Then, though it does not appear in the English, there has always been to expositors a difficulty in the Psalm with regard to the time expressed by the various verbs. The time is for the most part present time; but our translators have been obliged, in the verse to which I referred—the fourth—to give it a future signification. Then they felt themselves obliged to give the same future signification to the last verse of the Psalm; whereas we are told that all the verses should have, in respect of time, the same meaning—either all present or all future. These are difficulties well known to those who study the Psalm.

But it occurred to me some little time ago to look at the Psalm in the light of consecration; and I found to my surprise and thankfulness that the difficulties all vanish; and they seem to fit in in such a way that the meaning is most clear and beautiful. Let me submit to you this reading of the Psalm, which, may I say, has been to my own soul a matter of great comfort and joy.

CONSECRATION IMPLIED.

I take it that the Psalm implies that consecration has taken place already. One must read the first verse, "The Lord is my Shepherd," as if the writer were remembering the Lord Jesus Christ's own declaration, "I am the Good Shepherd." It is as if he knows the Good Shepherd gave his life for the sheep, and he says, "I take as mine own the Good Shepherd, who gave his life for me. I have been at his cross, and I know what it is to be forgiven. He is my Saviour." Shepherd is something more than deliverer from death; and therefore, as I remember the very first words of the Psalm, I find they are the words of the consecrated soul who rejoices both in the Saviour who died and in the Shepherd who keeps. "The Lord is my Shepherd." Only the consecrated soul can say that.

Then, what comes first, alike in the Psalm and in the consecrated life? The awful and blessed experiences that seem to lift up the soul altogether beyond itself and beyond the earthly life. You have, first of all, "I shall not want." Now, there the future tense has been inserted. I take out the future tense, and put it in the present tense, as with all the other verbs: "I do not want." Because the Lord is my Shepherd I am satisfied. It is the satisfaction of the soul that has found all in Christ. It is the first experience of understanding Christ in a new aspect, saying, "There is nothing that I need or that I desire that is not in Christ." "All things are yours, for ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

Go on to the next verse, "He leadeth me into the green pastures." That is a matter of food. What is the food of the consecrated soul? First, God's Word; second, Christ Himself. But then these pastures are fresh; they are green, and they never were so before. They were dry and withered as the grass after three months of hot summer weather without rain. Now the rain has come; now the Bible is a new book. The dew is on the pasture. "I will be as the dew unto Israel." My Bible is fresh from the moment I can say I am satisfied with Christ the Lord.

"He maketh me to lie down beside the still waters," the waters of rest. Here is, first, the most gentle leading in difficulty and opposition. Here is the experience of perfect peace. "Thou wilt keep him"—oh Shepherd of Israel—"in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee." Then, as the poet (Wordsworth) of whom we are continually reminded here tells us, in words that must have been occurring to the memories of many:—

The Youth, who daily farther from the east
Must travel, still is Nature's priest,
And by the vision splendid
Is on his way attended;
At length the Man perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day.

So there comes the time sooner or later to the life that begins in an unusual glow of gladness, when the light seems to pass away, and there comes the question in the heart of him who is living the blessed life: "Am I to lose the wonderful things that I have already? Am I really going back? Is there to be no such blessing afterwards?" Meantime it is a cause of great perplexity, when we have lost the early glow, and we know not what is going to succeed it. What follows in the Psalm? "He restoreth my soul"—the bringing back of the soul. Every consecrated soul has had to revise all the arrangements of its life; to go back upon all its plans, and say to itself, "How will my old habits fit in with this new life which has come to me? I have to change my business sometimes, or the way of carrying it on; to re-arrange my household; even to make changes in my friendships. My scheme and plan of life have to be considerably altered. I have been going on my own plans. Now God has to bring back my soul and point the way. I have to begin life, so to speak, over again.

"He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness." This is not the leading beside the waters of rest; there it is simply to lie down. But this is a matter of walking, of progress. And they are to be the paths of righteousness; not what I think righteousness, but what God thinks righteousness. Christ is to lead me now. "He goeth before his own sheep, and they follow him." Blessed be his name, He Himself hath gone through every part of the journey He asks me to go through. I can see the blood-marks of his own precious feet on the very stones of the way He asks me to take. So long as I follow Him in that way I shall walk in the paths of righteousness. Observe, it is, "for his name's sake." It is all for the glory of the Lord. That is a totally new thought in the consecrated life. There are Christians who have been living for ten years together without having one real thought and purpose to the glory of God. As soon as we get into the blessed life, with Christ Himself leading us, He makes the thought of the glory of God the chief thought, as it ought to be.

Now we come to the great crisis in the consecrated life. "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I fear none evil"—present tense—"for Thou art with me." What place is this? First of all it is a place of great darkness. It is quite unexpected. The soul says: "I did not look for this. I thought that when I entered the life of consecration it was going to be all sunshine." So the soul is not prepared for the trial and the difficulty and the darkness. It is a great part of the trial that it is dark; we do not understand it. We search for reasons, but we know nothing and see nothing. But there are the darkness of distance, and the darkness of impediment—something that comes between us and the Lord. The darkness of distance is a reason why we cannot see with the eye some stars that are visible to the telescope. The darkness of shadow or impediment leaves the light as near us as before. This darkness spoken of in the Psalm is the darkness of the shadow; and the light of our Sun, Christ Himself, is not a bit further off. Something has come in between that hides his presence. It is a valley of deep humiliation; all comfort in self is quite taken away; we are stripped bare. First the fruit, then the leaves, then the small twigs go; then it seems as if the very covering of the stem goes, like a tree blasted by the lightning, and we stand bare and alone. It is the valley of death. What is death? It is separation in pangs; not a joyful separation or an easy separation, but a separation which, when taking place, seems to sever soul and spirit; and it does indeed sever them. Separation from what? From the world, utterly; from joy for the time, utterly; and still more from self. This crisis in the blessed life is death to self, and it must more or less be passed through, at one time or another, by every soul that knows what the blessed life is. God must sever the souls of his people from sin; there must be the cleansing if there is to be the life of holiness; and that cleansing, I am confident, cannot be without pain, without pangs and darkness, without almost agony; in some cases it is, as it were, a véritable, visible death. It is worse than physical death, this separation from self; but God's purpose is that there shall be something better than self. That I believe to be the meaning of this crisis that the Psalmist speaks of.

But what then? First of all, there is no fear. "I will fear"—I do fear—"none evil." There is trembling, but not fear. As my dear old friend "Old Margaret" said, almost in the agonies of bodily dissolution, "Father, Father, it is sore, sore; but I'm not a bit afraid." What more than the absence of fear? The presence of the Lord. How do I know that the Lord is present? It is all dark, and I cannot see Him. I have no comfort—but I have God. How do I know? He touches me. Do you know the touch of Christ in your sorrow, in your despair, in the death that seems to be the end of all? Oh! that healing and soothing touch, better than balm for the soul. I know He is there, not only by his touch, but by his voice; the whisper of the Lord, yea the secret of the Lord, is with them that suffer for Him, as well as with them that fear Him.

"His rod and his staff." The rod for defence; I know it is in his hand not far off. His staff for guidance and comfort. His presence is enough. It is a dark and miserable time of desolation, but God is with me. And the most blessed time in the blessed life is perhaps the hour in which

SELF IS CONSCIOUSLY PUT TO DEATH.

After the crisis, the Psalm goes on, "Thou preparest a table before me." What is that? I know there are two very remarkable things that take place in the Psalm immediately after this crisis of the soul. First of all the song changes into a prayer. It is no longer, "The Lord is my Shepherd;" it is "Thou art." I stop speaking about God and I begin to speak to God. The change has been made in the valley. I have come for the first time to find God so near me that in all trouble and difficulty, at every turn, I have God.

But there is another change. The image of the Psalm is dropped and never resumed again. It is no longer a question of a sheep and a shepherd; it immediately becomes a question of a child and a father. How do I know? A sheep does not sit at a table; it does not drink from a cup; it has not an anointed head. So all through the Psalm afterwards the image of the sheep has gone, and the reality of the child has come. In our early reading of the Scriptures I fancy we are very fond of images and illustrations, and the beauty of outward things; but when we get a little further on, and a little further down, and come to deal with the great realities of life, God is the chief reality of all.

What does the soul say immediately afterwards? "Thou preparest a table." The darkness is gone, and the soul is able to see all round, and the first thing it sees is God preparing a table. "Thou preparest"; it is not left to a servant. What is on the table? Not a word is said; and why? Because we can trust God about that. When your friend has invited you to his home to dinner you do not say, "Tell me what you are going to put on the table." You can trust him to give all that is needed. Cannot you trust God for all?

"In the presence of mine enemies: Thou anointest my head with oil." What does that mean? It is not the anointing of the guest at a feast. My Father is not going to treat me as a guest in his house. But, you say, it may mean the anointing of the believer as king and priest. Nay, that happens only once; here we have a perpetual table and a perpetual anointing. It means, then, that the Spirit of God could not allow the Psalmist to proceed with his description of the blessed life without showing that there is to be the anointing of the Holy Spirit. As really and truly as the spreading of the table day by day is the anointing with fresh oil.

"My cup runneth over." Does that mean that there is a careless servant, who, in pouring out the wine, pours too much, and it flows over? No such thing. "God is the portion of my cup." Do you think my cup could hold God? Because He is the portion of my cup, of course it must run over. That is the sort of provision my Father makes for me as I go on.

THE CHRISTIAN'S TWO ATTENDANTS.

"Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me" nay they are following me, "all the days of my life." My Father, who is so rich and has so many servants, has given me two. One is Goodness, that stands on one side. He carries a bag, and in that bag is all that I need. Mercy is my attendant on the other side, and Mercy carries a book, and it is always at hand. So I never need to go to God and say, "O God, provide for my table to-day; give me strength to-day." I do not need to say, "O Lord, have mercy on me to-day." I know that He is going to do it, and I present my prayer in confidence. Lord, I know Thou art going to feed me and uphold me, and continue thy mercy to me.

"All the days of my life." It is not in heaven that all these wonderful things are done. Though I am sitting at my Father's table, attended by his angels, fed in this way, and anointed, I am not in heaven. I am in heaven on earth—in the heavenly places. "I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever." "Now, of course, your theory breaks down," perhaps you say; "you must put a future sense on the 'for ever.'" Nay, nay; I am dwelling in the house of the Lord. But what about death? Do you know what death is? It is a part of my Father's house. It is what I may call a lobby, or a corridor—a dark corridor. I am living in my Father's house to-day; though I must make the confession that I am only living in the nursery; I am but a child yet in my Father's house. But I have my attendants here; Goodness and Mercy are constantly looking after me by day and by night. The time will come when a knock will be heard at the nursery door, and the message will be: "The Master wants his little son"; and the messenger will take the little son by the hand, and they will go together through the dark corridor; but all the time I will be saying to myself: "The Father's house; the Father's house." We shall only have to walk through the lobby; then we will come to the other door, and into the great room where the family have met, to leave it no more.

I will presume that this is the verandah outside the nursery. The dark corridor will be, I do not know where, and I do not know how soon I may have to pass through it. But I know my Father will send for me, or, what will be better still, He will come for me. In the lobby that looks so dark I will hear the voice that I know so well. "His sheep know his voice, and He calleth his own sheep by name." I will go to meet Him—whether it be dark or whether his own face will light it up, till it becomes the brightest way in all that part of the house. And He will receive me unto himself. I dwell, and I will dwell, in the house of the Lord for ever. Thank God; thank God again.

FAITH AND FAITHFULNESS.

BY PREBENDARY WEBB-PEPLOE.

May I read a few verses out of Galatians iii.? "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham" (ver. 6 and 7). It is to this last verse that I would specially call your attention. I have chosen these words because they bring into such direct and special contrast the two ideas of faith and faithfulness—terms which are confounded sadly by Christians, and from which, therefore, they fail to obtain the real instruction that God would offer to their souls. We speak of a man who has faith as if he were faithful. Unquestionably the one is to be the result of the other, but if we confound them for a moment we lose the deep instruction that God has designed by the two. That they spring from the same root is, of course, known to all who are acquainted with the Greek language; but that they are intended to be one is manifestly wrong, when we think of them as applicable to our God and Father. We can speak of God as faithful, but it is impossible to speak of Him as having faith. How could God have faith in anything but Himself, as the source of all? But that He is faithful is the great joy of the soul of the creature; on that we depend for every blessing.

So when we turn from the Maker to think of the creature we are led to realise that there must be a distinction between the two. When you speak of faith you speak of the capacity or receptivity with which God has endowed every man, and for which we are responsible as the prerogative or power entrusted specially to man. By faith we take whatever God will give; but by faithfulness we understand the power by which we are enabled to offer up to God, exactly whatever He may ask from us. The consecrated life is one that springs from faith having done its part, so that a man receives into his soul whatever God has offered, in the provision which the Almighty has made for him in Christ Jesus. But as he steps away from the place where God blessed him, he is conscious that through faith he is now to drink in and enjoy and make use of, first for his own enjoyment and edification, whatever God has offered; so the very next moment he should apprehend that he is to exhibit faithfulness. Whatever God may be pleased to ask from him he from the depths of a faithful soul is to offer back again to his Maker out of gratitude for God's love. This is the true consecration.

GIVING WHATEVER GOD WILL TAKE—

Now Abraham is put before us here as a special example of a man who, having faith, was led to be faithful; and, being faithful, he day by day took in from God all the capacity he had for service, all the enjoyment he had of God's gifts, and the power he had whereby to glorify God; and all his life was to exhibit his faith by actions of faithfulness. In the same way, unquestionably, when we leave these consecrated meetings our lives are to show forth in act what we heard by the hearing of the ear. Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God. And the seed that is planted, through faith, deeply in the soul, is to spring up and bear fruit to the glory of God. That will be an exhibition of our faithfulness. It will be and our faith will be simply in proportion to the soul's hearing of God's holy Word. To God's Word, therefore, in these assemblies we always turn you. We are not here before you to speak words of human wisdom, but only to press in God's truth upon your souls.

I would now wish to show, by the Spirit's teaching, how faith leads to faithfulness, and how unfaithfulness comes the very moment there is a lack of faith. Let there be but a sheet of paper between the currents that are running in an electrical machine, and immediately all force has ceased. Let there be the very slightest obstruction in your spiritual life—one single sheet of paper of the thinnest possible character—between your soul and God, from that moment the current of faith has ceased to work; instantly your faithfulness will cease, and you will become an unfaithful servant. God is demanding faithfulness from us while He blesses us with the gifts of faith.

If Abraham be a special example, let us consider him for a moment. You remember how God first called him; how he listened to the word of God, and obeyed. You see the grand action of faith working in his soul; the readiness to obey, leading his steps out from the dark land of heathendom into the land of blessing and privilege. Having attended

A CONSECRATION MEETING WITH GOD,

Abraham was thereafter to live out the life of faith. People expect that by one act of consecration they are brought into a sphere in which there is no possibility of slipping back. Abraham passes on into the land where there are secured to him privileges and blessings almost beyond conception. Blessed with wealth—a provision corresponding to our everlasting provision in Christ—Abraham is rich, strong, and blessed while at rest in the land. Then there comes a famine, which we may take as being analogous to that dark valley of the shadow of death of which Dr. Cumming has told us. The famine is a testing time of the man's enjoyment of the land. God ushers him into the land and the moment he will go into the land he is meant to have unbounded privileges and blessings. But the faith of the man will be tested in the land. Abraham, alas! fails directly, in having recourse to the flesh. He passes into Egypt to find provision for his needs. In Egypt there is no altar to God; no life of communion with his Father. Then it is that the lie is carried out, and dishonour brought upon his Master's name. Then Hagar is found and brought away as a slave, when Abraham and Sarah leave Egypt. Hagar is to become the very bane of their life, because they have descended to the life of the flesh, and have brought back, as a slave they say, but as a member of their household, one who had no place whatever in the family of God's chosen ones.

THE CONSEQUENCES ARE EXCEEDING DIRE.

We may say that we have received the land in this convention—that we have entered into our Canaan, and God has made marvellous provision for us; as surely as we have received blessing there will come a testing time to our faith when we have claimed the land. God always tests the faith by which men profess to belong to Him and to trust Him. If we have claimed the great treasures that God offers in Christ Jesus, almost immediately something will arise, like a famine, to test our faith. We seem now to be rich, and we are rich, unsearchably rich in the Lord Jesus Christ; but as God put Abraham's faith to the test by a famine, now, after this holy assembly, we shall be met by some difficulty or trial that will come right home to us and seem to stagger our faith. Woe betide us if we go down into Egypt, and, without any life of true communion with God, without any power before men to witness for God's truth, begin again to live the life of the flesh, and to trust in that, as Abraham did.

He goes back to the land, and is restored entirely to the favour of God; an altar is again erected, and now God tests him in a remarkable way. Trouble comes to Lot in Sodom, and he is carried into captivity. Abraham arises in the strength of faith, and, with 318 servants only, he brings deliverance to one whom he loves. After this deliverance Abraham has learned a lesson with regard to the land so blessedly, and would God that we may learn it too. When they offer to him to take whatever he likes of the stores he has regained by his power, he says: "I will not take from a thread even to a shoe latchet." Would that in regard to dealing with the world and its wealth, and in regard to our contact with men, we learnt the lesson. Then there comes

ANOTHER STAGE IN THE TESTING.

Abraham was to have the land, but he was never personally to enjoy the full possession of it. There comes the promise that there shall be seed. God wants his people to have many children in the spiritual kingdom as Abraham was to have in the bodily department. And as God tests his servant's faith in regard to the matter of the land, so must He test his faith in regard to seed. We have the promise given in Gen. xv., and for the first time, as we have read in Gal. iii. Abraham's faith is counted to him for righteousness. Righteousness is always connected with the seed. God says to him: "Thy seed shall be as the sand of the sea." Abraham believed, and, says the Apostle, "it was counted to him for righteousness." There was no righteousness counted to him for believing about the land. He was a barren and an aged man; and his wife was an aged woman, and they had no family. God must test his faith again. The time of famine comes again, as you would call it—the long, weary waiting, with continued barrenness, and no sign of any possibility of the promise being fulfilled. Abraham had taken Sarah into Egypt in the hour of his weakness; and now Sarah takes Abraham into Egypt in the hour of her weakness. She says, "Behold the Egyptian; she shall be a mother of children." Exactly as Abraham's faith failed under the temptation of the famine, and he went down to the fleshpots of Egypt for provision, so now in the hour of his weary waiting and barrenness, an Egyptian

TEMPTATION AGAIN OVERCOMES HIM.

He takes the woman to be his wife, who ought never to have been in his home. Exactly as you would expect, she begins to taunt her mistress and to scorn the woman who professes faith. The child is born and becomes a burden in the home; Abraham the man of faith is put to shame in his own house, and he has to let the woman be driven out into the wilderness, with the conviction that it is wrong.

Everything would seem to be getting darker with him until the Lord steps in once more and restores his servant. Then there comes that blessed word of forgiveness and peace, and promise of the child to be born by whom his seed should be a blessing to the nations. The son is to be born entirely and only of faith; Isaac can never be brought into this world except simply and absolutely through faith. So with our Christian life; all is of faith. But faith is not enough. God tests us with regard to the land and the personal enjoyment of what He has for us; and also as to that by which we shall become a blessing to the nations. We may have been waiting many years looking for fruit in our Bible-class, our congregation, our home life, or our daily business. Some of us have waited, God knows how long, and we have been often sorely tempted to descend, like Abraham, to fleshly means.

THIS IS WHY MEN INTRODUCE RITUAL

into their churches, musical performances and other things that simply tickle the ears of those to whom they preach. Wherever there is this descending to the methods of the flesh, God visits it by bringing sad trouble into the home or the church. Let us first get back to the land, that we may raise our altars to God. Secondly, let us possess a calm and peaceful trust in God, that in his own time the seed of faith shall surely be born. Then let us hear the voice of God saying that where there is faith there must surely be faithfulness. God has given to us the blessing of the land in its fulness—or He is going to give, for his promise is the same as his deed of gift. Shall we not dare also to expect that his promise as to the seed shall be fulfilled? Then our faith should lead us on to faithfulness. For now comes the testing. After all that we have received the question now comes, "What return shall we make?" It is blessed to talk of faith, to gather in these assemblies and think of the sweetness of being linked to Christ; but what is it all if it leads not on to faithfulness? God's faithfulness is seen in this, that he is always giving. We Christians are thinking too much of what we can get. Let us begin to think of giving to God what He would take back. God asks of Abraham the resignation of what is most precious to him, and Abraham says, "Let Him take what He will; I will have the rest." He is called on to give the Isaac of his soul, the child of promise, to be sacrificed upon the altar. And God is asking of us to-day whether we will exhibit a like faithfulness. So they that be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham, when they give back to God whatever God may deign to ask of them.

I wanted to elaborate the truth with respect to the connecting link between the two, but time forbids. Faith takes in what God bestows on the creature; the creature turns round and commits himself.

THAT IS TRUST.

He puts all he is and all he has into the hand of the Lord and trusts. Why does he trust? It all depends on what we have learnt to know of God Himself, whether we can trust and then begin to be faithful. We shall never be manifold stewards of the grace of God until we have learned by grace what it is to trust God for Himself. How do we trust God? I fear a great many of us trust Him as I trust a pickpocket—just as far as I can see him, and as long as I can keep his hand out of my pocket. We trust God when we are well; when we have got a good round balance at our banker's; when our family are in perfect health; when a comfortable provision is made for the holidays, and we have got a first-class return ticket. We trusted our Father's provision for Keswick, when we had six weeks ago secured our lodgings, and were certain nobody else could take them. That is a fine sort of trust, is it not? yet it is what we are doing every day. What we want is to learn the trust which comes from trusting God's character, so that we know He cannot fail. I have learned to trust my God lately more and more because of what I see of his works. Creation is full of the magnificence of God's power and glory, and that leads me to think much of God. But I go further, and look at Christ Jesus, and there I see the revelation of God's great love, and I cannot but trust Him. Thus, having learned to know God, to know his character, and his inner being and nature, it is for one instant. I can look up to him like Job and say, "Though He slay me, yet do I trust Him," changing the future into the present tense. I look at one of you and see you do an honest act, and I say, "That man must be honest, because of the remarkable honesty with which he acted." I am judging character by conduct. But let me get to know you for twenty years as I thank God I know my wife. I trust in my wife, not because she does honest acts, but because I have learned to know her character. I dare not doubt her honesty for an instant; I know her to be honest, so I am convinced she will do honest acts. Apply that to God and it becomes trust. The Word of God comes to you and you drink in what He gives you. Then comes some act of his providence that staggers your faith. He takes your child, perhaps; you cannot understand it, and you no longer believe that He is love. My dear friend, how dare you do it? The God who is love; the God whose character you have known, is the God whom you are called to trust, and to leave his conduct to explain itself. If He says, "Now give Me your Isaac," you say, "My God, I know Thou art right; I can trust Thee, because I have learned to know Thee."

IMPOSSIBLE FOR ME TO DOUBT HIM

So faithfulness comes into action; it is just giving to God whatever He would take. Will He take my child? Ah! it means so much. But let Him do what seemeth Him good. A dear brother said to me yesterday: "After your words about Ezekiel I am terrified that God will take my wife." I cannot tell what God may take; but I know that if I would be faithful. If I would be of the seed of Abraham, the father of the faithful, I am to carry the knife, and to carry the wood for the fire, and to walk up the hill hand-in-hand with my dear one, and I am to say: "It is the Lord; let Him do what seemeth Him good." Faith when it is begun bringeth out trust, and trust when it is finished brings out faithfulness. Then you are worthy to be of the seed of Abraham, who saw the day of Jesus Christ, and was glad with the very gladness of God.

The Missionary Meetings.

THE KESWICK MISSION.

NOTHING has been more patent to the close observer at those blessed and momentous gatherings of last week than the strong indication of a steadily growing interest at Keswick in the work of foreign missions. The conference of students on the previous days, whose main theme was missions, no doubt contributed to this. However it has come about, it is certainly one of the most delightful and gratifying features of this truly remarkable annual event, and it carries with it the promise and potency of still greater blessing to the world at large from the Keswick gatherings.

The afternoon of the Wednesday is now regularly set apart for hearing of the doings of the "Keswick Mission" proper, which has sprung from the Convention, and seems destined to do noble service throughout the world, not only in dispatching approved individual workers for resident service in far-off fields, but in sending deputations for more or less limited periods of Gospel work, or for testimony and teaching as to the fully-consecrated life. Last year the interest of the Keswick Mission meeting focussed itself around Mr. G. C. Grubb and his party, and the memorable address which he delivered. That peculiar interest was lacking on the present occasion, but the addresses of Mr. Brooke and Mr. Macgregor on their visit to Canada were of a deeply encouraging kind.

Mr. ROBERT WILSON, having quoted the Saviour's "marching orders," read a report of the doings of the Keswick Mission since last year. Reference was first made to the sending out of Messrs. Brooke, Inwood, and Macgregor to Canada, where the Lord had greatly blessed their testimony. A mission to South America by Rev. G. C. Grubb (who is accompanied by Mr. Millard and Mr. Bidlake) is now going on in South America. Early in March Miss Amy Wilson Carmichael left England as a Keswick missionary to join Rev. Barclay Buxton's mission at Watsuye, Japan, where she received a hearty welcome. In the course of her outward journey she experienced, in difficult circumstances sometimes, much of the Lord's presence and preserving care. A cordial invitation comes from Mr. Buxton asking more Keswick missionaries to join him in that large and promising field. It is expected that during the coming autumn Miss Ruth Brooke will go to China, having been accepted as a missionary, but prevented by indisposition from going last year. The Committee have other offers under consideration, but they are not yet in a position to be reported on.

It has been laid upon many hearts to ask God's guidance as to the visitation by deputations from Keswick of various mission stations throughout the world for the encouragement of the often-tired labourers in the Master's vineyard. Prayer is desired that the Spirit may Himself point out those whom He would send forth for this service.

It was stated that in order that missionaries might share in the blessing given at these Convention gatherings, some friends have contributed to the expense of bringing to this year's meetings missionaries returned for rest or those about to proceed to the foreign fields. If this fund is insufficient the Committee purpose giving some help towards such a desirable object from the funds of the Keswick Mission. To carry on and extend the various projects in hand considerable expenditure will be incurred, and it is felt desirable to have a good working balance in hand.

As to matters financial, Mr. Wilson reported that during the past eighteen months £1188 15s. 11d. were contributed to the mission exchequer, besides £600 odd subscribed for other missions. The expenditure on behalf of the Keswick Mission during the same period, including missions and workers to Australia and New Zealand, Palestine, Ceylon, Paris, Japan, South America and Canada, and a Welsh Convention, was £1493 7s. 9d. There is a balance in hand of £1828 9s. 10d.; but some portions of that are sums contributed for specific purposes, and which will be so applied.

An extremely pathetic letter from Miss Wilson Carmichael (the Chairman's adopted daughter) dated Watsuye, Japan, June 1, was read by Mr. Wilson. After a request for earnest and continued prayer for the work, she described the sound that had been falling on her ears as she wrote—the striking of a gong by a worshipper in a temple near by in praise of the demon god. The writer wished that the echo of that mournful sound might reach the Keswick tent, and go deep down into every heart, that more might be done to satisfy the yearnings and bless the lives of those who engage in this deluded worship.

Mr. Wilson having offered some touching words of earnest prayer for "his dear child," Miss Carmichael, an account was given by Mr. EUGENE STOCK of what he had seen in his recent travels at the Antipodes of the fruits of Mr. Grubb's visits there. It was altogether a joyful story, and was told with much zest as well as wisdom. He said he desired to speak with restraint and caution, because he had discovered that everything spoken at Keswick respecting Australia found its way into print in that country. Mr. Stock went on to tell of the remarkably cordial welcome that had been accorded to Mr. Grubb and his co-workers in quarters in Australia, where such a thing was not altogether expected. The missioner preached in seven or eight cathedrals at the invitation of the bishops, and in many important churches besides. One bishop went go far as to say, in an address to his clergy and lay workers, that he wished they would take Mr. Grubb as an example in their preaching. Another bishop, in reply to an inquiry as to Mr. Grubb's work in his district, said:—"I could criticise, but I dare not criticise. The man came here with a message direct from God, and our business was to hear it and obey it." While this was so, it was also true that the offence of the Cross has not ceased. The lukewarm Christians in all denominations greatly objected to two things that Mr. Grubb taught — a present salvation, and separation from the ways and maxims of the world. On the other hand, some who had been prominent in worldly pursuits, such as ladies who were champion tennis-players, were brought so thoroughly into the fulness of consecration that they gave up these healthful but engrossing recreations that they might the more devote themselves to the service of their Lord. Some of the converts who had got no sympathy and instruction in the spiritual life from their regular pastors after Mr. Grubb's departure were found by Mr. Stock and his companion in travel (Rev. R. Stewart, of Foochow) to be hungering and thirsting for further help and guidance in the life of holiness and the path of service. Mr. Stock said that he would not refer in any detail to what he and Mr. Stewart had been able to do, but he might say that their time was by no means all spent in seeing what God has accomplished through Mr. Grubb's party. Before they left the country twelve candidates for foreign missionary service had been accepted; that number was now increased to twenty or twenty-five, and about four times that number spoke with them on the subject. Every one of those definitely accepted for mission work had come under the influence of the Keswick Missioners. Mr. Hudson Taylor also had got a good haul of new workers for China. In addition to that, Mr. Stock had seen a list in Bombay of fifty Australians now working in India, mostly in connection with the Presbyterian, Wesleyan, and Baptist Missions; the two latter bodies are large in Australia, and very much alive. India is very much on Mr. Stock's heart. As he closed his interesting report, he exclaimed, "Oh, that half of those in this tent would go to India!"

He proceeded next to read extracts from letters lately received from South America, telling of God's working in Buenos Ayres and Rosario, in connection with Mr. Grubb's Mission, now being conducted there. Of course, there are difficulties and hindrances, but God is giving unmistakable fruit among both young and old. As the interest spreads, we doubt not the tide of blessing and of ingathering will rise. In a brief letter, dated Rosario, June 27, Mr. Grubb asked for the constant believing prayers of the Keswick friends.

THE CANADA DEPUTATION

As some report has already appeared in these pages of the interesting visits to our Canadian cousins by Messrs. Brooke, Macgregor, and Inwood, it will be unnecessary to recapitulate much from the addresses that followed from the two first-named of these brethren. Mr. Inwood was apparently unable to be at Keswick, though his name was in the list of expected speakers.

Rev. Hubert Brooke devoted a good part of his remarks to a summarised exposition of the truths they went to Canada to declare. He told how the invitation from Canada had come repeatedly, and circumstances this spring enabled the three brethren mentioned to go together. The choice of the three was very noteworthy, in view of the fact that in Canada there are many representatives of the three parts of the United Kingdom. He was an Englishman, Mr. Macgregor was a Scotchman, and Mr. Inwood an Irishman. To meet any possible prejudices as to denomination, it was also an interesting fact that while he was an Episcopalian, his Scotch brother was a Presbyterian, and his Irish confr re a Methodist. Still further, as showing the diversity of gifts, he might say that they were to pay attention to the three heads of the coloured preachers' discourse:—he was to do the "expounding," Mr. Macgregor was to see to the "argufying," and Mr. Inwood was to supply the "arousement." Touching briefly on the actual circumstances of their visit, Mr. Brooke said that they found a good deal of prejudice in different places as to their purposes, arising from the fact that in past times so-called "holiness teachers" in these parts had advocated and claimed sinlessness. Their first duty in each place, therefore, was to lay down their platform and disclaim all such unscriptural views. With the exception of one place (afterwards stated by Mr. Macgregor to be Hamilton, Ont.), they were permitted to see much interest awakened and many souls seeking consecration of heart and life. At the end of each series of meetings they presented the claims of the foreign field, as is done at Keswick. They found that one great hindrance to a deeper spiritual life was the prevalence of worldliness of spirit and methods in the churches. That was a crying evil, and it had to be resisted in Canada, and still more in the United States. There is a wide and open field across the Atlantic for the spread of such teaching as is made prominent at Keswick, and Mr. Brooke said he hoped much prayer would be made that three other brethren whom the Lord might indicate and send, might go to Canada next spring. The visit to Chicago was full of interest. Mr. Moody had told him that he would employ him for a whole year straight away, and he believed the same offer had been made to the other two brethren.

Rev. G. C. Macgregor, of Aberdeen, followed with a detailed account of the tour, from Northfield, which was first visited, on to Montreal, Toronto, Guelph, Hamilton, Chicago. In the last-named place some exceedingly interesting work was done among those attending Mr. Moody's Bible Institute. A special feature of the Toronto visit was a meeting of some 200 ministers, at which many were blessed. Mr. Macgregor said he had since received very gratifying letters from some of the ministerial brethren there. A brief visit was made to Lockport for rest before passing on to Chicago; there, however, they spoke in some of the churches. The speaker said he had a curious experience when conducting a service on the Sunday evening. The gas was accidentally turned out and they were left without any light; but they had a good after meeting in the dark and were enabled to deal with souls.

These very pleasing recitals about exhausted the time at command for the meeting, and the Rev. C. A. Fox only had a few moments in which to press home on the great audience their responsibility in sustaining these varied endeavours of the Keswick Mission by prayer, by gift, and by personal service. Shall we not make it clear (he said) that our hearts are determined in this great work; that in view of Christ's very near return we shall put our shoulders to the wheel, and rejoicingly go forward to do whatever can be done for the glory of our Lord.

SATURDAY'S MISSIONARY MEETING.

This was the last meeting of the Convention proper, and a worthy crown it was to a most memorable week. The great tent was crammed; and the platform was packed, on this occasion mostly with the missionaries who were to take a part in the proceedings. The meeting lasted three hours, and there was no sign of a flagging of interest from first to last. Mr. Robert Wilson was in his wonted place in the chair; but the conduct of the great part of the meeting devolved, as is customary, on Mr. Eugene Stock.

At the outset Mr. Stock intimated that it had become usual at these meetings for many friends present to give a thankoffering for blessing received, in the shape of a contribution to some missionary cause. No one of the speakers that would follow would indicate the society in connection with which they laboured, and none would appeal for money.

"To the Jew first" is still the motto in this meeting, and this year the chosen people had two representatives. Rev. John Wilkinson did not contribute any fresh facts as to the spread of the Gospel among the people of Israel, but he declared, as he so often does, that the proper evangelisation of the world depends on the bringing in of the Jews; and he entreated unceasing prayer that God would save the remnant of Israel. Rev. S. Schor, of Jerusalem, told of thousands of Jews returning to the land of their fathers. God has wrought wonders there within a few years past; even the Rabbis who used to be the bitterest enemies of Christian missions, are now willing to receive the Gospel. His closing word, like that of many of those who followed, was, "Come over and help us."

The subsequent programme was to go by countries—Africa, four speakers; Mohammedan lands, two speakers; India, four; China, Tibet, and Japan, five speakers.

AFRICA.

Dr. Harry Guinness said that in Africa God had opened a new world within the last twenty years. Quoting the text, "Ethopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God" (Ps. lxviii. 31), he said that the original of the word "soon" might more properly be rendered "suddenly." This is the very miracle that is transpiring before our eyes. In the great Congo region many are confessing Christ; in one congregation, at Lukunga, there is a church with 500 members. Let the churches of Christ enter in at the open door which God has set before us in the hitherto Dark Continent.

Mr. Spencer Walton said he brought to the Convention the loving greeting of Rev. Andrew Murray. He had good news to tell as to the progress of the Gospel, as gathered in recent tours in Basutoland, Fingoland, Pondoland, Zululand, and Swaziland. He had seen 1250 Basutos sitting together at the Lord's table, including the Queen and other members of the royal establishment.

The two succeeding speeches awoke more than common interest. The first was by the dusky lady, a relative of the late Ketchwayo, Mrs. Meek, whose eloquent appeal in her native Zulu for prayer and help, was translated by her husband. Then the coal-black Bishop Oluwole, coadjutor to Bishop Hill, spoke pathetically of the special difficulties and temptations of native Christians on the Niger, and besought prayer for the labours of himself and his fellow workers as they returned to Africa. He said that they desired to go in the fulness of the blessing that is so largely experienced at Keswick.

At this point Mr. Stock read extracts of a letter just received from Bishop Tucker, speaking of much activity in preparing native converts for baptism. The printing press is kept busy. The Waganda elders have a custom of joining in prayer in the vestry with the officiating minister, for ten minutes at the commencement of each service; the Bishop thought that would be a good custom to introduce in England.

THE MOHAMMEDAN WORLD.

The first to represent this hard field was Miss Trotter, from North Africa, who pleaded with her fellow-Christians at home to begin to believe as well as to pray for a decided break among the Mohammedans. She believed the reason why so little fruit has yet been found among these people is, that we have not expected it and believed for it.

Rev. C. Wilson, labouring among Mohammedans in Jerusalem, said the work among the women, both in the city and the country, is most promising. Official Turkey is more hostile than ever, but the people are willing to hear the Gospel message.

Mr. Stock here called on all in the audience who had been in the field to rise, that they might be seen. Some fifty or so stood up. Then he asked those who had been accepted for foreign service to rise; perhaps as many more stood. For both sets of workers Rev. E. H. Hopkins offered earnest prayer.

INDIA.

The Hon. Gertrude Kinnaird was the first of the five to speak on behalf of this vast dependency of the British Crown. She re-echoed the cries of ignorance, of superstition, of cruel custom, and above all of cruel indifference that are rising from the land. A woman in Patna said: "How long have your people known about Jesus Christ?" When told that it was a long period of years, she replied, "It seems a strange thing that no one ever told us about it before." Ninety per cent. of the population in India live in villages, and that is an immense field. The women in the zenanas are opening their hearts gradually to the truth. Some of them ask incredulously, "Does God love women?" One said: "Since the ladies came our hearts are light that before were dark." There are thirty-nine millions of girls under the age of twelve; only one-third of a million are in a school of any kind. Miss Kinnaird asked that over 100 new missionaries should go out to India at once.

Miss Bland, who has been at work in Agra, said she had been in India for twenty years, and she desired nothing more than to be sent forth, if the Lord willed, to labour there twenty years more. There is joy in the work which can never be known at home. She spoke also of the great needs of the villages, and of the success of work there. A worker itinerating in the villages had recently written to her to say that magistrates who had been trained in the mission-schools years ago would say: "Go where you like; there is no book like the Word of God. You can go and preach in all the villages where I have power." The women are really longing to receive the Gospel. They say, "We have never heard this before; we do not know it."

Miss Catchpole, a village worker in the Punjaub, could not understand how so many Christians are content to sit quietly at home while millions are perishing. There are 280 millions in India; if every one of the twenty-eight millions in England went out, each would have ten people to speak to. In the villages the people are uncorrupted by the European vices of the towns. They are very simple-minded, and work among them is hopeful.

Rev. Ruttongi Nowroji, a convert from Parseeism, told very effectively of his unrest while groping in the darkness of his early superstitions, and how from the lips of a native missionary he heard the Gospel that brought light and joy to his burdened soul. He had, in consequence, been separated from all his kindred; he had been parted from wife and children for the last thirty-seven years. Only the grace of God could have enabled him to bear up under his trying experiences. He has for some time been at work for the Master in the Nizam's Dominions; large audiences hear the Gospel message very attentively. There are 1500 converts, some of whom have suffered great persecution.

CHINA

next received attention, and the first to speak was Rev. Robert Stewart, of Foochow, who said that there is at present only one Protestant worker in China for a quarter of a million of people. Yet China is not a country somewhere in the clouds; it is only a few weeks' journey away from England. Mr. Stewart related some very striking facts as to the power of Christ through the Gospel in reaching hard cases. He told of a demoniac who was perfectly cured in body and mind, and is now preaching Christ with much success. He had seen converts suffer even to the death, so great was their fidelity to Jesus Christ.

Mr. Graham Brown recalled the Keswick Convention of 1885, when he attended a little private missionary gathering convened by Mr. Reginald Radcliffe, and when he received the impulse that sent him to China. He spoke of the vastness of the land, the paucity of the workers, and the readiness of the people to hear the Gospel.

Mr. Cecil Polhill-Turner related in part the terrible experiences that befel his wife and himself exactly that day twelve months ago (July 29) in the little mountain town of Sung-pan, when they were maltreated and driven out of the place because they had been accused of causing the long drought that visited the district. We pray that God would blow upon his Church with the south wind; there is plenty of the north wind of trial and persecution in the mission field. He told how in the very midst of their trial his wife had found comfort in the thought that some at Keswick Convention (then in session) might be praying for them.

Miss Anne Taylor spoke some earnest words on behalf of Tibet, where she has lately experienced so much of the keeping and delivering power of God, as well as the wrath of man. Then the missionary testimony was brought to a close by Mr. Brandram, of Japan, who put in a most urgent plea for that promising land and people. Somehow, he said, the stream of interest and of recruits vanishes before it reaches Japan. The people are in great danger of lapsing into infidelity and utter indifference if they are not won for Christ.

Mr. Stock said we must not omit to remember in prayer and thought the many lands and fields unrepresented on the platform, among which he mentioned, Arabia, Persia, Central Asia, the Malay Archipelago, Mongolia, Kamtschatka, North-West America (which is almost always forgotten), the South Seas, South America, Patagonia, Madagascar, Polynesia, Melanesia, New Guinea, the Maoris of New Zealand, and the aborigines of Australia.

From the words of Paul, "I am pure from the blood of all men," and some cognate passages, Rev. H. B. Macartney gave a solemn closing word of exhortation to the missionaries, and also to the congregation. Then, all having sung, "Saviour, thy dying love, Thou gavest me," Mr. Stock made a very tender appeal to parents not to throw any hindrances in the way of their children going forth to foreign fields in the service of Christ. He gave an opportunity to all parents in the vast audience, who were willing to surrender their sons and daughters to the Lord for mission work, to express it by rising. The response was remarkable from all parts of the tent, probably numbering hundreds in all. Then the hymn, "Oh to be nothing, nothing!" was sung. Mr. Stock invited all those, young or old, who desired now to place themselves on the altar for foreign service to rise; and again the response was gladdening, groups or single individuals of differing ages, standing on their feet in large numbers. It was a truly affecting spectacle. Rev. F. B. Meyer led in very earnest and definite prayer for those who had risen, children and parents. Then the proceedings were brought to a termination by the singing of the verse—

Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were a present far too small
Love so amazing, so Divine,
Demands my life, my soul, my all.

At the beginning of the meeting envelopes had been distributed through the audience, in which they could enclose their gifts or promises. At intervals these were collected and handed to the Chairman, who announced any special contribution. He intimated one promise of £1000, two of £100, and other lesser sums. Some sent up word that they were offering themselves for service. Near the close of the proceedings, Mr. Wilson stated that he had received, in promises and gifts, about £1800, speaking roughly. We have ascertained, just as we go to press, that the amount given or promised will be over £2200; this includes gifts to other missions besides the Keswick Mission. Some jewellery was also given, but not so much as last year, when the items given realised £150.

A GOVERNMENT RETURN shows that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners own sixty-eight licences, twenty-two of which are in Finsbury. An annual sum of £10,000 is thus derived from public-houses. In addition, thirty-four clergymen hold one hundred licences.

CHINA INLAND MISSION: AUSTRALIAN AUXILIARY.

From our Melbourne Correspondent.

The China Inland Mission is, undoubtedly, "an object lesson to the Church of God of this day." What is now being done here, in our Australian colonies, in this last decade of the nineteenth century, is but a repetition of what was witnessed in connection with this noble institution in the eighth decade of the century in the old country. In 1890 the Australasian department was formed, and almost immediately began definite operations by sending out eleven missionaries to the field. The visit to Australia of the venerable founder, Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, not only served to draw a large number of candidates to offer themselves for work in connection with the C.I.M., but was blessed of God to the deepening of the spiritual life of the Church in these lands. There has been, largely as the result of this visit, the rising up of quite a number of young men and young women, chiefly the latter, offering for service in the mission field.

The annual meetings of the Mission were held on Tuesday, June 6, in the Congregational Church, Collins-street, Melbourne. In the afternoon, at three, a number of ladies gathered in the hall, and were presided over by Mrs. Bird, wife of Rev. Alfred Bird, hon. secretary of the Mission. Mrs. Nicoll, a returned missionary, with the assistance of a large map, gave an interesting account of her journey to Chung Ching (where she and her husband laboured), and of the work carried on in that place. It was fourteen years since she had gone there, when it was the only station in a large province; now there are about ten more stations in the same province. She told the ladies that it was really because the Chinese mothers loved their little daughters that so many of them killed them, for some of them had told her they would rather put them out of existence than that they should live as they themselves had done. She told how difficult it was for women who smoked or ate opium, to give up the vile habit. She had seen some of them die in a wretched condition, preferring their opium to our Christ.

The Misses Ethel Reid, Fanny Sedgwick, and Hetty Flemming, expecting shortly to go to China, briefly addressed the meeting, testifying as to how they were led to offer themselves for the work, and telling how they had been tested in various ways, and then having been accepted by the Council, had gone into training at the home at Kew. They all acknowledged it was "just beautiful to go to China for Christ."

The evening meeting was presided over by Mr. David Beath, who gave the keynote to the proceedings by reading several passages conveying the grand thought, "The Lord reigneth," which in these perplexing times had been a comfort to many, and which likewise he considered a suitable word for a missionary gathering.

The hon. secretary, Rev. A. Bird, then read the report, recounting briefly the history of the Australian branch of the Mission. Though the faith of the Council had often been severely tried, they had never been put to shame. The first year saw eleven missionaries sent to China, the year following nineteen, and during the year just closed six. These had been selected after much prayer. They hoped, if the state of the funds should warrant it, shortly to send out four young men and five young ladies. The fact that of the workers already engaged nine were Church of England, eleven Methodists, eleven Baptists, two Presbyterians, two Congregationalists, and four of the "Brethren" community, showed the undenominational character of the Mission. The Australian contingent had stood the trying heat of the climate well, and already some were able to preach the Gospel in Chinese. Much good had resulted, and at one place a wonderful awakening had occurred, ninety converts being baptized. Rev. S. Chapman had recently spent six weeks in some of the interior provinces, and had brought home valuable reports of the mission work. Every mail brings requests for more helpers, and the supply is only limited by the funds placed at the disposal of the Council.

The hon. treasurer, Mr. P. Kitchen, submitted the financial statement for the year ending May 1, 1893. Starting with a credit balance of £686 6s. 6d., to which had been added £1770 6s. 1d. in subscriptions, donations, etc., the year closed with a small balance of £2 14s. 1d. in hand, and £238 11s. 9d. locked up in the National Bank. Mr. Kitchen then rendered praise to God for his goodness. Every real need had been met, and so we should thank God and take courage. The experiences of the Council, which he recounted, had been such as are so frequently met with in the carrying on of mission work, as well as in the lives of many of God's children.

Mr. Nicoll, returning missionary, related the wonderful increase of mission stations in the most distant inland provinces. The greatest opposition was from the literati. About the hardest province to work was Yun-nan, for there England's curse (opium) had got such a hold of the people as was unknown elsewhere in China. The Protestant missionaries are the enemies of this traffic. In the Province of Che'Kiang (the cradle of the C.I.M) there are now thirty labourers. Many of the inland stations have now flourishing native churches.

Rev. A. C. Kellaway, of St. James's Church, Melbourne, followed, and under the figure of a tree putting forth no new twigs indicated the Church not sending out workers into some mission field, as showing signs of decay. As this missionary work was the work of the Church of God, he reminded those present of the power that was given specially for this great enterprise when our Master promised the Holy Ghost for the very purpose of strengthening those who should go into all the world to preach the Gospel. The work brings glory to God, joy to the angels, blessing to the Church of God and to the world at large. He suggested that believers should read more missionary literature, and in a spirit of consecration devote themselves entirely to the Lord.

Miss Campbell and Miss McCulloch, who hope to start for China shortly, addressed the meeting in happy words about the joyful service in which they hoped soon to share, and in regard to the mission work in which they had already borne their part. Miss Chapman, recently returned to recruit, spoke of the joy of service in China. She longed to get back to the work; but she wasn't so "dead set" on going to China as on doing God's will, whatever that might be.

The Old Welcome.

All interested in our city workgirls will be glad to hear of the very pleasant times we spent at George-lane, Essex, on Saturday week. The weather was lovely, and the rambles through the forest most enjoyable. We sat down to tea in the Mission Hall, lent for the occasion through the kindness of Mr. Hobbs, who, with some lady helpers, did all that was possible to make us comfortable and happy. The hall was brightly ornamented with banners, etc., and the tables decorated with plenty of flowers. Afterwards, many of our girls with the workers met in the forest for a meeting, when several friends spoke words of loving invitation to those out of Christ. More singing followed, after which there was a short testimony meeting amongst the Christian girls, one saying that it was on a similar occasion last year when she decided for Christ. We trust many received blessing, and were invigorated in body through that happy time in the forest.—Yours, in happy service,

Eleanor Fisher.

MRS. H. COOK, in sending out the last report penned by her late husband, pleads for help to carry on the work of the Seamen's Mission and the Gospel Ships. The steamer Good News is now on the East Coast, working among fishermen.

MEDICAL STATISTICS show that 50 per cent. of the young men in Switzerland, who would otherwise be eligible for military service, are rendered unfit for that service owing to the marked physical deterioration produced in them by excessive drinking.

THE REGENERATE WILL.—The Scripture doctrine of sanctification teaches no effortless passivity. No will is so fully constituted for work as the regenerate will. And in the matter of inner sanctification, which lies at the base of true and fruitful outward service (2 Tim. ii. 21) the will has abundant work to do in watching and prayer, in diligent study of the Divine Word, in use of sacred ordinances, in holy contemplation of Christ, in attention to every whisper through the conscience. But these works will all be done with a view to maintaining and deepening that sacred practical contact with Christ by faith, which is the one ultimate secret of spiritual success. They will be helps and guides to faith, not substitutes for its divine simplicity. The temptation of the hour will be met less by direct efforts of the will than by indirect; "through and in Him who enableth."—Rev. H. C. G. Moule.

Letters to the Editor.

CHEAP MISSIONARIES.

Dear Sir,—A good deal has been said and some letters written on the question of what allowance is required to live comfortably in China. Much has been said, in theory, condemning what are called "Cheap Missionaries." Perhaps you can allow me space for a short statement as to personal expenses in China.

I have just returned from a stay of about three months there. I spent during that time £12 10s. This covered all the expenses of living, with the exception of house-rent, besides a portion of outfit of Chinese clothes, books sufficient for twelve to eighteen months' study of the language; teacher's salary, travelling expenses for over 700 miles journey and all other private expenditure. I had a liberal allowance from private sources and stinted myself in nothing, but being under the guidance of wise and experienced men, was saved unnecessary expenses.

The China Inland Mission is one which is classed among the so-called cheap missions, and I would like, through the medium of your columns, to express my admiration of the way in which it is conducted. Its organisation, from a business point of view, is remarkably good. God seems to have provided the needed men for the different positions. A spirit of harmonious unity and prayer pervades all sections of the work; and no one can come in contact with the members of the Mission without being convinced that the God in whom they trust will honour their efforts in his cause.—Yours, etc.,

Leith. A. Stewart

"WANTED, A BOYS' LIFE BRIGADE."

Dear Sir,—I hail with pleasure the suggestions of your correspondent, "B.," which appeared in The Christian of last week. Having already a large meeting of boys every Sunday night, and recognising the necessity of doing something for them during the week, we are arranging just on the lines "B." advocates. The very large number of societies in existence makes one shrink from adding another which would necessarily mean fresh expenditure for suitable rooms, apparatus, etc., besides another deplorable division of labour. It would be far better if one of those already in operation could adopt improved methods.

I venture to assert that the Y.M.C.A. could, and should, undertake this work. There is not only a national executive, but there are numbers of buildings, gymnasiums, swimming, cricket, and other various athletic and educational agencies scattered throughout the world, and carried on on a Christian basis, and with the one object in view of winning the youth to Christ. The Y.M.C.A. from the first has been a progressive movement, and it has adapted itself largely to varying demands. In many Associations junior sections are now in existence, which admit youths at the age of 14. We have too long overlooked the importance of this work amongst the boys. Perhaps it is premature to suggest a title; this might fairly be left to those who take the matter up. The one that suggests itself to me as being the most applicable is the "Lads' Alliance."—Yours faithfully,

Y.M.C.A., Norwich. Walter Price.

A PERFECTIONIST SNARE.

Sir,—I have lately had occasion to study a good deal of the literature of perfectionist and ultra-holiness schools, and have been dismayed to find some of their best-known professors maintaining a doctrine of "intention" which reminds one somewhat of one of the Jesuit doctrines so skilfully ridiculed by Pascal in his "Provincial Letters." For instance, Mr. Thomas Cook, in his tract on "Scriptural Perfection," while admitting that the Christian's service may be marred and defective, claims that he may be perfect because of the excellence of his intentions, and he defines the "sum and substance of Christian perfection" as "a sincere aim in everything I do to please God." Is Christian perfection, then, nothing but sincerity of intention? If this be so, many very wicked men (for instance, Saul of Tarsus, the persecutor) must have been Christianly perfect. Our blessed Lord Himself said to his disciples, "The time cometh that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service."

If intention and not achievement is the touchstone of our conduct, then the foundations of morality are sapped, for right and wrong will differ with different people, and absolute standard there will be none. Where right conduct is wanting we cannot acquit men upon the ground of their intentions. If this be the rule of a sound morality, how much more is it the rule of Christianity! The Christian cannot afford to sink below the level of the moralist. Hence the alarm that many feel at the very obvious tendency of perfectionist and kindred teaching to lower the standard of God's holy requirements. Hence, too, I for one greatly distrust such eulogies of Jesuits as Dr. Bowman Stephenson has recently pronounced in The Sunday Magazine. He says: "There glowed in the breasts of the early Jesuits a sincere and absorbing passion for Christ, and for what they believed to be the salvation of souls. . . . We revolt against the Jesuit's method; we abjure his superstitions; we marvel at and condemn the elasticity of his conscience on ethical questions; but we admire his devotion, his courage, his endurance, his love for his religion and his Saviour, for the sake of which he 'counted not his life dear unto him.'"

Now "the elasticity of the Jesuit's conscience on ethical questions," is in plain English the utter want of moral principle, as may very easily be seen by a reference to their writings; and to me at any rate it seems a mere paltering with the truth to talk about "a sincere and absorbing passion for Christ" in men wholly destitute of morality. We can scarcely doubt the sincerity of many men whose hands have been imbrued in the blood of the saints; we dare not even affirm that of those Jews who with wicked hands crucified and slew the Prince of life, not one sincerely thought to please God by what he did. But we do not on that account say "Our Father in heaven looks less at results than intention"; on the contrary, we reprobate their conduct with the utmost earnestness.—Yours faithfully,

Hampstead, July 29. Thos. M. Neatby.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

A new church has been opened at Newton, Cambuslang.

Rev. John Knox Brown, assistant at St. Michael's, Edinburgh, has been elected minister of the church and parish of Langbank.

Dr. Valentine, of Agra, addressed a deeply-interested audience in Carrubbers Close Mission, Edinburgh, on Saturday week.

Rev. Professor Cameron, D.D., conducted special services in Towie Free Church on Sunday week in commemoration of God's goodness during the two years of the present pastorate.

A sale of work for the purpose of carrying out improvements on Lochranza Free Church was held in the Schoolhouse, Lochranza, Arran, on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday of last week. Sir Donald Currie arrived in the Bay and visited the schoolhouse, and showed a deep interest in the work.

Dr. Thos. Lawson has been doing duty as resident doctor at the Cowgate Mission during the summer. He is to be succeeded in the autumn by Dr. Fred. M. Graham. One of the students of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society, Dr. R. Lee Bolton, has been appointed by the Church of Scotland to their Medical Mission in Smyrna.

IRISH NOTES.

The Jungle Tribes Mission is about to send out from Belfast another agent to India and open a second station.

A grant of £300 has just been made by the committee of the Wesleyan Book Room to the Irish Methodist Home Mission fund.

The New Central Mission, Dublin, sanctioned by the late Methodist Conference at Cork, will not be ready to enter on active operations before September.

The Armagh Protestant Orphan Society, which was founded in 1867, and through which since then over 400 children have passed, has now 132 orphans under its care, and is doing a good work.

The manager of the "Bogus Club" has been fined £25 by the presiding magistrate at Dublin, and it is hoped that this will help to check the growth of these nefarious man traps that are becoming a regular plague.

A successful work in connection with the Irish Evangelisation Society has been going on at Lurgan and the neighbourhood for several months past. Through the instrumentality of Messrs. R. M. Robinson, J. Loney, and S. Millar thousands have heard the Gospel preached, and very many have decided for Christ.

The Archbishop of Dublin, Lord Plunkett, has addressed an earnest and affectionate letter to the members of the Reformed Church, Spain, and he appeals to people in this country for assistance to enable him to pay off the debt of £2000 still remaining on the church buildings in Madrid, in which he himself has taken a deep interest.

MISSION WORK IN PERSIA.—In the report of Mrs. Bishop's address at the Students' Missionary Convention at Keswick, the sentence on Persian Missions should have run thus: "Persia is without missionaries, except in the north-west, and at Teheran, Julfa, and Hamadan."

THE Y.M.C.A.

The Madras Y.M.C.A. reports very decided progress.

Mr. Arthur K. Dearden, of Hull, has been appointed general secretary of the South Shields Association.

Mr. and Mrs. E. S. Johnson have just entertained the members of the Derby Y.M.C.A. at a garden party at their charming residence, Littleover Hill.

The Sunday-afternoon Bible studies at the Camden-road Association have lately been much blessed, so also the evangelistic and open-air services.

The Melbourne Association reports that the black cloud caused by the commercial crisis is beginning to move. The work goes on well, new members come in, but funds even yet are very short.

The Ramsgate Y.M.C.A. is going forward. The members have started open-air services on the sands, and God is wonderfully blessing them. They are greatly in need of a small American organ to help them in the singing of the sweet songs of Zion. The leader of this work is Mr. Richard Render, Tryphena Villas, Margate-road, Ramsgate.

The foundation stone of the Paignton Y.M.C.A. new building has been laid by Mr. O. S. Bartlett. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Bartlett, Dr. Black, of Torquay, and others. There was a large attendance at the public meeting. Mr. L. M. Miller, president of the Association, was in the chair. Addresses were delivered by Revs. T. C. Wilson, W. F. Price, Messrs. T. Viccars, F.G.S., and W. H. Roberts.

At the summer quarterly meeting at Trowbridge Mr. J. Poynton Hayden gave a hearty welcome to twenty-eight members and associates who had joined during the past quarter. Satisfactory reports were presented by the secretaries of the various branches of the work, and a resolution in favour of the establishment of an Abstainers' Union for advocating temperance principles amongst the members and young men of the town, was adopted. The president addressed the meeting, which was a full one, contending that the branch was on a firmer basis now than ever.

The spiritual work at the Exeter Hall Y.M.C.A. has never been better taken up than at the present time. The week-night Gospel meetings have been particularly well attended, and many young men have been brought in. During the winter Dr. Pentecost will give a series of addresses on Wednesday evenings on "The Reasonableness of Christianity," while on Tuesday evenings, in connection with the Churchman's Protestant Union, a series of Protestant lectures will be given by a well-known clergyman. Messrs. Charles Inglis and T. Richardson have been giving addresses at the Sunday afternoon men's meetings and the Sunday evening services.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

The Peckham Rye Tabernacle Endeavour Society, formed eighteen months ago, now numbers fifty-eight members in the senior branch and forty-three in the junior branch.

Six months ago a Y.P.S.C.E. was inaugurated in connection with Southernhay Congregational Church, Exeter. Now sixty-four seniors and forty-five juniors are pledged to Christian work.

The attendance at the Carr's-lane Society, Birmingham, during the summer months averages over 100, and the enthusiasm of the members in their work is frequently remarked upon. A very interesting missionary meeting has just been held.

Rev. J. D. Lamont, of Belfast, believes in the C.E.S. because it is simple, because it is Scriptural, and because when tried it has been successful. The attendance at his week-night service has been doubled through the efforts of the members of one society.

CHRISTIAN OBLIGATION.—"They all began to speak" (Acts ii. 4). This shows that the testimony of Christ was not borne by the ministry alone, that this chief work of the Church was not confined to official hands. The multitude of believers were not mere adherents, but living, speaking, burning agents in the great movement for the universal diffusion of God's message.—William Arthur.

OPEN-AIR PREACHERS.—Nearly 200 members of the Open-Air Mission accepted the kind invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Hodson and Miss Alexander to spend Thursday, the 27th ult., at North Tadworth, near Epsom. It was a glorious day as to weather, and great was the enjoyment of the preachers as they entered into cricket, lawn-tennis, and other games, or ventured down the "aerial railway." A delightful address was delivered by Rev. J. G. Train, of Norwood, and after tea, prayer and song, heartily engaged in, fitly closed a red-letter day.

The Christian.

☞ It is particularly requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to individual members. Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Miss Annie R. Taylor, Chinese Missionary and Traveller in Tibet.

Mr. F. W. Crossley, of Manchester, writes:—"We already have one missionary supported from Star Hall, and several partially so. May our Lord continue the work. He undoubtedly will if we are faithful. I quite agree in your idea of each church supporting a missionary, or more. Any spiritual church can do it."

In our Keswick report of last week, a mistake was made as to the date of the first Convention. It was held at the end of June in the same year as the Brighton Conference (1875), and only a month after. The meetings recently held, therefore, constitute the nineteenth consecutive Convention at Keswick.

We understand that the authorities of the Keswick Convention have received a requisition signed by a numerous body of missionaries in North India, principally ladies labouring in the Punjaub, entreating that a delegation of Keswick Convention speakers might be sent to India in the next cold season, to hold conventions for the deepening of spiritual life in various missionary centres and at other suitable stations. We hope that the God of all peace may wisely direct our Keswick brethren in this extremely important matter, and that they may be guided aright in their decision on the main question and then in the choice of men and places. The expense will necessarily be very heavy, but our God is faithful, and if this project be for his glory, we feel assured that the way will be prepared and the path made smooth. Meanwhile, we earnestly bespeak prayer on the subject from the Lord's people.

We warmly sympathise with the multiplication of conventions of this kind in large and in local centres. They must always lead to evangelistic and missionary operations; for if a revived and deepened spiritual life do not develop thus, it will die away. The living waters from the house of God issue out toward the East country, and go down into the desert, and go into the salt sea, whose waters shall be healed, and the fruit of its trees shall be for meat, and its leaf for medicine.

A young minister sends to The Independent his "impressions of Keswick," which may be summed up in the words—he found himself in close contact with the old and unchanging truths of Scripture. "Here one is led back virtually to the old definition of religion itself, namely, the right relation of man to God; which relation is harmonious, healthy, whole, maintained by the continuous exercise of faith in God. That, really, is all that Keswick teaches. And, to such teaching, I, for one, can take no exception. I espouse it right heartily. It is the eternal truth of God, not the speculation or sentimentalism of man." If all young preachers were only to start with this truth, and keep on with it to the end, instead of beginning as they sometimes do with their own imaginings, or with negations of the Word of God, the churches would have more prosperity and our Lord more glory.

The noon prayer-meeting at Aldersgate-street on the 15th inst. will be a valedictory one, in connection with the return to India of Rev. Isaac F. Row, of Poona, who has been home on furlough after more than sixteen years of service in India. The Lord has owned him to the conversion of many among Europeans, Eurasians, and natives. Being now well, he hastens back for urgent work in his large district as an evangelist in Western India, in connection with the Anglo-Indian Evangelisation Society, and also as the Society's secretary in India. Mr. Row will give a short address.

We have just seen Mr. Blackham, the originator of the P.S.A. movement, who thanks us for the assurance given in our last, that the P.S.A. "was intended to be a spiritual and God-honouring institution." It is no matter what an organisation is called. A church may practically be a club; a Y.M.C.A. may be chiefly a gymnastic hall. So a P.S.A. may be degraded to the level of a mere Sunday afternoon concert. When this is done it will become more and more sensuous and sensational. The universal experience of the leaders of this movement is that the more spiritually it is conducted the more successful it is.

Working men have souls, and they know it. They have consciences which speak to them. They want, in not less proportion than others, to hear of the things of the world beyond. If they eschew ordinary places of worship it is not so much because they disapprove the object, as that they dislike the method, as unsuitable to their habits and modes of thought. The P.S.A. rightly conducted, has been found by spiritual men to be a means of grace, and of leading very many to the knowledge of Christ as their Saviour and Lord. Nothing can be more unfair to it than to degrade it to the level of a mere Sunday-afternoon entertainment. It is not right to call such a thing by the name of P.S.A. ☞We are asked to press upon our readers, to unite in prayer during the next twelve months, that Divine guidance and blessing may be given to all leaders in the conduct of this movement.

It is a good thing that the daily papers have taken so much notice of the case of a poor seaman who died from the inhuman treatment of the captain and mate of his vessel. The punishment awarded to the criminals may have been insufficient, but our hope of improvement in the treatment of seafaring men lies in other things than in fear of the gaol. More Christian work among sailors is greatly needed: the men need more care to be taken of them when they are in port, and better provision should be made for their comfort and well-being on board their ships. The power of the publican at home still needs to be considerably reduced. Thus by creating a purer and higher feeling, we shall hear fewer of those harrowing stories of men being abused until they crawl away into their bunks to die, or come home maimed for life.

Excursions are frequently made by enterprising reporters into unknown regions of English life, and news brought forth which is as entertaining as if it came from a new world. The Board Schools in London, an obscure region in an out-of-the-way city, have just been looked up, and we are grateful for being informed that the children begin the day at school with a hymn and the Lord's Prayer; in the Second Standard they learn the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, Psalm xxiii, "some simple stories from Genesis, some leading facts in the life of Christ, and the history of David as a shepherd boy." The range of Scripture is increased as the child advances from Standard to Standard, and as the verses learnt at the beginning are kept up throughout the school course, the child ought, at the end, to know "the Lord's Prayer, the Commandments, several Psalms, several verses from all the Gospels, Epistles, and Prophets, and a large number of the best Proverbs." Such an arrangement had best, in the present state of feeling, be left as it is.

The effectiveness of the military drill of telegraph messengers, as a recruiting system, must be very complete, if the state of feeling among the messengers in a large midland town may be taken as a gauge—they all intend to enlist. Much may stand in the way of the fulfilment of this purpose, but the system is doing what its opponents always predicted. All the more need for immediate and active steps to be taken for forming, as one of our correspondents has suggested, a Boys' Life Brigade, or, as another has suggested, a Lads' Alliance, which shall teach boys to save life, and not destroy it. The boys' friends in the House of Commons should also press the question to the front. Has the Postmaster-General a constitutional right to issue a regulation which materially affects the life of a telegraph messenger in favour of a military, rather than a civil, life? The Post Office is a civil office, and ought not to be influenced by the Horse Guards.

We are thankful to hear that the Board of Trade has decided to give the Midge system a trial at Dunkirk. A correspondent of The Times states:—

Under this excellent system, as soon as a ship arrives in port a Board of Trade officer boards her, and, after ascertaining how many hands wish to proceed home without delay, obtains from the master particulars as to the wages due and the deductions chargeable to the men. Each seaman, after vouching for the accuracy of his account by signing it, receives a ticket for his destination with a small advance to defray minor travelling expenses, and leaves for home as soon as his services can be dispensed with on board ship. The balance of wages due to him is forwarded by the Board of Trade officer, and thus a sailor's earnings have a chance of reaching his family instead of filling the pockets of the crimps. The need of a similar arrangement at the Continental discharging ports has long been recognised by those interested in the welfare of sailors, as it is a well-known fact that in many instances the earnings of a whole voyage are taken from a man in a single night at certain ports on the Continent.

The need for such a system is pressing. We trust, and indeed expect, that the result of this trial will be the extension of the Midge system to other ports where our seamen have long been ruthlessly and systematically robbed.

A correspondent of The Westminster Gazette has had "a talk with a Turk about Turkey," which reveals to Western eyes such an internal state of things as we should expect to find in a country which oppresses the Armenian Christians. Outspokenness of opinion is perilous; and as privacy does not exist in Constantinople, what you speak, as you think, in the closet, is soon known in the Palace, which employs 50,000 spies of all grades and occupations. The policy which reigns supreme at the Palace both in home and foreign matters is "fear." The old sturdiness and simplicity are gone; the youths of the upper classes are degraded by contact with France. This discerning Turk is of opinion that what is wanted is not so much material reforms, though there is plenty of room for these, as a great moral revival. "Without this the Ottoman Empire must crumble to dust." But how it is to be effected, or whether it is possible, we cannot say. If Turkey would cease persecuting Christians, and give free course to the Gospel, that question would soon be answered. It would remove Mahomet, and save the nation.

That slavery should exist in one of its worst forms within five days' sail from our English shore is a fact that is hardly realised. All the great European Powers are represented at Morocco, and almost under their eyes the scandalous traffic is carried on. Unfortunately they cannot interfere with private sale. The facts are published in a Tangier journal. In May last a dealer brought in a supply of slaves, which he disposed of, and then he left for the interior for more. He has just returned with no fewer than twenty, mostly young girls. Mr. Chas. H. Allen, of the Anti-Slavery Society, is freely publishing these shameful proceedings in order to arouse public Christian opinion in this country.

Freedom of the Press is not the privilege of the Christian only, and much is to be learnt by the candid remarks of heathen priests as they unbosom themselves to their followers in native prints. It would appear that the Temple of Jugannath at Pooree, Orissa, like many another structure, is the worse of wear, and a Temple Repairing Fund was started some time ago. How the scheme has prospered may be learnt from the following translation from Utkal Dipika (the Light of Orissa):

Cuttack, June, 1893. Repairs of Jugannath's Temple, Poree. More than three lakhs (300,000) of rupees are required for the repair of the Pooree temple, but, up to this time, only a little over one lakh has been promised, and out of this about half has still to be realised. It is a matter of sorrow that, after unwearied zeal and endeavour for about two years, no more than this sum has been raised throughout the whole of India. On account of this, why should not the adherents of other religions laugh at the Hindus?

We would not laugh at the Hindus, but we would submit that such a notice in a public print may be significant to many who watch with interest the decay of an ancient faith.

R. S. Gundry, writing in The Fortnightly on "Missionaries in China," states at some length the causes of the persecution of missionaries. He does not appear to add anything to the knowledge of those who are familiar with China and the life of the Chinese. His points, indeed, are frequently quoted from missionary literature, or supported by some authority in the mission field. The spirit of the article cannot be called hostile, but neither can it be said to be friendly; it is a sort of "candid friend" or "unbiassed observer" article, and will no doubt get all the attention it deserves from the various societies. Mr. Gundry says that one cause of disturbance is the interference of missionaries in civil disputes between Christian and non-Christian natives, but he owns that in this, as in many other cases, Roman missionaries are certainly the most aggressive, though Protestants are by no means free from blame. There would have been a great deal less friction with natives all over the world, if Rome, with her masterfulness, had kept out of the way.

Mr. Gundry asserts that it is little less than proselytising by force "to insist that missionaries of every conceivable sect and of every intellectual standard shall be allowed to establish themselves and their buildings in the teeth of popular dislike, and to expect that that dislike can be hindered from finding expression." But do the real missionaries of Christ insist on this? He admits that the Chinese Government cannot escape responsibility.

If they have not dared to protest against an aggressive propaganda, neither have they exhausted themselves in efforts to restrain their own people. They have allowed, and possibly connived at, tacit opposition where they would have done better to protest before the world against undue encroachment. Missionaries have been right, too, in accusing the local officials of worse than indifference to the gathering storm.

Mr. Gundry is of opinion that "the whole question of missionary intercourse needs regulation and revision." We fancy that that continually goes on as missionary work alters the conditions of society amid which it is carried on; the one adjusts itself to the other.

Canon Knox-Little replies in this month's Contemporary to Archdeacon Farrar's articles on the "Ritualists," a term peculiarly hateful to the Canon. The positions taken up by the Canon are: (1) There is a real priesthood in the Church of England. "When the Archdeacon asserts that 'priest only means presbyter,' in order to distinguish the office from that of a deacon, that we have in no sense a priest called to offer sacrifice, I believe that he departs from the teaching of the New Testament, of the whole Catholic Church, and of the Church of England." Then we get into superfine distinctions. "Priests on earth; ordained according to his will, in succession from his apostles, have a ministerial but real priesthood, not vicarious. They present our sacrifice (once for all offered on the cross as a sacrifice of blood and sorrow) before God the Father 'as a perpetual memorial of his passion,' sacramentally on every altar of the Church."

"Ministerial," as representatives; not "vicarious," not as substitutes. But there must be ordination, "in succession to the apostles"; an absurd and impossible thing. If it exists no priest can prove that he has it. The priests present one "sacrifice sacramentally on every altar of the Church," yet it was "once for all offered on the cross." To do over and over again what was done once for all, passes our comprehension. We are content with the "once"; it was done, done perfectly, and needs no repetition, cannot have a repetition, and for a priest to pretend he is doing it is to insult one's understanding and pain one's heart.

Canon Knox-Little maintains that at ordination the priests receive the power "to absolve in the name of the Lord," the authority to teach, and the power to celebrate the Eucharist, and generally to administer sacraments and bless in God's name. "In other parts of the prayer-book these functions are carefully restrained to the priest." The importance which he attaches to sacraments and forms perhaps appears the most plainly in a parenthetical clause: "I am sure that, along with the Bible, the Prayer-book and the great divines of the English Church, they (the Ritualists) hold that the real presence of the Lord's body and blood (after consecration by a properly-ordained priest), under the form of bread and wine, is the doctrine of the Church of England and part of the Gospel of Christ." The words we have italicised show us the magician at work with his incantations.

The Canon makes a strong point against the Archdeacon when he says that the Church has deliberately retained the word "priest." The thing that strikes us is, that it is passing strange to be a thing, or to be called a thing you hate—"priest"; and also (as against the Canon) to profess to offer a sacrifice which you say was offered once for all. The ritualism of some Evangelicals, and the evangelicalism of some Ritualists, is very perplexing.

The burden of the prayers of Epaphras for his brethren was that they "might stand perfect and fully assured in all the will of God." To be in the will of God is the Christian's first duty and privilege; to be in it "all" is the mark of his Christian manhood. Every believer is in some of it; Epaphras prayed, "agonised in prayers," for his brethren to stand "perfect in it all." Perfect as a man is perfect. A child is perfect as a child, a youth as a youth, a man as a man. Even as men some may be more developed than others. It should be a full development in truth which is the home of the soul, and in duty which is its delight. Then comes the being "fully assured." Dim light and imperfect obedience can give very imperfect satisfaction, but when we stand perfect then can we be sure of the truth, sure of God, and sure of our relation to Him.

Keswick Convention.

It is evident that the prejudice which has kept so many aloof from the Keswick movement is to a large extent dying out. Many have been seen at the Convention this year for the first time, not a few among them being Nonconformist ministers. The opinion is becoming pretty general that there is nothing in the teaching to justify the abstention of former years; and that it differs from their own, not so much in substance as in application.

Not many addresses this year have been upon the subject of the Holy Spirit, because, as Prebendary Webb-Peploe acknowledged, there was a fear of giving offence by differences of exposition. But the presence of the Spirit has been manifest, especially in his work of conviction. There have been many cases in which He has evidently put his hand upon some special form of sin, or some innocent thing that occupies a place that belongs to Christ, and has called for a surrender of that. And we believe that not a few have yielded to his call. The humbling and emptying have been very real and deep; herein lies the assurance that the Convention will prove an abiding blessing.

The special meetings for ministers have been an important feature of the Convention. On these occasions the speaking has been largely testimony, which has had all the greater weight because the speakers themselves have had to overcome similar prejudices to those which some of their hearers had felt. That ministers gather in such numbers to hear about this matter is itself a hopeful feature. Indifference is the greatest hindrance to a "more abundant life." If that is removed on the part of pastors and teachers generally the churches will soon feel the influence.

Sacerdotalism and Ritualism have found no favour during this Convention. It is something to hear one Church of England clergymen tell his hearers that "minister" was a term which applied to them as surely as to himself, and that they were not to expect from "a white-chokered parson" what they did not look for in themselves; and that he was as much bound to confess to them as they were to him. We rejoice in every indication that the unscriptural distinction between laity and clergy is being abolished. Would that all so-called clergymen and ministers spoke in the same way. It is in such a movement as that of Keswick that the Romanising tendencies of the day will be most effectually stayed. A dead Evangelicalism will have no chance against a Ritualism that is all alive. Earnestness in error will give it wings, while important truth held with an indifferent spirit will be without influence. "A living dog is stronger than a dead lion."

All the speakers seem to have been full of intense earnestness. They have spoken as though their message was deeply important to them, and ought to be not less important to their hearers. And their words have been clothed with power, and have searched into many hearts, awakening hopes and expectations of a fuller life than has yet been experienced. Whatever may have been the case in former years no one can charge the Keswick teachers this year with encouraging a self-satisfied life, or teaching anything approaching perfection in the flesh. Christ has been exalted; self has been abased. His power to cleanse and to keep has been magnified; but man's continuous need of both cleansing and keeping has been made clear. And is not this the true life?—in self, nothing but sin and weakness; in Him, all the fulness of God to meet our need. The measure of our appreciation of what is in Him depends upon our consciousness of utter insufficiency in ourselves.

The Sinking of the "Victoria."

Dear Sir,—The sinking of the Victoria was a very expensive experience, but after all it may have been worth much to the nation, as it has taught us some valuable and opportune lessons, which England certainly ought to know before she embarks in a great European war, which possibly is not now very far distant.

We have recently seen one of our ablest admirals give an order to a manœuvring squadron which was generally regarded by his subordinates as a fatal blunder, and which within five minutes was proved to have been so.

Moreover, a trifle did it, for if the ships had been ordered to wheel inward, the ships at one side putting their helms down at a greater angle than those at the other side, the result would have been that the ships at one side would have come round at a sharper curve than the ships at the other side; and thus the ships at one side would have circled well inside of the circle described by the ships at the other side, and thus no collision would have taken place, as they would have given one another an easy go-by. Or even if the ships at one side had been ordered to go at full speed and the ships at the other side at half-speed, they would have got out of one another's way. Or even when the ships were half-way round on their respective inward sweeps, if this had been done, a collision would have been avoided; but, alas! it was not done; and thus death swallowed her prey through perfect obedience to a palpable blunder.

What a failure does this make all man's boasted scientific attainments appear! Five minutes before the disaster our Admiral was regarded as the finest Admiral of the finest Fleet of the finest country in the whole world; but a great deal of humiliation can take place in five minutes.

If England's war-ships are such unsafe toys when at play among themselves in fine weather and smooth water, what will they be when they are under fire of a hostile fleet, every shot striking with a force of many thousand tons, and with torpedoes flying round them with deadly explosives?

Moreover, it now turns out that when the Camperdown rammed the Victoria, she broke her own nose in the operation, and very nearly went down head foremost; so that ramming turns out to be nearly as dangerous for the rammer as the rammed; if so our rams are useless.

We have always been told of the wonders that the rams would do in the day of battle, but now it turns out that they are a suicidal invention. What Admiral dare use the present rams after the experience of the Camperdown?

And what about the water-tight compartments? If the doors are kept shut the crew will be smothered for want of ventilation. If the doors are kept open the crew will be drowned in case of accident, for there will not be time to shut them; so that open or shut they are a delusion.

If the side of a vessel is suddenly stove in there must be a frightful rush of water inward, perhaps four feet deep, which would rush on through the open compartment door, and against such a force all the men in the ship could not close it; in fact, they would be drowned if they were to go near it. Thus these compartment doors have been demonstrated to be unworkable.

We have recently had from the First Lord of the Admiralty in Parliament the assurance that in future the stokers and marines will be taught to swim, so that when misadventures happen they need not all go to the bottom. This may be very comforting to some, but will it satisfy the loving hearts of the mothers, who are willing that their sons should fight for their country, but not that they should swim from a foundering ironclad? And yet these monstrous toys are England's glory.

England spends thirty millions a year upon preparing for war, one hundred and forty millions a year upon drink, and one million a year on Christian Missions! But England thinks that God knows nothing about all this, and will in no wise call her to account.

It makes us long for the time when nations will try the principles of Christianity for settling their differences instead of the principles of gunpowder! Let us suppose that kings and peoples were to love one another, and to settle their differences on the principles of love, what a change there would be. England would save many millions a year in money, and many thousands of precious lives. What a pity, then, it is that Christianity is not acted on by professedly Christian nations in harmony with the Master's advice (Rev. iii. 18): "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see."

What a testimony it is to the supreme and Divine wisdom of Christianity that, if its dictates were only acted on, it would save the nation's blood and treasure, and spread universal happiness.—Faithfully yours,

J. Townsend Trench.

MR. VARLEY AT ILFRACOMBE.

Coming for our holiday to Ilfracombe, one of the most lovely of English watering-places, it has been a great pleasure to us to meet with Mr. Henry Varley, and to attend several of his interesting services here. One could hardly wish to hear a clearer or fuller statement of vital truth than has fallen from the lips of this servant of the Lord. It was gratifying to see such large attendances at the evening meetings, which were mostly held in Oxford Hall, and to note the marked attention paid.

On Thursday evening (Aug. 3) the subject of address was "The Coming Revolution" which was, in effect, a bird's eye view of the prophetic scheme on to its culmination in the rule and reign of the Son of God. The subject was colossal; and, we must confess we have rarely listened to a more massive exhibition of the Church's hope and the day of the earth's deliverance. Avoiding hair-splitting distinctions, which are never wisely introduced into promiscuous assemblies, Mr. Varley limited himself to the main aspects of dispensational truth, and especially to the nearness of Christ's coming, as shown in the fact that the times of the Gentiles, dating from 605 B.C., had all but run their course. While it is folly to fix dates, in the light of Acts i. 7, it is surely a mistake not to be instructed by the abundant evidence, chronological and otherwise, that lies to hand as to the nearness of the time of the end. We are thankful for Mr. Varley's timely and vigorous testimony to the Second Advent, as well as to Gospel truth.

Mr. Varley's Mission here will close on Tuesday next in an all-day conference of Christ's people for spiritual quickening and the promotion of holiness.

The Key-Notes of Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

FILLED.

It is said of Abraham that he died in a good old age, an old man, and full. It is a beautiful conception; as though all his nature had reached its complete satisfaction, and he could desire and receive nothing more. The Psalmist, too, sings of fulfilled desire, and Mary tells how God filled her hungry soul with good things. Can we speak with equal certainty of being filled?

Eph. i. 23. Christ is the source of fulness to his church and to individual souls. We have sought to be filled with earthly goods and human love. Away upon the mountains we have essayed to hew out for ourselves cisterns, to be fed by rushing brooks and falling showers, and be always brimming; but we have been greatly disappointed. In each case a flaw or crack has made our work abortive, and we have seen the water sinking inch after inch till only drops have remained to quench the fever-flush of our souls. Not more successful have been the attempts of those who have sought rest in systems of theology, in rites and ceremonies, or in the rush of unceasing engagements. In none of these can the nature of man find its completion or fruition. His roots struggle vainly underground, but they miss the light, and air, and dew, and sunshine, by which alone the full flower and fruitage can be attained.

Only Jesus can fill the soul of man. As the saintly Rutherford puts it:—

> O Christ, He is the fountain,
> The deep sweet well of love.

All the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily in Him, that of that fulness we might all receive, and grace on grace, like repeated waves that follow one another up to the furthest reaches of the tide. In Him we have been made full in the purpose and intention of God (Col. iii. 9), and in Him we may be made full by the daily reception of his grace, through the operation of the Holy Spirit.

It is as if God stored the whole fulness of his nature in Jesus, that it might be readily accessible by us. The river of God, which is full of water, flows over the low threshold of his humanity that it may be within the reach of the weakest and smallest in his kingdom. We might be afraid of the Great Spirit, but what little child, what timid woman, ever shrank from the gentle Lamb of God?

There is not one, who is in Jesus by a living faith, that may not reckon on being filled by Him. As the life-blood flows from the cistern-heart into each member and part of the body, so do the tides of life and love that emanate from the heart of Jesus pulse against the doors of all believing hearts, to find an entrance, less or more. Thou canst not be in his Body without participating in the wealth of his nature. He fills all.

And He fills all in all. The heart, with its keen power of enjoyment or sorrow. The mind, with its marvellous ability of tracking the footsteps of the Creator. The sense of humour and the sense of reverence. The hours of recreation and the hours of meditation. The days of work and the days of worship. All in all.

He cannot do otherwise, without robbing or impoverishing Himself. For, as each part of the plant is needed to fill up the measure of its ideal, and as each member is required to fulfil the complete conception of a man, so each one of the members of Christ's mystical body, the Church, is essential to the manifestation of his fulness. He needs thee and me, or there will be some portion of his fulness which will never be able to manifest itself. But as sure as we present ourselves to Him, there will be an infilling of our nature with Himself, as the chill morning air, at dawn, becomes suddenly radiant with sunbeams.

Eph. iii. 19. Christ's fulness is measureless.—There is no limit to the infinite nature of our Lord. The fulness of Deity is resident in Him. Only God the Father knows Him, and no other being, saint or seraph, beside. An angel with drooping wing might be imagined as reaching the furthest limit of space and beholding the last of the stars; but it is impossible to conceive of any limit whatsoever to the love, or power, or patience of Jesus. The ocean is shoreless. The height unsearchable. The depth bottomless. Such is Jesus that there is no common standard by which to compare Him with the greatest and noblest and eldest created spirit in the universe of God. You might compare such a one with the aphidæ on a leaf, for they are alike finite; but you cannot compare the finite and the infinite.

All that fulness is for us. We are settlers on the continent of Christ's infinite nature, and we are at liberty to go on putting back the walls of our enclosure, so as to take in an ever-growing share of our inheritance. But we need never fear that we shall touch its furthest limit. When we have spent a million years exploring and appropriating, we shall know as little of its real contents as the Pilgrim Fathers knew of that America which has reared itself on the foundations they laid. Though our capacities to receive out of Christ's fulness were increased a thousandfold, all their need would be as regularly and constantly met as at this present hour, because the nature of God awaits to feed them, and we may count on being filled up to the measure of the fulness of God.

That measure will always be beyond us. We may therefore rest in perfect satisfaction that we cannot exhaust it; and yet we may ever strive in our poor measure to attain more nearly towards it. The Mediterranean is ever losing volumes by evaporation, and yet it is always full, because it can draw by the Straits of Gibraltar on the Atlantic. And its tidelessness may well become the emblem of the peace and restfulness of that soul which has learnt the secret of taking into itself the blessedness of Jesus.

Eph. iv. 10. This power to fill was won by Christ in his Death and Resurrection.—He did not ascend till He had first descended. Always death before resurrection, stooping before rising: the garden and the cross before the Ascension Mount.

But as surely as these come first, the others follow. He who condescended to the fashion of a man, and thence to death, even the death of the cross, must ascend by the very laws of that spiritual world, which He obeyed. "Wherefore God highly exalted Him." "Thou art worthy, for Thou wast slain."

And being by the right hand of God exalted, He received of the Father the promised plenitude of the Spirit. It had been his before, as the second Person in the Holy Trinity, but it became his now as the Representative and High Priest of his people. It was entrusted to Him as their Trustee and Surety. As we receive the fulness of forgiveness from his death, so we might receive the fulness of the Spirit from his life.

There is no soul so low in its need, but He can touch it, because He has descended into the depths of Hades, and now from the zenith throne of his ascended glory He can reach the furthest and remotest points of spiritual need, as the sun can cover a wider area when it sits regnant in the sky at noon, than when pillowing its chin upon the western wave.

Eph. iv. 13. Our Growth in the Body is to be worthy of the Head.—In a caricature you will sometimes see a large head on a very diminutive and dwarfed body; but there will be no disparity between the Head and the Body when the Divine workmanship is complete.

We are diminutive and dwarfed just now, but as we abide in Him we shall grow and expand until each member of the mystical Body shall fill out to its complete proportion, and the ideal man shall stand forth before the gaze of the universe, in the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

But this can only be when each joint shall supply to the whole its appropriate nutriment, and when we all give ourselves unweariedly to the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God.

Eph. v. 18. This Fulness must be Received.—The fulness is in Jesus, but we must take it. It is not enough even to pray; we must reverently and humbly appropriate its stores. "Give me this water," must be the cry of each, "that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw."

There are three methods indicated here by which the filling process may be hastened:

1. Give yourselves to holy song; if not with the lip, then in the heart, and with the music of a loving, trustful spirit, and the rhythm of a life attuned to the will of God.

2. Give thanks always for all things. Some of God's best gifts come in the roughest cases. When you see your Father's handwriting in the direction, kneel down and thank Him for the contents before you unpack them. All must be food that comes from Him.

3. Give submission and subjection to one another, except in matters that touch conscience and the demands of God. But, above all, learn the secret of an appropriating faith, that goes to God with its need, and dips its empty pitcher down into the fulness of Jesus, and takes up at any moment of the day the supply of its thirst, not trying to feel any joy or exhilaration or emotion, but daring to believe where it cannot discern, and to act on its sure reckoning that it does receive that which it asks of God.

Too often God's ships come laden to our wharves, but we are not there to discharge them. Too often his couriers bring love letters, but we are asleep and they pass our doors. Too often his showers pass over the hills, but we do not catch their blessed fulness to fertilise and enrich our fields.

SOLDIERS' CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

This Association was founded in 1886 by Miss Deacon, in order to unite Christians in the Army without interfering with the work carried on in the various Soldiers' Homes. The idea is to provide Christian fellowship and helpfulness, and to encourage Christian soldiers to act upon unconverted comrades.

This Association is now an auxiliary of the Y.M.C.A., and it is believed that this union will be the means of leading many earnest Christian men to work amongst soldiers wherever they have the opportunity, both at home and abroad, and it will be the means of giving Christian soldiers an introduction, on leaving the Army, into civil life through the Y.M.C.A. This introduction will be very valuable to our time-expired men, as there is hardly a town of any importance in the United Kingdom which has not a branch of the Y.M.C.A. All who are interested in the spiritual welfare of young men, will, we feel sure, sympathise with and co-operate with this endeavour to reach young men now serving in the Army.

In the Officers' Prayer Union there is a membership of 386 officers, and we have reason to believe that this mission to soldiers, at home and abroad, will commend itself to their Christian sympathy and support.

The headquarters of the Association will be at the Soldiers' Institute, Portsmouth, where all the secretarial work will be done gratuitously, so that whatever funds may be contributed will be applied to the direct work of the Association. An organising secretary will visit the different garrisons, where missions will be held for the men, and societies formed, as branches of the Association, until every regiment has a band of Christian men within it. Funds will be required for the support of the organising secretary, his travelling expenses, and also for the free distribution of religious literature. The services of Mr. A. H. Wheeler have been secured. Miss Deacon, who originated the S.C.A., will remain one of the hon. secretaries, and Mr. J. Gelson Gregson, the superintendent of the Soldiers' Institute at Portsmouth, will also be an hon. secretary. In India the Association has been maintained by Mr. W. B. Harington, the founder of the Soldiers' Prayer Rooms. Correspondence and contributions should be directed to Mr. J. Gelson Gregson, the Soldiers' Institute, Portsmouth.

"THE LEAGUE OF PITY," the children's auxiliary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, seeks to enlist the happy children of the land in service of the unhappy and ill-treated. In furtherance of this loving effort a nicely got-up and prettily illustrated paper for the little ones is now issued. It certainly wants a terser title, The Children's League of Pity Paper being long and awkward for a name. The contents are delightful, and it ought to be very largely circulated. It is published by the N.S.P.C.C., 7, Harpur-street, W.C.

"NOBODY STEALS IN KHAMA'S COUNTRY."—A loaded wagon left by the roadside at night unguarded, would be found next morning untouched. Of what European state could as much be said? Drunkenness is unknown in Khama's Country! and all traffic in alcoholic drinks forbidden. When shall we be able to boast the same of our favoured England? Morning by morning Khama gathers his court and soldiery around him for divine worship, and insists that his sub-chiefs shall do the same; and twice every Sabbath does he stand up in his own capital and preach the Gospel to his listening subjects—faithfully, simply, and fearlessly proclaiming Christ.—*M. Apocalyptic Scenes.

By Sir S. Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B.

XXI.

THE ANGEL OF THE COVENANT.

We have arrived, in our interpretation of the Apocalypse on the historical scheme, at that point which is known as the termination of the middle or dark ages. And dark they were indeed, not merely intellectually, but spiritually. The pure religion of Jesus Christ had been degraded into worse than Paganism. The condition of Christendom was as described in the closing verses of the ninth chapter—idolatries and demon-worship, murder and sorceries (or lying miracles), fornications and thefts! Anything darker or fouler it is almost impossible to conceive. And all this had been brought about by Satan's craft, through the working of the mystery of iniquity, the rise and progress of Nicolaitanism, or priestcraft (denounced by Christ as "that thing which I hate"), and the corrupting influence of the false teachers symbolised by the Jezebel of Thyatira. The great apostasy from the faith, foretold by Paul in 2 Thess. ii., had set in; the "letting" power of Imperial Rome, which the early Christians, such as Irenæus, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hippolytus, and others, all understood to be the alone obstacle to the manifestation of Antichrist, had long ago been taken out of the way, and the "man of sin," whose advent was expected to succeed that removal—the power which, sitting in the temple, or Church of God, claimed divine attributes, even to be "as God"—had arisen in that superhuman strength which was derived, as we afterwards learn, from the bestowal upon him of Satanic power, and place, and great authority.

The few and small bodies of true Christians, who still, amidst terrible persecutions from Papal Rome, witnessed for Christ, were scattered about, almost hidden from view. Centuries of chastisement, first by the Goths, then by the Saracens, and lastly by the Turks, had failed to awaken to a sense of their guilt the paganised masses of professing Christendom, who turned with yet greater fervour to their false religion, and abandoned themselves still more greedily to their abominable and shameless deeds. The ages were dark indeed, and we can imagine with what dismay and grief the seer witnessed the downward course of the prophetic history, as one after another of the panoramic scenes passed before him. Well might he despair of any recovery of the Church of Christ, which he so intensely loved, from the depth to which she had fallen.

But suddenly, to his joy, a glorious burst of light illuminates the terrestrial landscape. A mighty Angel, cloud-apparelled and rainbow-crowned, his countenance effulgent as the sun, and with feet as pillars of fire, descends from heaven. He claims land and sea as his; in his hand is a little book open; his voice is as when a lion roareth.

Can the symbol be mistaken? It is the shining forth once more of the Sun of Righteousness; it is the manifestation of the covenant of grace, the appearance of One of irresistible might, opening to the benighted world the blessed Word of God so long closed and hidden. In allusive contrast to the power that reigned over the earth (the actual possessor of which bore the name of Leo, and whose medal, struck at the very time, depicted him as the Lion of the tribe of Judah), his voice is lion-like in its majestic utterance, and in the attitude assumed is a further and most striking allusion to the blasphemous pretensions of the Antichrist, who, sitting (whence the term "ex cathedra" and "cathedral," or "seat") in the temple, or visible church, showed himself that he was God (2 Thess. ii. 4). These pretensions can still be seen represented in the paintings in the Genoese and Florentine Arcs between the Castle of St. Angelo and the Vatican. In the former stands the Pope, resplendent in brightness, a rainbow above, and with a legend below declaring that "The world hath been unveiled to light; the King of Glory has come forth." In the latter he is exhibited with one foot on the land, the other on the sea, having two keys in his hands, wherewith he opens heaven and purgatory, and beneath the legend, "In thy hand I behold the empire of earth, and sea, and heaven."

And these "great things and blasphemies" were no idle boasts in the eyes of men. As the Vicar of Christ, or Vice-Christ (the literal translation of "Anti-Christ"), the Papacy "declared, defined, and pronounced" (as it does still) "that it is essential to the salvation of every human being that he be subject to the Roman Pontiff." There was not a dignity, title, or office of the Saviour that was not claimed by, and accorded to, the Pope. Worship was rendered to him as if to God. To him were applied the promises that all princes and all nations should serve the Messiah. He dispensed forgiveness and salvation, he exercised power "over all kindreds and tongues and nations"; emperors, kings, and peoples bowed before him. But now the truth once more shines forth—the Book of God is opened wide—the prerogatives of "the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings," and Saviour of men are restored to their rightful owner; the dawn of a brighter day is witnessed; the times of the glorious Reformation are seen to commence. Yet ere the mighty Angel's words are distinctly apprehended by the prophet, seven thunders roll their voices through the heavens, and he is about to record them, when a divine prohibition arrests his hand. They must not be written, for they are not true (contrast ch. xix. 9 and xxi. 5); they are the thunders of the seven-hilled city. How strikingly the impulse in the mind of the Apostle, who here appears again as an actor in the drama, depicts the struggle which took place in the thoughts of the Great Reformer, Luther, when, not yet fully discerning the Papacy as the Antichrist, he was on the point of submitting himself to the bulls fulminated from Rome. But gradually the awful truth becomes clear to him, the "write not" is impressed upon his soul, and the Papal thunders are committed to the flames as "infernal voices," outside the walls of Wittenberg.

And now commence the solemn utterances of the Angel of the Reformation.

First, he declares that the end of the dispensation is approaching, but that the time for its actual winding up or consummation is not yet. [The words, "time shall be no longer," may either be translated "there shall be no more delay," or, as some have thought, "there shall be no more a time" (i.e., a prophetic time or year). Under no circumstances can they mean that what we understand by "time," i.e., duration, shall cease.] That end, the completion of the mystery of God, he announces, and confirms it by an oath, than which there could be no greater, shall take place at the time when the seventh angel shall begin, or be about, to sound.

Most cheering and glorious proclamation! And to the Reformers—Luther, Melancthon, Latimer, Foxe, and others—who had discerned that they were living in the times of the Sixth Trumpet, the announcement that the sound of the Seventh was not far distant, and that it would complete the mystery of God, proved indeed an inspiriting truth.

Next, he delivers to the prophet, still an actor himself, the little book open, with the command to take and eat it, and then to prophesy or preach to many peoples and nations and tongues and kings. Here was the Divine commission to the Reformers. Well did they understand it. The Word of God was their joy and strength, it was in their mouth as "sweet as honey;" and, as with their prototype Ezekiel, that word became in them a mighty, energising, impelling power. The preaching of the Gospel, supplanted for centuries by the lying legends of Romanism, and existing but in a few places through such agencies as Wycliff's "poor priests" in England, and John Huss in Bohemia, was now revived in wonderful strength. Translations of the Bible began to be multiplied, and not in Germany only, but in Sweden, Denmark, Pomerania, Livonia, France, Belgium, Spain, England, and even in Italy to some extent, the sound of the blessed Gospel was heard. The Word of God was no longer bound; the little book was opened indeed, and, thanks be to Him, has so continued to this day. Woe to that church or land which neglects the Divine commission, which substitutes sacraments for the preaching of the Gospel, and makes its ministry a sacerdotal caste instead of heralds of the Cross of Christ. The command of the Lord is first and foremost "to preach the Gospel."

Lastly, the Apostle is directed to measure the temple of God, and to draw a very marked dividing line between the worshippers at the altar and the Gentiles in the outer court.

There is surely no room for misinterpretation here. The Re-Formation of the Churches in their constitution and character was to follow the Reformation of doctrine brought about by the preaching of the Gospel. "The temple of God" is the Church in its entirety. "The worshippers at the altar" are the true servants of God, who cling to the one Altar, the one Sacrifice, the one Priest Mediator, and Jesus Christ. "The Gentiles" are those who, though thronging the temple courts, yet know not God, and are not recognised as worshippers by Him. They are practically heathens, and are ipso facto "excommunicate." Their outer-court condition was, indeed, no new thing. "It hath been given" implied that it had already existed, though it was only now expressly declared.

And that this Re-Formation of the Churches throughout Europe immediately succeeded the blessed revival which came through the preaching of the Gospel, is a well-known fact. Every reader of history is aware of how the first care of the Reformers, Princes as well as Preachers, was to bring about, as far as in them lay, such a reconstruction of the Protestant bodies in different lands as would ensure their stability and permanence. To their efforts we owe the organisation of most of the evangelical churches throughout Christendom. They obeyed the command to "Rise and measure the temple of God."

In closing our consideration of this part of the vision, are we not constrained to admire its beauty, and its wonderful appropriateness to the events which it foreshadowed? Is it possible for the unexpected, the glorious facts of Reformation times to be more strikingly exhibited by prophetic symbolism? The sweet dawn of Gospel light in its leading doctrines of Justification by faith and covenant grace (the sun of righteousness and the rainbow), the mimic thunders from the city of the seven hills—the unfolding of the precious Word of God, the revival of the preaching of the truth through every land, and the reconstruction of the churches—are not these all set forth with a marvellous suitability and graphic force which confirm the correctness of that interpretation of the Apocalypse which has through long ages—though with some natural differences of opinion—been held by Protestants? If any portion of the book proves that it is the history of the present dispensation Divinely predicted, surely it is the vision of the chapter before us.

THE GOSPEL IN THE VILLAGES.

In sending out an attractive booklet, "Village Miracles," giving some account of Gospel work in the rural districts, Mr. J. E. Taylor, hon. manager of the Bucks Evangelistic Mission, says:—"We seek your earnest prayers and practical sympathy. In two villages especially, which we have visited this summer with a Gospel caravan, the need of an iron mission room is very great. In each village from 200 to 300 people are thirsting for the Gospel which they have never heard, for there is no chapel or meeting-place of any description, and owing to Ritualistic influence, no villager dare place a cottage at our disposal for services. There is, however, one piece of ground available, and it is very sad to leave all these people crying from the depths of their heart, 'Come over and help us,' and feel that we are unable to respond. Open-air meetings are being attended with much blessing, but, of course, these must be discontinued at the close of the summer season, at the very time when they should be carried on, as the winter is the best for getting the people together.

"In addition to this, the colportage work must immediately be given up, unless we receive speedy help, for we are already far behind. We know of churches where many thousands are spent annually, and yet the small sum of £40 a year for one such worker (taking a district of twenty-six villages) is the means of blessing to more souls in twelve months than in several years where these large sums are expended. Must this glorious field of God's vineyard be left fallow? Again, funds are urgently needed for our farm home for poor London children. Surely many could help us to continue this Christ-like work to brighten the lives of the little ones, yet we have not received one shilling this year towards its maintenance. Owing to these great difficulties we fear we shall have to stop this blessed work of village evangelisation, for we are at the present time £80 overdrawn at the Bank, and the coming winter will be one of the worst ever known financially, for through the serious agricultural depression many men are already out of work and in need, a need, too, which will increase as the season advances."

Communications for Mr. Taylor should be addressed. "Bible and Tract Depôt, Aylesbury, Bucks."

THE COWCADDENS, GLASGOW.

It is now rather more than six weeks since we felt distinct indications of coming blessing. To the readers of The Christian the work, which has been carried on nightly without a break for nearly ten years, is by no means new. You have once and again chronicled the Lord's goodness to us. But our experience has been at times like that of miners, who seem to have exhausted all workable materials, and, coming right up against a thick stratum of hard rock, find that this must be got through at any cost, that they may reach the treasure lying beyond. So we set ourselves to prayer, to lay hold on God for the blessing.

In the month of May our district always undergoes great change in its dwellers—many old friends go and others, unknown by us, take their places. Quite recently we found 144 families in narrow compass without any visible church connection. These became our special care. By two pioneer missions and other agencies certain localities were reached, and outcasts were won, but the district needed, and we desired, larger blessing. Our first help of a special kind came from the London Evangelisation Society (Scottish branch); and their agent, had but entered on his work when the indications of blessing became manifest. His health failed for a little, and he had to leave us for a time, only to reap large blessing since at Helensburgh. The curse of our district is strong drink and its consequent evils. The Free Church of Scotland Temperance Society came to our aid, and their special deputy, laboured for a week with good success, several interesting and hopeful cases of conversion appearing as the fruit of his labours. "Glasgow Fair" time was coming on. Some 250,000 persons are said to have left the city, most of them being away for ten days, and some for a fortnight or more. Such a time is usually thought to be unfavourable to the success of a mission, as the attendance is necessarily small. Still, the faithfulness of God and former experience taught us to go forward. Having obtained the promise of help some time previously, for a fortnight's mission, from we resolved to proceed. She began on Glasgow Fair Sabbath, and the attendance from the outset was surprising to ourselves, there being present that night between 800 and 900 persons, and at the close a large number of inquirers. The address was on "The Unpardonable Sin." The subject was wisely and ably handled, and the truth told on many of those present. The attendance at the nightly meetings increased, until, by the following Sabbath, the large church, which is seated for close on 1200, was well filled in the afternoon, and in the evening was quite full. A series of Bible readings given daily at three o'clock in the Christian Institute was so largely attended, and with such manifest blessing to believers, that the small hall was crowded out by Friday, and removal to the large hall became necessary.

MR. ROBERT MACLEAN

MR. JOHN MACDONALD,

The services of the second Sabbath made a deep impression at Cowcaddens, and people began coming during the week from the remoter parts of the city and from the country, and the names were found on the cards used in the Memorial Hall, which we found very convenient for an enquiry room. The addresses on the "Atonement in Genesis iv.," "The Day of Atonement," and "The Great White Throne" appeared to be specially fruitful in results; while the Bible readings on "The Secret of Failure" and that on "The Clean Heart" proved most helpful to many earnest but struggling believers.

During the second week the attendance increased more largely still, until by Friday every inch of room was occupied, and people were standing in the passages. We were very anxious that if possible she should prolong her mission, and this she generously agreed to do, extending it to the following Wednesday. We also requested her to redeliver the address on "The Atonement in Genesis iv.," as marked blessing attended its first delivery. We were not disappointed, for on Sabbath evening not only was the church crowded, and an overflow filled the Pillar Hall, but hundreds had to leave without entrance.

The scene in the Memorial Hall at the close was memorable, where workers and inquirers were busy till nearly eleven o'clock. In the Pillar Hall the interest was about equally intense, and many stood up to own their desire to be found on the Lord's side. Altogether it was such a Sabbath as we had not experienced before for the manifested power of the Holy Ghost in deep conviction of sin, and the sinner's conscious need of a Saviour. The Bible readings during the week were also largely attended, and greatly blessed to many, specially those on "Rest" and "The Secret of Victory."

THE THIRD WEEK

began with such indications of large blessing that all our workers greatly regretted the mission could not be prolonged, and on the Tuesday night about as many entered the inquiry room as on Sabbath evening. Wednesday was an "all-day meeting," beginning at ten o'clock with prayer; at eleven o'clock Mrs. Baeyertz gave a Bible reading on "The Talents," which proved most helpful, specially to timid Christians and workers. At three o'clock the subject was "The Baptism of the Holy Ghost," and in the evening the address was on "Holiness," while admission was only by ticket. Still, before 7.30 the church was crowded, and the overflow more than filled the Pillar Hall. This necessitated her speaking twice, but the remarkable thing was that those in the Pillar Hall waited till the first meeting in the church was ended, and the second, or consecration, meeting was begun, when they could get in and take their place in the meeting. When the united gathering was called to order, there were fully 1000 persons ready to take part in a service which will be for ever memorable to all who were privileged to be present. As one of our workers put it to-night, "We have heard with our ears of the Lord's doings, and we have read of the Spirit's gracious working; but now we have seen it with our own eyes, and we praise the Lord for his loving-kindness."

We have not yet been able to test the results which are in our hands, but we do know that the harvest is great and blessed. We also know that many believers have received a wonderful reviving and refreshing, and are now walking in "the comfort of the Holy Ghost." Mrs. Baeyertz is an evangelist of exceptional power. Her knowledge of the Word and of the human heart, as well as her experience of seventeen years in the work, qualify her to deal with souls, and the Spirit of God uses her wonderfully to win them for the Saviour. All our workers have had such blessing and comfort in the work and in co-operating with Mrs. Baeyertz, that they advise all Christian workers, and speeially soul-winners, not to lose any of the services conducted by her.

THE CRY OF THE LEPERS.

Dear Sir,—I have received two most touching letters from the Rev. H. Uffmann, a German missionary, who is in charge of our largest asylum—one of the most successful in India—in reply to a very peremptory one from me telling him that he must on no account admit any more lepers at present, as our funds would not admit of it. Mr. Uffmann writes:—

Will you now take the responsibility upon you as regards those lepers I have to turn out from the asylum on account of having no money for them? Either we must let them remain in the asylum, or they will die somewhere below the trees, or some other shelter, without being protected. They often reach here very weary and tired, unable to go further, but longing for rest only, which they hope to get in the asylum, but according to your letter I cannot receive them. Does this mean "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes"? No, I think the meaning is to double them (the tears) for money's sake!

I think the gracious God has plenty of money, and therefore He sends these great sufferers to be provided for here. Have we now a right to turn them away? and if so, shall we not hear the words as Christ says: "I was a stranger, and ye did not take Me in?" Will you and your honoured committee be like the priest and Levite, or will you not rather come down and look at their wound, and put some oil and wine into it, and give them some binding up? Will you not be good enough to put them upon your beast, and lead them into the inn or asylum at Purulia, and provide for them?

I think you have nothing to say against admission into the asylum, but your iron safe does not permit it! I am quite sure God the Almighty will give you the money in due time, if He has not already done so. I can only say, what I have told you before, in my last letter, and often times, I cannot drive away these helpless ones, you must first drive away myself. God must and will give you the money, I feel sure. I therefore repeat my petition, and ask you to be kind enough, and grant my request; it is not for myself. I have asked the Lord for the money, and He will give it. I must have the money for at least 250 adults.

How thankful will those be to you when you will see them in heaven in the glory of God for being admitted. Last Sunday we had sixty-six baptisms in the asylum—that was a grand day!

Yours in the work of the Lord for the lepers,

Wellesley C. Bailey.

WORK IN ROTTERDAM.

As a worker here in the Netherlands, and as leader of the Salvation Army in this country, I was very much interested in all that your correspondent (Mr. A. A. Harmer) said about Rotterdam. The scenes of sin, misery, and immorality are not overdrawn or exaggerated. The Salvation Army mourns over this state of things in common with your correspondent. Indeed, I am sometimes tempted to repeat twenty times a day when in Rotterdam, "No man layeth it to heart." I suppose Hamburgh, Rotterdam, and San Francisco are known throughout the world as among the most immoral, if not the worst, cities of the world. But I am sure it will interest your readers to know there is a bright side to the dark picture your correspondent truthfully and graphically draws.

The Salvation Army has for several years been at work in the city of Rotterdam. Perhaps in no one city in Holland have we had more difficulty; but on the other hand in no city have we had more beautiful cases of conversion, or accomplished more lasting good. We have established two shelters where the very worst are taken in, and where till recently fifty to sixty Russian Jews found shelter every night. We have also several workshops, two flourishing corps, and one garrison for the training of officers. Under the very shadow of the street whose horrors your correspondent described, we have opened a penny shelter where women one side, men the other, are sheltered. Here are witnessed scenes that often of our brave workers, for it is in this building that we are often able to gather these fallen women, who pour into our ears the wretched tales of their woe and sin. But it is here, too, where many a one has begun a new life by giving her heart to the Magdalene's best Friend.

A little incident struck me the other day as beautifully illustrative of another feature of our work in this very building. Two German women, married years ago to two Russian Jews, were driven from Russia in the late anti-Semitic movement. In their flight the wives got lost, and after wandering through Germany and Holland were picked up by our people at Rotterdam. After some weeks they became truly converted and were entirely changed in their lives, accepting Christ as their Saviour. It was quite beautiful to see their gratitude and their joy. In the meantime we had done our best by every kind of inquiry to find their husbands, but they could nowhere be found. At last we printed a card with the names and full particulars of the husbands wanted, and distributed these wholesale amongst the crowds of emigrants ever crossing to America. Imagine our joy a few weeks afterwards, when our officer stood on the deck of an American-bound steamer with our two women refugees and their six children, going to join their long-lost husbands!

ONE MORE INCIDENT

connected with Rotterdam, and this time from America. A young man, holding a good situation, becomes a victim to all the forms of sin mentioned by your correspondent. Through drink and immorality he loses his situation, and emigrates in despair to America, where, through the demon drink, he sinks still lower. Friends, honour, situation all gone, he enters a meeting of the Salvation Army, and becomes so changed in his life that our people in America have given him some work of oversight in the social wing, and his one desire is to return to his native land to work for the salvation of his fellow-countrymen. I would not have lingered so long on these two incidents, but they formed a remarkable coincidence in our work in Rotterdam.

Your readers will be interested to hear that we are proposing to start a rescue-home in the neighbourhood of Rotterdam—the first and only one of its kind in the city. If any, either Dutch or English, is interested in this or any other part of our work, we shall be most happy to communicate with them. There are now in Holland over 200 officers, sixty-five corps and outposts. We have also six shelters, eight workshops, and one poor man's metropole, and during last year not less than 74,822 lodgings were given, and 312,832 meals supplied. As Holland is interlaced with rivers and canals, we have had during last year two ships, which have visited nearly 100 towns and villages, and brought the Gospel to over 30,000 people.

African Missions Visited.—8.

By D. A. HUNTER.

To give any description of Lovedale, without making mention of the Galla boys and girls, would be to leave out one of the most interesting features of the Institution. Their story reminds one of the early history of Joseph, multiplied sixty-fold, and makes one hope that in the sequel they may prove as beneficial spiritually to their own people as did Joseph in preserving the lives of his father and brethren. The story has already been told, but doubtless some who read this may not have heard it, so I venture to give its brief outline.

These forty-two boys and twenty-two girls were captured in Gallaland, the region lying immediately south of Shoa and Abyssinia. In reading the stories of their lives, made up from the information they themselves have been able to give, one finds that nearly all were kidnapped, either after some tribal feud, or without any occasion whatever. Several were surprised while playing near their own homes, seized, gagged, and carried off to be sold as slaves. After being bartered more or less frequently, these boys and girls were shipped along with many others to Araito, near the head of the Bay of Tajurrah, with intent to take them across the Red Sea. This short passage is usually made under cover of dark, to escape any British cruiser which may be on the outlook, so that only when dhows are becalmed is there much risk of their being captured.

But to quote the graphic narrative of Captain Gissing, of H.M.S. Osprey, who reported as follows:—"It leaked out that certain dhows laden with slaves were expected to leave the African coast about the 14th September, bound for Mocha, of coffee celebrity, where there is an immense market for slaves. We accordingly dodged about the Arabian coast, just within sight of land, for a few days, until we had Mocha on the port beam, and the masthead man reported three dhows right ahead bearing towards us. Soon realising their danger in the neighbourhood of a British ship of war, they scattered in different directions, and were fired upon with blank cartridge as a hint to drop their sails. Taking no notice of this friendly suggestion, a shot was sent across the bow of the nearest, but with no greater effect. Consequently we cleared for action and opened fire on their masts and sails, being careful not to hit the hulls, lest there should be a sacrifice of innocent life. As it became quickly evident that the slavers cared nothing for warfare conducted on this humane principle, our Gardner machine-guns in the tops were brought to bear, with the result that in a short time one dhow lowered her sail, an example followed by the others soon after. The prizes were now boarded by armed boats' crews, brought alongside the Osprey, and then made fast astern.

"The work of transferring the slavers' crews immediately commenced, of whom some thirty-three men had survived. These were made prisoners, and a more thorough set of Arab rascals it would be difficult to find. Immediately the thirty-three ruffians were properly secured, the slaves, 213 in number, including three killed during the chase, were passed on board the Osprey. Except four men, all the rest were women and children, and their condition, particularly that of the little boys, was heartrending to witness. The latter looked like ebony skeletons, many of their wee, miserable bodies exhibiting the traces of recent ill-treatment. All of them nearly had to be lifted on board, their limbs being so cramped by confinement. But once out of the filthy boats that brought them from Africa the demonstrative greetings they bestowed on one another as they met on the deck of the Osprey were peculiarly affecting; hugging, kissing, and crying with delight were the order of the hour. Two young girls particularly attracted notice. They seemed to be about fifteen and sixteen years of age, were very good-looking, and evidently sisters. The elder was brought on board first, where she watched with the most intense eagerness until she saw her sister handed through the port, when, with a shriek of joy, she bounded to meet her, clasped her neck, and covered her with caresses.

"At the shipping of the slaves a mother and her four children had got separated, and placed in different dhows, but their reunion now was something rarely to be witnessed, and the sight of their frantic ecstacy in each other's arms left hardly a dry eye on the steamer's quarter-deck."

The captives were landed at Aden, and the Keith-Falconer Mission was asked to take over all or part of them, and after telegraphic communication with the committee in Edinburgh, they received thirty-nine boys and twenty-three girls at the Mission station. Sickness soon broke out among them, carrying off quite a number, and it was soon seen to be advisable to find another home for the Galla family. The number had been augmented by a few others who had been captured subsequently, so that the party which left Aden for South Africa mustered sixty-four—twenty-two girls and forty-two boys. Two have died at Lovedale—one a boy and the other a girl—and the kindness and care bestowed upon these two sick ones by the others during their tedious illness was touching to witness. They talk of their country and friends, and how their parents think them dead, or lost to them for ever, not knowing into what pleasant pastures God has led them.

Many of the boys have professed their faith in Jesus, and have been baptized, and last Sunday evening the last three girls were baptized. It has been one of the pleasures of Lovedale to have the opportunity of addressing these Gallas. Their attention is quite remarkable, and they seem to remember well the lessons conveyed to them. Will all who read this unite in prayer for Gallaland? Pray that, if it be God's will, He may fit them to go back to their own country as a band of missionaries, and that his hand will open the way and send them a leader. Thus shall Satan's very cruelty of kidnapping and slavery be turned into a pathway for the blessed Gospel of Christ.

TO INTENDING MISSIONARIES.

These hints are taken from a very useful address given by Rev. H. P. Beach, China, to the University men assembled at Mr. Moody's Summer School, Northfield, Mass. They, of course, presuppose the essential preparation of the soul in prayer and Bible study, and deal only with the more material side of a missionary's life.

I. Educational Preparation.
- (1) Logic, philosophy, mathematics, for mental discipline.
- (2) Elocution, rhetoric, debate, for facilitating expression.

All these of especial value in India, Japan, and Mohammedan lands.
- (3) Geology, botany, chemistry, as a means of interesting the natives, and instructing them in the wealth of their own country.
- (4) So also, physical geography, history, astronomy, of great use for illustrative purposes.
- (5) Ethics, terminology, and general all-round scholarship.

II. Physical Preparation.
- (1) Discover personal weaknesses of constitution, etc., and take precautions to ward them off abroad.
- (2) Develop bodily exercises as a means of interesting young men. It is important to teach those of the educated classes the value of exercise, especially in China and Japan.
- (3) Gymnastics will be found more suitable than athletics, but choose exercises requiring but little apparatus.

III. Medical Preparation (not as professionals, but amateurs).
- (1) Learn first aid to the injured.
- (2) Hygiene: specifics for common maladies (e.g., dyspepsia, toothache, etc.).
- (3) Dentistry: extraction, tartar, etc.

IV. Practical Preparation.
- (1) Things about a house: plastering walls, making a door, mixing and using paint, baking bread, etc.
- (2) Food: vegetable and fruit gardening; making wells, cisterns, etc.
- (3) Repairs: use of coarse and fine carpenters' tools.
- (4) Personal: hair cutting; undertaking (an unpleasantly frequent office in many parts).
- (5) Book-keeping, printing, bookbinding.

V. Religious Preparation.
- (1) Personal dealing with men.
- (2) Work among foreigners at home.
- (3) Street preaching.

THE BIBLE IN SPAIN.

A beautiful testimony to the value of the Word was given at one of our meetings a few Sundays ago by a man employed on the railway, and one of our best voluntary helpers. He reads the Scriptures to others, and persuades them to read them for themselves. Recently a son was added to his family, and both the man and his wife, without any interference on our part, decided not to have the child baptized by the priest. The other evening this man asked to be allowed to give his reasons publicly for thus separating from the Church of Rome. After a clear confession of faith in Christ only, which he attributed to the reading of the Word, he explained why he had not taken his child to be baptized.

He closed with the following words: "For many years the title-deeds of our inheritance have been in the hands of lawyers and scribes, who have with held them from us that we might not claim the fruits of our lawful heritage. By title-deeds I mean the New Testament. Now they have been liberated and are in our own hands. I therefore earnestly advise you all to study the Scriptures for yourselves, and if you cannot read learn to do so."

This man's wife has had the Scriptures from her childhood. When our Bible-carriage was in a neighbouring town more than twenty years ago, her father bought a Bible from one of our colporteurs, and it has been the daughter's constant study for years. I have a meeting for women in her house every Sunday, and I believe there are several Lydias among my hearers.

Some of the Testaments have been distributed in one or two neighbouring villages. To one of these we went a few Sundays ago, at the request of several persons who had read our books and wished to hear more of our teaching. The rector heard of our arrival and roused the mayor against us, so that we had to retreat; not, however, till we had distributed some portions, which will, I trust, be treasured and read in spite of the priests' warnings and threats.

When the hot weather is over we hope to make another attack on the village; at present the poor people are frightened by the conduct of the priest and mayor, and we should not find anyone bold enough to lend or hire us a room.

Last month we held a public examination of our day and night scholars. The large number of persons present all appeared greatly pleased with the proceedings. Many thus heard the Gospel for the first time from the lips of the children, and several were heard to express astonishment at the constant mention of "God and the Saviour," when, as they said, they had expected to hear only "bad things."

We need your prayers for the work in our hands in this land of darkness, ignorance, and superstition. At the same time, we have reason to rejoice and give thanks for the open ears and hearts we have met with during the time we have been in this place. We are praying and trusting for greater works to follow. Elizabeth Lawrence.

Girgenti, Sicily.

In a short time in Girgenti, we shall have a much-desired Evangelical church, and that by means of our minister, Rev. Golia Mauro, who has been a very persevering and courageous man, notwithstanding the anonymous threatening letters received. Every Friday evening there have been in the drawing-room of Mr. Golia Mauro from thirty to fifty persons listening to his conferences, but now the heat prevents the hearers from coming.

We hope that when in September the church will be opened, many hearers will come and hear of the true religion of Christ.

AFTER MANY DAYS.—At Taltollah recently a Brahmin and his wife made a public confession of their faith in Christ. Considerable interest attaches to these cases of baptism. They illustrate the value of mission schools. The Scripture truths, more especially the story of the life and teaching of Jesus, which Mrs. Chatterjee learned when a pupil in the mission school, she never forgot. After her marriage she repeated to her husband the stories which she had heard and read many years before, and thus prepared his mind for the preaching which guided him to the feet of the Great Teacher.—Indian Methodist Times.

For the Young.

"I WANT TO BE GOOD, MOTHER."

"Stop reading a minute, Walter," said Mrs. Adams, "and just open the door. I think I hear quarrelling in the nursery." Walter instantly put aside the book he had been reading aloud to his mother, and opened the door. Sounds of angry childish voices fell on their ears. What could it all mean? Was nurse there? or were the children alone? Such were the thoughts which ran through the mother's mind. She must go up at once. Yet no, there was nurse's voice, so she would wait and just listen, hoping all would get settled soon.

Walter Adams was the eldest son of Mrs. Adams, and there were four children in the nursery. His father was a missionary in Africa. He had left his family just over two years ago. The day he left to go across the sea to teach the poor black people of a God who does love them and wants their love, was a very sad day to all the loved ones he was leaving, specially to his wife and eldest boy. The younger children kissed their father and said good-bye, feeling sad, not knowing exactly why, but yet mother was half crying, which puzzled them. When the father left he told Walter to be a brave big lad, take his father's place, and look after his mother "for father's sake," and to be good.

Walter felt he had a great responsibility, even though he was now only thirteen, but he was a comfort to his mother and loved her very much. When he came in from school he always looked out for her first, and gave her a kiss, "like father did," he would say; and then, if she looked tired or anxious, he would try and persuade her to lie on the couch while he sat close by or read to her. It was one of his special treats just before tea, to bring down one of his favourite books and read to her; to-day he was reading the "Life of Bishop Hannington." How he entered into all the particulars of the self-denials of this grand life, given to the service of the King of kings, fondly hoping one day he might be permitted to join this noble army, if only in a very humble way.

Walter was reading about Bishop Hannington's attempt to have an English Christmas plum-pudding, and he and his mother had laughed right heartily at the result. It was just at this point that a sudden noise was heard upstairs, which made Mrs. Adams listen.

Now that all was quiet again, the reading was continued. However, Mrs. Adams could not attend to the book as before: her thoughts would wander to that far distant land where her loving husband was working, having such a deep longing to see him again, and that their dear ones might feel the warm embrace and hear the loving counsel of that dear father. Then her thoughts turned to those little ones whom God has given to her to be a comfort, and for her to train for his glory.

Walter still read on, until Jane appeared with the tea-tray. Now no more reading would continue, for it was little Alice's happy time to come downstairs. If she had been good, and done her patchwork nicely, which Nurse was teaching her, she was always to have tea in the dining-room. It was not often she was absent. She was a good little maiden, just ten years old, rather delicate, and likely to be spoiled, but she did not seem to notice the attention towards her, and was a most lovable, gentle child. She could be trusted at any time with her younger brothers and sister, and was much grieved and troubled when they were naughty. Alice came down as usual, but looked rather more thoughtful and grave. Her mother thought perhaps she was not well, but she answered, "Oh, I am all right, mother, have you seen Charley?" "No, dear," replied her mother. "Where is he? Is he not in the nursery having tea?"

"Nurse has punished him," said Alice, "and put him in the bedroom to get good; and when he kicked and screamed and began coming down to you, nurse locked him in."

Mrs. Adams looked very grave, and leaving the room, said she would be back soon, but they were to go on with their tea. Mrs. Adams reached the nursery, and found a very quiet solemn tea-party there. The three children were sitting at the table eating their bread-and-butter, but none spoke as their mother entered. This was so unusual that Mrs. Adams asked Nurse what was the matter. Nurse said Charley had been disobedient to her, and unkind to the others when they were playing together, that she had punished him, and when he was to join them for tea, she had said no one was to speak to him.

Poor little man! he was only eight years old, but it was necessary for him to learn obedience while young; otherwise it would be a hard lesson for him to learn.

Nurse then told what his fault had been. Before Mrs. Adams left the nursery, Charley ran up to his mother with tears in his eyes, and said, "I so sorry mother, I will be good; kiss me, mother." So the mother kissed the little sorrowful upturned face, and told him, much to his disappointment, not to come down to see her after tea, but when he was in bed mother would come and see him before he went to sleep.

Then Mrs. Adams returned to her elder children, and read to them long letters which had arrived by that day's post from father, while they finished their tea.

We must now hasten on to the expected visit to Charley in bed. As the mother quietly reached the nursery landing, she heard a little voice saying, "Is that you, mother?" "Yes, dear." "Oh, I have been so longing for you to come, I thought you had forgotten me."

And then the mother sat by the little fellow's bed and held his hands in hers and said, "How is it you have been in bed so long? Hasn't nurse read to you, and have you said your prayers, Charlie?"

"No," sobbed the little fellow, "Nurse said she could not read to a naughty boy. God won't love me, so I couldn't say my prayers. I want to be good, mother, but it is so hard."

His mother felt sorry for the child, and bent over him and said, "Does mother love you, Charley?" "Yes," sobbed the child. "But you have been naughty. Does mother love naughty boys?" "But I am going to be good now, mother, I will be good." Then Mrs. Adams took her tearful boy on her knee and caressed him and said, "God loves you, my dear boy, now, although you have been naughty. God is grieved to see you naughty. It makes Him sad, but He loves you still, and wants you to tell Him you are sorry, and He will forgive you. Your mother is pained when you do wrong, and has to punish you, and nurse has to, also. When you are truly sorry they forgive you. God will forgive you at once if we ask Him. Let us kneel down now and ask Jesus to forgive your naughty temper of this afternoon. We will pray that God will give you his Holy Spirit, and teach you to be more obedient."

So they knelt down and prayed that God would wash away all the sins of that day, and that his Holy Spirit might live within the child's heart.

Before the mother left her child she gave him a little card with these words printed upon it: "O God, for Christ's sake, give me Thy Holy Spirit."

Charley said these words several times over to his mother, who then kissed him, and he soon fell asleep.

Dear children, will you, too, use this little prayer—use it when you rise in the morning, and when you go to bed at night, and any other time in the day? It is so short you can easily think of it, and when you feel naughty look up and pray: "O God, for Christ's sake, give me Thy Holy Spirit." I am sure you will find the help does come, and all feelings of wrong will vanish. Will you try?

God is in heaven—can He hear
A little prayer like mine?
Yes, thoughtful child, thou needst not fear,
He listeneth to thine.

FRESH AIR FOR LONDON CHILDREN.

The following letter, a type of several others, has been received by Mr. E. Wilson Gates, superintendent of the Philanthropic Work of the London Congregational Union, whose offices are at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C:—

A week has now elapsed since the return of our fifty rosy-faced and happy-hearted children from the life-renewing air of the beautiful village of Eynsford. And, having seen the marvellous change wrought in them by their fortnight's sojourn, and receiving so constantly the grateful acknowledgments and hearty thanksgiving of their parents, I feel constrained to let you know, and through you the subscribers, and if possible the non-subscribers, of our wealthy and other Congregational churches, of the immense advantage derived by our London poor from the Fresh Air Mission, of the London Congregational Union.

So much has already been said about the place (Eynsford), nestling among the lovely Kentish hills, that I need only remark that it is a model village exactly suited for this benevolent and Christ-like work; the scenery is ever-varying, and perfectly enchanting, the air salubrious and life-giving, and the cottagers, with whom the children are located, as also several of the farmers and fruit-growers, vie with each other in ministering to the wants and pleasures of their young visitors, manifesting ever a deep solicitude for their physical, moral, and spiritual welfare.

A new feature has been introduced this year which is of great advantage. Through the kindness of good Mr. Bowers, a piece of land has been set apart for the erection of a tent, in which the children assemble for their Sunday-school and services on the Sabbath, for meetings on week-evenings, and for play in showery weather. I had the privilege to attend one of the week-evening entertainments got up by the children themselves, and was greatly delighted. The tent is a great acquisition.

The children sent are selected with the greatest care. In my own case all children are first recommended by their Sunday-school teachers, then each case is carefully visited two or three times over to get all particulars about the child and the family, so that only the needy and deserving shall go. The fifty we sent were indeed poor, sick, halt and lame, pale-faced, weak-limbed, half-starved, and half-clad but for the Old Clothes Mission.

"Paralysis and general weakness," "Congestion of lungs," "Motherless and delicate," "Had rheumatic fever and left very weak," "Bad eyes and general debility," "Continued neuralgia"—these are specimens of the accounts sent of them. And the change in them all is most startling; so much so that in many cases the parents scarcely know their own children, and are delighted beyond measure at the marvellous change effected.

As to the children themselves, they have only one regret, that of being unable to stay longer with their country parents, leaving their "nice beds" and "beautiful gardens and fields" for the pent-up rooms and narrow streets and courts of London, with its foul air and moral pollution.

I hear with deep regret and sorrow that the fund bringing about all these beneficial results greatly languishes this year, and that a large balance remains due to you. I do hope I am wrongly informed. Can it possibly be that a work of such immense importance to the families of our London deserving poor should lack a hearty and liberal response from the Lord's stewards in our churches and through the country? It is without doubt a work of love and mercy, and one wishes for the eloquent tongue, or the pen of a ready and able writer, so as to reach the ear and touch the hearts of those who have it in their power to help forward such a needy and blessed work.—Yours gratefully,

(Rev.) B. Sackett.

CHILDREN'S SCRIPTURE UNION.—Portions for week ending August 19:—August 13, Matthew xx. 17-34; 14, xxi. 1-16; 15, xxi. 17-32; 16, xxi. 33-46; 17, xxii. 1-14; 18, xxii. 15-33; 19, xxii. 34-46.

RATCLIFF WELCOME HOME.—The muster of the "Christian Lifeboat Crew" on Tuesday week was well attended. The text for the month, "Rejoice in the Lord alway," given by Miss Child, formed the subject for the evening, in which Colonel Macgregor, Miss Tuck, Miss Williams, and many seafaring members took part. At the close several Christian sailors were commended to God in prayer prior to their departure on a voyage round the world.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 13.—PSALM III.

This morning Psalm, which falls into four strophes, three of them ending with Selah, may well have been composed by David when fleeing from Absalom. It is sad to think that though sin may be forgiven, it will sow the life with adversaries which taunt the soul and hem it in; but the worst that man can do may be borne with courage, so long as there is help for us in God.

Turn to Him, O stricken soul, and dare to tell Him, even amidst sorrows caused by thy sin, that He is still shield, and glory, and lifter-up of the head. Thy sin may have been dark and shameful, but it cannot intercept the cry that pierces the dark cloud, and brings an answer from God's Holy Hill. In David's case, every step of flight was putting a further distance between him and Sion. The ark itself had been sent back. But the answers kept coming from the Holy Hill. Mark that present tense. "He answereth."

It was but a little band of men that accompanied him, and they must needs sleep in the open, but God was shield and fortress, unseen and yet impregnable, behind which the Psalmist and his followers were safe. And in the consciousness that what God had done was but the earnest of what He would do, David speaks of victory as already secured and salvation already accomplished. Salvation belongs to God. It has been won by Christ in the very jaws of death, and therefore it is assured to all who are one with Him by a living faith.

MONDAY, AUGUST 14.—PSALM IV.

This evening Psalm corresponds to the former in some respects. It appeals for help, not only because of what God is, but because of what He has done. It would appear that when it was composed David was surrounded by men who were blaspheming the Name he loved, turning it into dishonour, and substituting in its place vanity and falsehood. But from these, he turns with comfort to the assurance that he belongs to God, and has been set apart, so that no real harm can befall him.

"Set apart for God!" As a piece of the rough hillside may be gathered in and terraced and enriched for the husbandman; or as a favourite slave might be the personal attendant of a centurion, always at hand to do this or that. Set apart, visited, valued, defended, enjoyed. "A people for his own possession." "Stand in awe," is rendered by St. Peter, "Be ye angry." But the idea in any case is to calm the irritation of God's foes, and to induce them to put aside the sin which underlay their rebellion. It was as if the Psalmist wished that the quiet musing of the night would pacify and still their souls.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 15.—PSALM V.

Where we are surrounded by our foes, as David was when he composed this Psalm, there is one side of our life they cannot block, and that is, its aspect towards Heaven; and at such times we need to make God hear our voice, lifting it up in the morning. Let us remember, however, not simply to lift up the voice, but to order the prayer, and to watch for the answer. Can you say to God, My King; and do you know what it is to spread your meditation before God (1 R.V.), for meditation itself is prayer? Do not hesitate to use the personal pronoun. Enter into thy closet, and shut thy door, and pray to thy Father in secret.

The holiness of God is set forth negatively (4, 5); positively (5, 6). How careful we ought to be that there be nothing in us that should make our prayer powerless, and even distasteful to God! We must always come into God's house in the multitude of his loving-kindnesses, and worship before Him in his house, which is his own abiding presence, with holy fear.

We all need leading in a plain way (8), because we are so liable to err. Perhaps there is no better sign of being led and filled by the Spirit, than that of habitual dependence upon God for the prompting of his Spirit.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 16.—PSALM VI.

When we are surrounded by our foes, and hemmed in by difficulty, we feel as if our physical life will break down beneath the strain. It is then that we understand the withering away of which the Psalmist speaks. But ah! how blessed to look away from the immediate cause of our suffering, and to attribute it to the permission of God. It is He who rebukes and chastens. The Gospel teaches us that none of our sorrows emanates from God's anger, for He is love. He wounds, that He may heal; He vexes sore, that He may take us to his heart for ever.

There are times when God seems to tarry unduly. Pain is hard to bear, and the leaden-stepping hours go slowly (3). But prayer is the resort of the tried soul, as it pleads with God to return, deliver, and save. And each because of the loving-kindness which is God's deepest motive, and because also the soul dreads entering a condition in which the union between itself and God shall be intermitted for but a moment.

The sleepless night is harder to bear than the day, and yet amid the wakeful watches, assurances sometimes steal in upon the troubled soul, which anticipate deliverance. The Lord hath heard; my enemies shall be ashamed. God hears and can interpret the voice of tears. Though we cannot always explain their meaning to ourselves or others, they speak to the heart of God, and the peace of God settles down upon the troubled soul. It is quieted and solaced, and becomes strong to do or suffer.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 17.—PSALM VII.

Some think that Cush was Shimei or Saul. It matters little, but throughout the note of this Psalm is triumphant and glad, as though the tried soul were confident of being righted. Take refuge in God, oppressed ones; shelter under his wings. Though the enemy roar as a lion, put God between him and thee, but be sure that thy heart is pure. Our attitude towards man is of the utmost importance in approaching God. How can that servant expect to be forgiven ten thousand talents, who takes his brother by the throat for a hundred pence?

Arise, lift up thyself and awake. God sometimes seems to sleep whilst evil goes unpunished, but it is not for long. Presently He assembles the peoples in the judgment-hall, and begins to minister judgment. Then his suffering saints are vindicated according to their integrity, whilst the wickedness of the wicked is brought to an end. O, blessed soul, which is so sure of God, so calm and still, because its shield is God, who saveth.

Now we can turn from our foes to our Judge, and from Him again to behold the fate of the ungodly. For all such, retribution is inevitable. Their weapons are turned against themselves; their pitfalls take their own feet; their mischief, like the boomerang of the savage, rebounds to their destruction. With a glad sense of the justice of God's dealings, the Psalmist gives thanks and sings praise.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 18.—PSALM VIII.

How blessed is the man who can say, our Lord or my Lord, and who can take a wide view of the earth, and be sure that everywhere God's character when rightly understood is only excellent. If this Psalm were composed at midnight, when the starry hosts shone with the brilliance of an Eastern sky, there was a special reason why David should turn from all the earth to see that same glory written in letters of fire upon the heavens.

How wonderful that God builds his castles (for so the word strength might be rendered) out of such weak materials as babes and sucklings. But as our Master suggested in the Temple courts, the songs of babes reach the abode of God from which He silences the foe. So, notwithstanding the glory of earth and heaven, the weakest believer is a more perfect revelation of God.

It is passing strange that amid such marvels man should be so much; and yet bigness is not greatness, and the palace is not so precious as the child over whose cradle a coronet is emblazoned. In man's original creation, in words quoted here from Genesis, God reach man his vicegerent. And though his crown was rolled from his head when he sinned, and perhaps assumed by the devil, yet there are lingering traces of his original greatness. And in the Lord Jesus Christ the royalty has been restored, and is realised by all who are one with Him by a living faith.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 19.—PSALM IX.

What triumph vibrates through this Psalm; the whole heart of the singer is stirred, and goes out in song. But how true he is in ascribing all to God. From the beginning to the end of this Psalm, there is no thought of his own prowess or strength, the Lord fills the whole field of vision. In our warfare against sin, how much we have to learn from the Psalmist. We trust our resolutions, or the help of the man, and make too little of God. There is too little of God in the life of most of us.

God is King; He judges the world; the balances are held equally in his hand; and though now the wicked sin with a high hand, they cannot prevail against the righteous, because God shelters his own, and will ultimately vindicate them, and avenge sin. When He makes inquisition for blood, He will not forget the cry of the poor. In the meanwhile let the oppressed make God their high tower in times of trouble.

True trust is founded on knowledge. We must know God's character before we can trust Him perfectly. If you can do no more than seek God, He will not forsake you. He will draw near in affliction, and lift you up from the gates of death, and bring you into the gates of the City of God, where you may show forth his praise. Yes, the time is coming for you to rejoice in his salvation.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

AUGUST 20.

Paul before Felix, Acts xxiv. 10-25.

Golden Text, 1 Cor. xvi. 13.

Our last lesson left Paul upon the stairs leading to the tower of Antonia, and about to address the people in the Temple court. The main incidents of the week that has passed since then are—(1) Paul's appearance before the Jewish Sanhedrim (xxii. 30 to xxiii. 10), where, with considerable adroitness, he turned the two parties in the council against themselves, and raised a tumult from which he was again rescued by the chief captain; (2) our Lord's appearance to him in the Roman prison (xxiii. 11); (3) the plot to murder him and its remarkable discovery and defeat (xxiii. 12—24). To escape from the Jews Paul is taken to Cæsarea, on the coast of the Mediterranean, and about forty-seven miles north-west of Jerusalem. It was the residence of Felix, the Roman governor. Philip the Evangelist lived here, and Paul would be encouraged by the memory of Cornelius, the Roman centurion, who was converted here about eighteen years before.

Paul on his Defence (10-23).—The case was opened against Paul by Tertullus, a professional advocate. The charges laid against him were three:—(1) Sedition; (2) heresy; and (3) profanation of the Temple (verses 5, 6).

Paul introduces his reply with proper respect for the position of Felix (10), but with none of the insincere flattery with which Tertullus had addressed him (2, 3). The Gospel teaches us to be courteous but not untruthful. The three charges are dealt with in order; and in each case Paul is content with putting the simple facts over against the charge.

Verses 11-13 deny the charge of sedition by stating the object of his recent visit to Jerusalem.

Verses 14-16 contain a reply to the charge of heresy. He did not meet this with a distinct denial, but avowed what was true, and gave an explanation. His present way of worship was heresy to the Jews (14). But it was the worship of the God whom the Jews professed to serve; and was not contrary to, but a fulfilment of, the teaching of their Scriptures (14). It was accompanied with a hope of the resurrection; and as they cherished the same hope, how could they call it heresy in him? (15) The life to which his convictions led him was one in which he "exercised himself," or disciplined himself to act rightly towards God and man (16).

Verses 17-21 meet the charge of profaning the Temple by a further statement of fact. He brought "alms"—i.e., sums of money collected from other churches for the disciples at Jerusalem; and "offerings," such as were required in connection with the Nazarite's vow. Paul skilfully strengthened his own case by asking for the presence of those Jews from Asia, with whom the charge had originated (18, 19, with xxi. 27). If the charge was true, would they not be there to prove it? If they were not there was it not because the charge was untrue?

Felix had lived in Cæsarea, where Christianity was well known. He was sufficiently acquainted with it to know that the charges of the Jews were untrue (22). The Jews are again defeated; and Paul enjoys for two years (27) a time of quiet and rest. He was a prisoner, but had considerable liberty (23). God is overruling the evil purposes of the Jews for the accomplishment of his own designs.

Paul as a Witness for Christ (24, 25).—Note (1) before whom he is called to witness. Felix was the freedman of the Emperor Claudius, by whom he was appointed Roman procurator. His brother Pallas held a high position at Court; and Tacitus says, that, trusting to his brother's powerful influence, Felix committed any wrong with impunity. He was avaricious, cruel, and licentious, wielding "the power of the tyrant in the temper of a slave." Drusilla was the daughter of Herod Agrippa I., who perished so miserably at Cæsarea (xii. 23), and sister to Agrippa II., who appears in xxv. 13.

(2) His theme. He chose one appropriate to the character of his audience (25). He discoursed not of the vices to which these two were addicted, but of the opposite virtues, and reminded them of the coming judgment in which sin will receive its due punishment. It was a bold thing for Paul to do; for a little before this Felix had employed the Sicarii to murder Jonathan, the high priest, for venturing to reason with him on the same subject.

(3) The result. Whether Drusilla felt any dread or not does not appear. Felix was terrified (Rev. Ver.). Had he any disposition to yield? If so, why not do it? Probably because of Drusilla. She was to him what Herodias had been to Herod. Yet he gave a sop to his aroused conscience by promising that he would heed the message at some future time. Beware of this most dangerous snare. The devil will promise men all the "to-morrows" if they will give him "to-day." Any season is a convenient season for doing right, and for yielding to the claims of God.

Y.P.S.C.E. Convention.

Dr. F. E. Clarke, giving his impressions of the great Christian Endeavour Convention in Montreal, says:—"Relatively this was by far the largest Endeavour meeting that was ever held, the attendance of seventeen thousand was simply surprising. Even absolutely speaking, the meeting was far larger than any other that has ever been held, with the exception of the New York gathering. If I had heard no word or song; if I had not attended that wonderful, thrilling, Consecration meeting with which the Convention closed; if I had not received fresh and helpful hints from the Open Parliaments, and if I had received no uplift, such as I did receive, from many of the addresses, I should have felt that the very sight of these thousands of earnest young Christians was a real benediction. A deaf and dumb man could have enjoyed that Convention.

"Another thing that impressed me was the quality of the assembled throng. The young men were there. The question how to attract the young men is practically solved by these conventions. Give them what they are longing for, and the places of the young men will not be vacant. They came from every State and territory and province, and from all conditions and walks of life; but whether from the shop, or the farm, or the professor's chair, they were Christian ladies and gentlemen. They were evidently

THE FLOWER OF THE CHURCHES.

When the Sunday-school teachers were asked to arise in the consecration meeting in the Drill Hall, four-fifths of all the nine thousand who crowded that hall stood on their feet. The same was true, doubtless, in the six churches where the other meetings were held at the same time.

"I was also impressed by the happy combination of smaller meetings and vast assemblies. This Convention proved that it is possible to have the largest crowd of Christian Endeavourers without having an unwieldy Convention. The rousing denominational rallies, the helpful committee conferences, the early morning prayer meetings in five or six different churches, and various other smaller gatherings, provided the stimulus and the help that can come only from a comparatively small gathering where all can see and hear and be heard. On the other hand, the vast congregations in the Drill Hall and tent, which assembled morning after morning and night after night, could alone furnish the other kind of stimulus and inspiration, which is inseparably and necessarily connected with a great mass meeting of earnest young Christians."

The Sunday School Times notes that "There were two notable facts in connection with this Convention. The first was that it took a positive stand against the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. The second was the special consideration of the Junior Society of Christian Endeavour. The mighty army arose to their feet and cheered as speaker after speaker lifted up his voice

AGAINST SABBATH DESECRATION.

When one of the speakers announced that one of the World's Fair Commissioners had said that the time had come when the World's Fair must be closed on the Sabbath, there followed a scene which will never be forgotten. The audience as one man arose and cheered for several minutes.

"The Junior Society of Christian Endeavour, though very young, has grown into marked prominence. Composed as it is of the younger members of the Sunday-school, its work is a grand one, and its field is almost boundless. This Junior Endeavour Society is in reality a training-school for the Senior Society. It was shown by the many reports, that hundreds of young girls and boys have already been graduated from the junior orders and entered the ranks of the senior organisation; the plan has been tested, and proved well worth the time and labour expended."

The following points are gathered from a weighty sermon delivered at the Convention by

If you have questions about your duty, and do not see your way shining before you clearer and clearer to the perfect day, it is because you have not received the Holy Ghost.

A miracle never led a man to have his heart cleansed from sin. Words do not, sermons, the Bible—nothing does, save only the Holy Ghost.

Ah, friends, what we need to-day is not philosophy, not theories about the way to escape from sin, but the desire and power to get rid of it.

It is just as wicked for a Christian not to fulfil the command to be filled with the Spirit as for an unrepentant person to grieve the heart of God.

There is even more need of baptized blacksmiths, "shoemakers by the grace of God," consecrated manufacturers and merchants, than of apostles endowed with the power of the Holy Ghost. A blacksmith may be filled with the Spirit just as truly as any preacher.

God has shut Himself up to saving the world through human beings that have known the fulness of the Holy Ghost.

The Bible says nothing of Father and Son that it does not say of the Holy Ghost. When we receive the Holy Ghost we receive God.

The Holy Ghost is what makes the kingdom of God possible in ordinary human lives.

The Holy Spirit is likened to fire, air, water; but not to earth, as that is dull, heavy—a thing to be escaped from.

The correspondent of the New York Observer says:—Encouraged by the interest and thronged audiences that marked the opening services, the Convention proceeded to the work mapped out on a lengthy but varied programme. One whole session was devoted to the Junior department of the society's work. Its origin and growth were treated in capital style by Rev. J. H. Cowan, from Iowa, its possibilities by Dr. Wayland Hoyt, of Minneapolis, its methods of work by another pastor from Connecticut, and its movements in foreign lands by Mrs. Clark, wife of the founder of Christian Endeavour. As attention was being given to these subjects in one place of meeting, another crowd was treating, in a huge tent not far off, another collection of subjects. Two speakers from Pennsylvania dealt with work among young men, and two others from Washington spoke upon evangelistic methods and work. On the evening of Thursday, July 7, Dr. Clark and the Secretary, Mr. Baer, made their annual addresses.

Dr. Clark was cordially received after his Australasian, Asiatic and European journeys, and spoke of the progress of Christian Endeavour in home and foreign lands. He affirmed anew to promote in every way the spiritual life of young people, and also its crusade, viz., the upbuilding in all ways of the Church of Christ. "We will keep on," said Dr. Clark, "in the same way in which we have begun, giving all our allegiance, all our powers, all our endeavours to Christ, and to the Church with which we are connected. It will be a sorry day for the Society when it loses its first love, when it is untrue to its first principles, or when it seeks to substitute for the quiet, unobtrusive spiritual work that it has to perform for its own Church a more showy and noisy endeavour which leaves souls unsaved and the work of the Church undone. Thank God I can see no signs in any part of the world that our societies are yielding to these blandishments, that they are losing their spirituality, or holding to their prime purpose with less tenacity than of old."

From the report of the secretary, information was gleaned regarding the marvellous strides of Christian Endeavour during the past year. Among the most cheering items in the statistics was the announcement that during the last four years over 400,000 young people have united with their respective churches from the societies, and out of this grand total 158,000 denotes the accessions for last year alone. The Christian Endeavour membership throughout the world has mark by over 70,000. Numerically speaking, Presbyterianism has been the most favoured field for the Endeavour movement. Over 5000 new societies came into existence between July 1, 1892, and the present date.

Friday and Saturday were marked by variations in procedure. Both had the sunrise prayer-meetings, which were attended by thousands, but the afternoons were devoted on the first day to committee conferences here and there throughout the city, and to denominational rallies on the second. In the Drill Hall on the mornings of these two days the Christian Endeavour "essentials" were magnified, and the missionary phases of the work brought into prominence. On the closing evenings of the week the Bible, the age, fellowship, stewardship, and citizenship were the leading themes.

The Saturday night roll-call revealed remarkable returns from all over the world. The closing hours of the Convention are to be remembered for their impressive sermons, and especially for the final consecration services held on Sunday evening in the Drill Hall and in the tent simultaneously.

An outbreak of Roman Catholic intolerance occurred on Friday and Saturday evening, causing a riot which threatened serious consequences. The firmness of the authorities, however, averted the danger, and no real harm was done.

Amongst those who took a prominent part in the Convention, besides Dr. Clark, were Dr. Cuyler, who gave a valuable address on the power of prayer, Rev. B. Fay Mills, who gave evangelistic addresses of great power, Dr. Wayland Hoyt, Bishop Fallows, and a host of leading pastors and workers in Canada and the United States.

THE MELBOURNE Y.M.C.A.

Our Y.M.C.A annual meeting took place on June 29, and was very successful. It was held in the large "Town Hall" of the city. Over 900 sat down to the tea, and the particular feature of this tea was that the tables were provided by the Y.P.S.C.E. The young people were represented as follows:—Presbyterian, 13 tables; Wesleyan, 8; Independent, 5; Baptist, 2; Episcopalian, 2; miscellaneous, 4; total, 34. This proves how very useful the Y.P.S.C.E. can be to both Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. work.

The evening meeting was presided over by our worthy President, and 2000 people were present. Naturally, one of the most disastrous years that Victoria has ever known has affected the work financially, but the spiritual tone is excellent.

One weak link I would point out. Young men going to any colony from home usually have letters of recommendation given them by the pastor of the church with which they are associated, or by the local Y.M.C.A. I should say that fully one-third of these letters never reach their destination at all. The young man on shipboard for the first time is immediately placed in an atmosphere prejudicial to religious growth. Under the novel experience and new companionships home influence and associations are, alas! too frequently forgotten, and when the destination is reached the desire to present the said letters is gone. Permit me to say that it is not sufficient to give the letters to the young man, and then fancy that everything is complete. No. A copy of such letters should be sent to the secretary of the Y.M.C.A., and also to the pastor of the church or denomination with which those at home wish him to become associated, and also the name of the vessel given by which he is a passenger. Then the necessary steps can be taken for meeting the young man on the arrival of the vessel, and "assurance rendered doubly sure."

Lancing Convalescent Home.

Many London poor are again enjoying the sea breezes and the sunny South Downs at Lancing-on-Sea, through the privileges afforded by the large Home of the North-East London Gospel Mission. Every bed has been filled of late, embracing in all some eighty persons, from the baby of a few weeks old to the aged and enfeebled. Trial from an unlooked-for quarter has visited the Home. The known proximity of Lancing to Worthing, where there has been an outbreak of fever, has served to hinder, it is feared, the sympathy and help upon which the Home has in great measure to rely for maintenance. Friends will be glad to know that at Lancing there has been no sickness of any kind.

Gospel Literature for Troopships.

For several years past, at the commencement of each trooping season, you have allowed me the privilege of appealing to the readers of The Christian for help in my effort to supply the soldiers and sailors travelling in this ship with Gospel literature.

The season of '93-'94 begins in September. We expect that each of the four Indian troopships will carry upwards of 9000 souls—an aggregate of 36,000—during their several voyages to and from India.

I shall be most thankful for parcels of really good helpful second-hand magazines and periodicals, also for Gospel booklets and tracts. May I ask that these be sent, prepaid, not later than September 20?

MR. JOHN KNOX BOKWE,

OF THE LOVEDALE MISSION, SOUTH AFRICA.

THE subject of the following sketch was born at Ntsalamanzi, Lovedale, South Africa, in 1855. He is a pure Giaka Kaffir, and received his name, John Knox, because his father had learned something of the Scottish Reformer from the missionaries at Lovedale. It is an interesting fact that it was he who brought the first load of stones for the building of Lovedale, in the days when labour was paid for in beads and buttons. He had several sons, of whom John was the youngest, and both he and his brothers attended the newly-formed school with such regularity as the exigencies of cattle and goat herding permitted.

Since 1866 John Knox Bokwe has been so closely associated with Lovedale that every step in his career is well known, and a more honest and honourable one it would be difficult to find in Africa or out of it. For many years he has been Dr. Stewart's right-hand man, and is trusted as few Europeans could be trusted in similar circumstances.

The doctor's first introduction to him was a little peculiar. He one day found him playing with other two boys at the gate leading to his house. The three little fellows had one shirt between them, and I think John was the wearer of it. If so, it would be interesting to know whether this bit of soiled Manchester calico had any influence in regard to what took place. Be that as it may, the doctor took a liking to the boy, clothed him, and had him entered as a pupil in the preparatory classes at the Institution. Before this he had been employed at half-a-crown a month to herd horses, by Rev. Richard Ross, then missionary at Lovedale, but it was not till brought into contact with Dr. Stewart that it was known he possessed any particular talents.

While attending the Institution classes, he lived in Dr. Stewart's house as a servant, doing odds and ends morning and evening, the doctor paying his school fees. In this way his education cost his father nothing, while his own diligence made up for any lack of advantage in studying at night under a monitor in the preparation classes. As early as 1870, he began more regular work, in the first instance in connection with a Kaffir publication issued monthly from the mission press, later as clerk and book-keeper for the Institution, an office which he still holds and fills to the satisfaction of all who are brought into contact with him.

From youth he had a passion for music, and could sing snatches of songs if he heard them once; but never having taken lessons, he knew nothing of theory, and as for instruments he had never touched any, and probably saw few except Mrs. Stewart's piano. About 1873 he came to know something of musical notes through attempts made by stealth when the house was quiet, and having after a time obtained Mrs. Stewart's permission, began, unaided, to find his way to playing upon the piano. With perseverance he overcame every obstacle, and not only mastered the intricacies of the keyboard, but subsequently learned to play skilfully upon the cornet and other instruments.

(From a Photograph by Mr. John Fergus, Largs, Scotland.)

The acquaintance of the writer with him began in 1875, and he was then a fair performer, with a good knowledge of music, but no one thought that, before many years, he would be recognised as a composer of Kaffir melodies and hymn tunes of no common order. But it is not as book-keeper and musical composer alone that John Knox Bokwe is known and respected. Converted early to Christ, he became an office-bearer of the Lovedale Church while quite a young lad, and few men have discharged the duties of office more faithfully. In all the financial business of the church his advice and help are invaluable. As an interpreter, when missionaries unacquainted with Kaffir preach, his services have always been highly prized, as he speaks with much feeling and in full sympathy with the audience. As a lay preacher he stands high in the estimation of all who know him. He is not eloquent as Kaffir eloquence goes, and his manner is very quiet, but the intense earnestness of his utterances, the reality of the subject to himself, and his own blameless life, a life filled with useful labour, are felt by all.

Of this much is due to the training and influence of a pious mother. She had been brought to Christ while Lovedale was still in its infancy, and by her noble example helped to fire the imagination of her gifted son as he plodded on his way to a knowledge of the facts which opened up before the dawn of his intelligence; and when he came to take a deep interest in more spiritual questions, she was his companion and guide.

On her death-bed she called for John and said, "My boy, I can leave you nothing. I have no wealth; whatever I had I spent trying to help my children to a higher and better life, but I leave you what is much better than wealth—I leave you the dying blessing of a sinner saved by grace;" and so she died, and her last words are cherished by her son as a precious memory and heritage. Often has he said that in hours of darkness and temptation the memory of that death-bed scene has turned his thoughts God-ward, and strengthened his soul.

Not the least important part of his life's work is his constant interest in the work of the Lovedale Missionary Society, which is a mission within the mission. This society consists of a number of the more earnest spirits at Lovedale, and their special work is to go out on Sabbath days to distant heathen villages and preach the Gospel. Year by year John Knox Bokwe is unwearied in this blessed work, and many who now rejoice in the liberty with which Christ makes his people free can remember the first time the sweet-voiced Christian youth came to their heathen homes to sing and speak the wonderful words of life.

Recently he has visited Scotland, and has given addresses and musical recitations in various places. Since his return to Africa he has been visiting the churches, and giving his experiences in this country, impressing upon them the necessity of Africans bestirring themselves to become aggressive missionary workers and agents in the regions beyond.

It is such men as John Knox Bokwe who redeem missions and missionary methods from the reproach of producing no permanent results and failing to develope a high type of character.

GOSPEL WORK IN IRELAND.

[From a Correspondent.]

The most remarkable development in Irish Mission work at the present time is perhaps the great increase in open-air work. In the provinces it is still a dangerous experiment, as events at Bundoran and elsewhere testify. But in and around Dublin the Gospel can be preached in comparative security. All our denominations have realised this fact, and have gone to work with a will. The results, perhaps, are sometimes disappointing, but there are not wanting signs of encouragement. And opposition, where it is met with, comes, as a rule, from the most careless and most irreligious members of the community. It is only too true that those who are most intolerant have generally least religion.

We have recently had one or two remarkable instances of conversion resulting from open-air preaching. The other day a young man left Dublin for the Salvation Army headquarters in London. He was an ex-Roman Catholic, and his conversion and its sequel read like a scene in apostolic times. By way of opposition to the Salvation Army, he and some others usually organised a political meeting every Sunday on the spot where the Gospel was preached. This went on for some time, but eventually a few stray texts laid hold of this poor fellow, and after a period of difficulty and doubt he accepted the invitation of the Saviour, and found rest. Rest for his soul, but persecution came from his friends. His master was compelled to dismiss him from his service; his father and relatives looked upon him as demented, and tried to get him into their power. 'Tis wonderful how history repeats itself. "Thou hast a devil," is a charge often levelled at the Christian to-day, as well as 1800 years ago.

On Sunday evening, July 3, this young convert was on his way to a service. He was intercepted by a crowd, led on by his father. He was seized, and put forcibly on a car, but he got off again. The struggle lasted for some time; his clothes were torn, everything on his person was taken from him; and all the while a policeman looked quietly on. Ultimately, but only after the forced interference of the policeman, he was allowed to depart with a Roman Catholic gentleman present, who, to his credit, told the crowd "they ought to be ashamed of themselves." He thus escaped, and after a few days' hiding in Dublin, he managed to get to London, where he is at present.

A companion of his who played an equally, if not more, important part in organising the opposition meeting already mentioned, has also left the Church of Rome, and seems a very sincere and devoted fellow. He, too, has had persecution, but in less measure than the other. 'Tis strange what notions of religion our Roman Catholic brethren here are sometimes possessed of. A man may be addicted to every form of iniquity, still they will not cast him out. But let him read his Douay Testament and trust in Christ alone for salvation, and he is straightway shunned as a leper.

An incident occurred at the Kerry Assizes the other day that affords a sad commentary on the Church of Rome's teaching. A little boy named Cromer, nine years of age, was the principal witness for the Crown in a case of moonlighting. The lad had never taken an oath, and knew nothing about it. Asked by the judge if he had ever been to chapel, he replied in the negative. Had he ever heard of God? No. Of the Virgin Mary? No. Of religion? No. Had he ever said his prayers? No. "Did you ever hear of the Lord Jesus Christ?" persisted the judge. "No, sir," the poor lad answered, sobbing all the time. At this there was a slight ripple of laughter, which the judge sternly rebuked. And he added, "This is a most painful and disgraceful incident. I don't believe that there is a child of that age in the whole kingdom who has never heard of God or the Virgin Mary. Take that child off the table, and if the child's soul is lost for ever, I hope it will not lie at the mother's door. It is an outrage and a scandal. . . . ." This case is undoubtedly exceptional, but those who know most of the Irish peasantry are forced to acknowledge sorrowfully that they are lamentably ignorant of spiritual matters. And they are not to blame; we can only learn of God from his own Word, and that is denied them. Here in one of our hospitals the other day, a poor soldier lay dying. He was a Roman Catholic, and a good lady brought him a copy of his own Douay Testament. When the priest called it was lying beside his bed and he took it away. Another was supplied, which the priest would also have removed, only the patient interfered.

A much-frequented watering-place, known as Bundoran, and situated on the north-western coast, has recently been the scene of a lamentable piece of intolerance. The facts about to be given have come from a Christian worker there, and are incontrovertible. A short time since an agent of the Irish Evangelisation Society visited Bundoran, and secured a field, the property of a Protestant resident, in which to hold tent services. The vast majority of the visitors to Bundoran are Protestants. A few days after, a most objectionable notice was posted through the village, and one calculated to arouse the bad passions of the Roman Catholics in that district. Civilisation is exceptionally backward there, and, as might be expected, bigotry and intolerance are easily aroused. The local paper helped to fan the flame. A mob marched into the village on Sunday, the police were powerless to arrest its progress, the tent was stormed, the worshippers dispersed, and many individuals badly beaten. Even those who took no part in the meeting were assaulted. A curate, accompanied by his two sisters, was coming home from his own service; the whole party was attacked; the ladies were beaten and knocked down, and with difficulty rescued. Irishmen usually respect ladies, and abstain from offering them violence, but the Bundoran fanatics seem to have been beside themselves.

A TRIUMPH OF FAITH.

MR. GEORGE MÜLLER'S ORPHAN HOMES.

The fifty-fourth report of this Institution, which has just been issued, will take rank as a monumental one among the long and celebrated series which has appeared during the past half-century. Those of our readers who have followed the course of this remarkable work are already aware that for the last year or two the Institution has been passing through a crisis which, according to the testimony of the venerable founder, has never been equalled in the whole of its history. When the last report was issued the clouds hung heavily over the work on Ashley Down, but we ventured then to express the belief that this trial would prove to be only temporary, and that the Institution would emerge triumphant.

The report now before us shows that this expectation was well founded. The previous report showed a total deficit of between £3000 and £4000 (including the unpaid salaries). This report shows all these arrears cleared off, while the year closes (May 26) with a balance in hand on the orphan account of £2386 19s. 8d.

Referring to these facts, Mr. Müller says: "During all the years, since the beginning of the Institution, the hand of God, in many respects, was never more manifestly stretched out on our behalf than it has been during the past year." And again: "The readers of the last report will remember how great our trials had been during the previous year with regard to means for the support of various branches of the Institution, and in particular for the orphan work; and in the same position financially, the year began from May 26th, 1892, to May 26th, 1893. Our trial of faith continued week after week, and month after month; but Mr. Wright and I, and our many helpers, looked with unshaken confidence to the Lord, fully assured that in his own time He would again more abundantly help and deliver us out of our difficulties."

That these words were the utterance of deep conviction at the time, is evidenced by the course Mr. Müller pursued under the trying circumstances. It may be remembered that on one or two occasions during the past year, a letter from Mr. Müller appeared in our columns, announcing the fact that several vacancies for orphans existed in the houses, and asking for information regarding any cases which might desire the benefits of the institution. This, be it remembered, was done repeatedly in the face of an existing deficit and apparently declining income. What could this mean? was the question asked by some friends. While others, reading between the lines, divined the object of this somewhat unique appeal. The man of God was calm and unmoved amid the serious crisis of affairs. With characteristic simplicity he was heard to remark, "If God does not want these orphan houses, George Müller does not want them." His purpose was to test the question whether God still needed these houses, being confident that if He did need them, and in response to the notice of vacancies, sent in more orphans, He would not be behindhand with the funds. What has been the result? Let Mr. Müller reply.

"During the last week of our financial year of the Institution we received for the support of the orphans £343 10s. 1½d., and for the other objects £435 8s. 2½d., in all £778 18s. 4d., and during the last week we received nineteen orphans. The admission of twenty-two had been given notice for, but their relatives were unable to bring the other three this week, and requested that their reception might be delayed one week. . . . During this last year we have received 290 orphans altogether—a greater number than has been admitted for several years past." Thus, it will be seen, the inmates of the houses have increased in number; the funds have increased, too, and the year concludes in the way we have already indicated. The total income for the orphans during the year was £27,931 7s. 2d.

Throughout the report there is not a trace of boasting in this glorious triumph of faith, but there is a deep tone of humble thanksgiving to God. Thus, under date Nov. 11, we read:—"We value most highly the prayers of Christian friends, for we need them continually in our service. There came in to-day, by the first two deliveries, only about £8, but the Lord increased the income to more than £200 this day. I am never discouraged by very little coming in, but say to myself and also to my dear helpers, more prayer, more patience, and more exercise of faith will bring greater blessing, for thus I have invariably found it since October, 1830, now sixty-three years ago, when I first began this life of entire dependence upon God for everything."

Although there are some large items among the receipts, the favourable state of the funds is not wholly due to these, for there seems to have been a quickening of liberality in general, so that a considerable portion of the year's income has been built up by small, or comparatively small, sums. There were a few legacies, notably one for £1000, on which Mr. Müller comments as follows:—"Notice, first, the amount was left to me by an entire stranger; second, it was left duty free, whereby £100 was saved; third, the testator died only a short time since, and the legacy was paid so very soon. All this was the ordering of the Lord, who, in answer to our constant waiting upon Him, appointed it thus."

Considerable help was also realised by the sale of a large field adjoining the houses. Mr. Müller says, "This very day God begins to answer our prayers, as we have received a very good offer for the land we have to sell, even £1000 per acre. The beginning of the day was darker as to outward appearance than ever; but we trusted in God for help. The first three deliveries of letters brought us only £4, and the remaining three brought us so little, that the whole day's income was only £8 instead of £90, the amount we need every day to meet all our expenses. But God has now helped us. We have been able this evening to sell ten acres of land, and two-fifths of an acre, at £1000 per acre, and shall receive £10,405 altogether for the whole of one field. The contract was signed at 8 o'clock this evening." Space forbids any further quotation from this deeply interesting and edifying pamphlet. We commend it to the careful perusal of our readers, and trust it may receive that wide circulation which it deserves, and come as a cordial to many fainting spirits.

THE KESWICK CONVENTION.

THE CHRISTIAN'S INDEBTEDNESS.

BY REV. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE.

I will read a few words from Romans viii. 12, "Therefore, brethren, we are debtors." There are three great outstanding truths with which the Apostle presents us here. The Apostle begins with a tremendous denunciation and exposure of sin, alike in the heathen world and the professing Church. He then goes on to propitiation, sacrifice, satisfaction, and oblation; and then to faith, casting the soul wholly and utterly upon that, first and last and without end, for its acceptance before God. And then, you remember how, as it were, unawares, in the sixth chapter, we find ourselves in the midst of the truth of the union of the justified man with the blessed Lord, and the life of Jesus, as well as the merit of Jesus, in contact and connection with him; how he is at once the freest and the most enslaved of beings; how he has a liberty which, from his own point of view, is the most amazing freedom, and from his Liberator's point of view is the most absolute and blessed servitude. The man who is now a pardoned and justified sinner, safe in Christ, a partaker of his Lord's life, one with his Lord's vital blessed energy and life, is all this now because the Holy Ghost has come to him, has brought him and Christ into contact, and, having done the work, has by no means left it there, but is now dwelling in him and working in him. The man has a store of resource within him whereby continually his Saviour and he are in contact and are one, and the life on which he now goes forth is to be lived as by a man who has not to seek and struggle for it, but who already, in his glorious Head, possesses the power of the Spirit of God.

There is, I think, one lesson I may venture with great humility to place before you, which seems to me to be taught by this order of teaching in the Roman epistle: that, on the one hand, we cannot make too much of the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, the Lord and Giver of life; and that, on the other hand, we ought to be mutually in our articulation of that truth into any special dogma as to how the Spirit in this or that development of his work is to be received, and what are the signs of his coming and being there, in external result. As far as I can see, the Apostle is guided in this great epistle, with its wonderful fulness and development, very much to pass tacitly over questions of that kind, that he might attack that which lay behind them and above them all, and that he might spread before us the fact that in our Lord Jesus Christ, with whom we are one, there lies for us the fulness of the Spirit's power; and that the question is much rather—Am I using the fulness provided? than, Have I to wait for some new shower from the heights above that may be there for me to use? I would apply my own words to myself with great humility as to converting it into a doctrine, and would rather say, forgetting all these questions that have sometimes agitated Christians about the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, let us come in the peace of God and in the light of his Word to things which are unquestionably certain on all sides as to the enrichment that Christ has given to his people, and the life they are, therefore, bound to live. This is the thought which, I believe, our Lord would make the main message—"Brethren, we are debtors."

The Apostle goes on to say that we are not debtors to the flesh, that is, to the life of self, to live according to it. Perished be the thought; that is for ever gone. But now we are debtors. As if he would say, "No, we are not debtors to the flesh; but, with regard to the Spirit and to living in the Spirit, we are debtors there." There is a duty as well as a beauty about holiness itself. It is not merely a lovely aspiration; it is not a goal of ambition; it is not an attainment up to which to climb. In Christ it is a debt to be paid. You do not think that a man who pays his debts is one who is necessarily on a high pinnacle of attained virtue. No more is it an attainment, no more is it a virtue, in the sense of merit or moral decoration, when a man who, in Christ, is under obligation to be separate to the will of God, says, as he is bound to do, "Yes," to his Master, and is separated by his grace.

If I read other hearts by my own, the message is one at once of humiliation and of great encouragement. It is one of humiliation—a sort of humiliation which has to do with the sobering of the Christian and the taking of false fire out of him, and the destroying of the tendency to

THE INFLATION OF SPIRITUAL PRIDE.

What is there more prosaic, more in the plain daylight path of hourly obligation, than this, "Brethren, we are debtors"? We are every one of us under obligation this very day in everything we know of to be separated to God's will. Is it God's will that we should be pure and clean in thought and purpose? We are separate, then, in obligation, to that. Is it God's will that we should put away from us all bitterness, wrath, envy, jealousies, and parading of ourselves, or the development of our Christian character? We are separated by the obligations of indebtedness to that. Is it his will that we should go through this day in the peace which comes of surrender to his good will in everything, small and great; in the peace which will not be ruffled by the petty crossing of our will or by the great sorrow that conceivably may reach us by the evening post? Are we to go through the day humbly, self-distrustingly, yet not doubtingly but expectantly of blessing; and shall we reach the evening to plume ourselves on it? Not at all. There is nothing for any of God's children to pride himself for one moment upon in being a saint of God. It is an indebtedness to Him.

And now, what is the further thought about indebtedness or obligation of duty? There are two conditions under which widely different people are in debt as to earthly obligation. There is the man who has run himself by his folly into expenses beyond his income. The day of reckoning has come, and he cannot pay. Does it absolve him of the obligation? It only, as it were, intensifies the miserable sense that the duty which law will enforce is binding upon him as much as ever. It may be, that most terrible of evils in many a life—an empty purse, which ought not to have been empty—is there on the one hand, and we know not what ocean of indebtedness is on the other. But every iota of the obligation stands. It is no use in duty to plead "no assets."

And so with the soul. There is no slackening of obligation because we cannot pay in things spiritual and moral. Do not yield to the delusion that what you cannot do morally you are not therefore bound to do. "They that are in the flesh cannot please God." But are they therefore free from obligation to Him? They are tremendously bound to please God, and awfully, guiltily unable to do it.

But there is another thought of indebtedness which gives honest men pleasure to be conscious of. When an obligation has been lawfully incurred within the means, and there are means to pay it, then we should apply ourselves to know exactly what our debt is, and to see that our neighbour has not "to come again to-morrow, and we will give when we have it by us." That is the indebtedness which it is one of the privileges, as well as one of the duties of life to DISCHARGE PUNCTUALLY AS WE GO ALONG.

Such is the indebtedness of which Paul speaks here. We are in these blessed debts to the will of God, who has set us free. We are in that glorious debt of honour to Him, who says that because He has given us all, of course it is our joy and also our duty to give the all back to Him. And the point of the passage in its glorious brightness is this, that the words are said to those whom He has endowed, that they may do so. We do not come to these words in the Romans till we have read of the fulness of the salvation, both of the cross and of the Holy Ghost, of the propitiating blood, of the obedience, of the One in whom alone, from the beginning to the end, from the first breath to the last of your Christian life, we are accepted before the eternal judgment-seat. We have read of the coming, and the gift, and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit—of Christ in us by the Spirit; the Lord Jesus Christ in us by the Holy Ghost—there is the endowment of every true believer, out of which your indebtedness is to be paid, not to-morrow, but to-day; to be paid not in the sense of an aspiration for an hour that you may be, but of thanksgiving that in Him you are, able to meet now his blessed will. Shall this be our message to close with this morning—"Brethren, we are debtors," with such a wealth to pay with?

Wonderful light is thrown exegetically on many a point of this message by the contemporary Epistles to the Corinthians, which Paul had written and despatched only a few months before, in the same stage and era of the Holy Ghost's inspiring work upon him. In 1 Corinthians vi., you have a marvellous instance of how the Epistle calls not upon the extraordinary Christian, but upon the average Christian, not upon the Christian who can say (I hope there is no one here who is going to say it) "Look at me, I am so far on. There are very few who know as much as I do." The Apostle has very little to say to such Christians, except words of tremendous caution, for they are

STANDING ON A SLOPE OF ICE.

But he has a great deal to say to the rank and file, that they may be exactly what they are meant to be—a full force in the army of the Lord.

He says in Corinthians to one who is besieged not by metaphysical but by sensual temptations, not by things which just merely try the temper, but which assault the inmost secrets of the purity of the will—he says to the man, in the midst of the steaming vice of Corinth, "You are joined unto the Lord—one spirit. The body is for the Lord and the Lord, with all He is, is for the body." Therefore we may finish his sentence from his other epistle: Brother, thou art a debtor, thou art under an obligation; thou hast marvellous means to pay fully to the depths, not as if thou wert thrusting down something bad from the surface to the depths, only to get worse there. Thou art under obligation from the depths up to the surface, to meet the will of God in purity just now.

And so for all things else; for the things which try the spirit rather than the physical part of our nature; for the things which do desperately try our patience tolerance, kindliness, and love, we are debtors; not to climb to an almost or quite impossible height, but to draw upon the present resource, and go and pay our debt. It is not of ourselves. We shall wonder to the end that God can put such wealth into such hands. I do not think we shall ever reach the time when we shall begin to think or say: "It is no wonder that God loves and accepts us; it is no wonder that his Spirit delights to use us." Shall we not wonder to the last? I do not care to give logical proof of it. I am sure, if we are close to Christ, we shall find that having lodged his wealth all in Himself, He is leading us, utterly unworthy, not to Him only, but into Him—into the depths, into the strong room of his inexhaustible bank, and He says: "Now take and use; you will find the currency is good, and the notes are honoured when they are in my name." We are debtors, and, by the Lord's grace, we will not say to Him, "Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give"; for in Jesus Christ, who is ours, and we are his, "thou hast it by thee."

TRUSTING THE ARM OF FLESH.

BY PREBENDARY WEBB-PEPLOE.

I read from Gen. xxxii. 9 to 12, "Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good"—that is the thought which I desire to press in upon our souls, that we may understand, if God permit us, a little more of the "fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ" (A.V.), or, according to the Revised Version, the "fulness of the blessing of Christ." There must still be many in this great multitude who are not quite aware of what we have come to seek, and wherefore it is that this great assembly is gathered. We are present before God, let me say, to speak of the life which the believer ought to be living, in which he appreciates not only the things that are past, the provisions of God that are laid up in Christ Jesus our Lord, by virtue of his sacrifice on Calvary, but to understand the present provision of the Lord by virtue of the ascension of Christ Jesus to the throne of glory, and all that was set before us this morning (by Rev. C. A. Fox) as to being in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

When I state that as the general definition, let me be a little more explicit still for those who are unaware of our purpose. We come to speak, then, of the life of the believer, which ought to be lived with full deliverance from the hands of his enemies, not through his own fidelity, but through the power from God, by which he shall stand in the presence of difficulties, dangers, duties, and privileges, and find he is "more than conqueror" in all God calls him to do, to bear, to suffer, and to be. It is a life in which he realises what it is to have fellowship with God the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ; a life in which he apprehends the truth, the force, and the power of Christ's words, "My grace is sufficient for thee." It is a life in which he is able to trust every instant to God, his universal Provider, in the deepest sense of these solemn words, and a life in which, as he looks forward, he sees coming nearer and nearer every day the precious person of the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be to him henceforth and for ever, in the glory, his absolute, complete, and

ENTIRE SOUL-SATISFACTION.

It may sound to the great majority of us, even perhaps to the speaker himself, language full of hyperbole or even of direct exaggeration, when we say this is the life of which we are here to speak, and which everyone of us should exhibit from this hour. Nevertheless, taking up the words of my brother before me (Rev. E. W. Moore), I would say that the greater portion of our peace at the moment, and the absolute fulness of our blessing in the future, lies in a true expectation of the soul before God. God can only give a man that which he expects, and He cannot transcend the limits, therefore, of our faith in this matter (we speak reverently); because God has deigned to impose upon Himself this restriction, that there shall be no spiritual blessing beyond the measure of man's expectation. If God has traced in his holy Word such a life as I have dared to express or describe, it is for us to accept it; it is for us to look to the God who has made these promises and these provisions, to fulfil his own holy Word in our personal experience; and (here I speak to myself, too, for I need it), let not any failure in the past, since you heard of these blessings and apprehended them, prevent you from claiming further blessings in the future. God stands in his mercy ever waiting to give, and I know no limits—I am sure no man ever found a limit—to the patience, love, provisions, and purposes of God. No man has yet discovered the limits of the Infinite, and our God is infinitely holy, loving, patient, and tender towards his people. Therefore, "Whosoever will" is still as true for the fallen believer, as for the unconverted sinner. "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely," and drink as freely as he knows how to drink.

This I believe to be the purpose of God, and it is to speak of this that we gather. Short of an expectation in some such promise as this, you and I have no right to stand; nor should we leave a convention like this, if we want our lives to be lives of blessing, with one shadow of doubt as to the purpose of God and the power of God to fulfil his intentions for his child. I press this thought, because what I find in dealing with individual souls, as my brethren must have found, is this: they say, "It sounds beautiful to-night, but what of to-morrow? I dare not face the home, the trials in which I have failed in the past, and that unknown future, which seems so full of difficulty, and the impossibility of exhibiting complete victory, perfect deliverance, fulness of provision, perfect peace, and constant power. How can a man who has so failed in the past exhibit blessing in the days to come?" Because and with these two sentences pressed in on my soul, I have no right to expect failure in any one single point.

This is not preaching sinlessness; there is sin to the last; there is sin in the depths of our being of which we shall never be conscious while we are in the flesh. One who was a great teacher in these matters some seventeen years ago, whose words I was reading the day before yesterday—Mr. Pearsall Smith—at his last meeting at Liverpool in 1874, said, "What is sin? In its strictest definition it is coming short of the glory of God; therefore, in that sense, we sin every moment of our lives in thought, word, and deed." Yet that is the man who was accused of preaching sinless perfection. I have his words in my bag now in Keswick, and I think it is only just to mention them, that we may realise that the men who preach this doctrine with the greatest acceptance—the doctrine of perfect provision in Christ Jesus—have, in almost every case, been the men who have apprehended most their own inherent corruption and vileness, and the depravity of human nature that cleaves to us to the last moment, and of the impossibility of standing an instant without sin in the sight of God; for sin is coming short of the glory of the Lord Himself.

This being so, and the ground being cleared, we can proceed without fear of being misunderstood, to see, as far as God may enable us, what are the provisions of God in Christ Jesus for those who are willing to accept an unspeakable blessing. It is impossible for men in the day in which they live rightly to comprehend the signs of their own times; and that is true in one sense because, as in the smoke and heat of the battle, it is impossible to see the wide field, as a commander would, or one observing from the heights above. We stand in the midst of it and cannot rightly judge; but we are bound to judge, as far as we may, of the special dangers and difficulties of our own time. And if I might say what I believe to be one of our peculiar dangers in this generation, I should say it is from the creature towards the Creator; the want of a right appreciation of the illimitable distance between the all-Holy One and his worm on earth.

Men deal with God far too familiarly; they talk to God as they would to a chum in the streets. Men talk of God their precious Saviour in terms which sometimes make one's soul shudder; men speak of Jesus as if He were to be a companion with whom they were in closest intercourse, as with one whom they smoke their pipe in their bachelors' rooms in their youth. They forget that they are drawing near to the Almighty, to the Most Holy, to the One before whom the angels veil their faces and in whose sight the very heavens are unclean. They forget that there was never yet a single angel of whom we read; never yet one of God's holiest servants of whom we read in his Scriptures, who, when brought into the manifested presence of God, did not fall on his face in deepest awe.

And this is what some of us are wanting to realise still. I do not say that any special soul here is guilty of this irreverence; but, as we watch the signs of the times, we see from one extreme of ecclesiastical life to the other that the sin of irreverence is one of the causes which account for men's low lives in the present day.

Let me exemplify it. I speak of those, for instance, who develope in their religion an extreme ceremonial or ritual, and who are spoken of by their own party as being peculiarly reverent. It is impossible for one's own mind to conceive anything that develops irreverence so much as to put tinsel, tawdry dress, lights, so-called altars, between the soul and the great omnipotent God, who is a Spirit. Everything that tends to bring the mind and the soul, when they offer worship to God, down to the kingdom of the material, is a direct act tending to irreverence, and leads the soul from God the Creator, making the poor sinner satisfied with the thing created instead of being uplifted to God Himself in heaven.

Exactly at the other extreme there are those who claim to pronounce a direct, clear shibboleth on the doctrines of evangelical religion, and are perfectly certain in their statements of what is called truth. But as they come to stand before the Most High God, alas! is it not patent that irreverence is a real danger? As you watch men worship who claim to be on true evangelical ground in regard to the satisfaction that God has made for sin in Jesus Christ, are they not often sadly guilty of lolling at their ease in times of worship, knowing nothing of the bended knee, or of burying the face before God in the dust? Irreverence is the great cause which prevents them from apprehending the blessings that God would bestow.

I will not tarry over the faults and failures of the Church at large, but we see irreverence in the Church, and we see it most openly in the doctrines that are being taught to people to-day, and which go by the name of Agnosticism. There is hardly possible for us, I fancy, a greater act of irreverence than to go to studies like those, and to find satisfaction in them; for they bring us to the creature directly, instead of to the Creator, and they lead us to find divinity in manhood, where manhood ought to take its place at the infinite distance in which he stands from God. What, then, is wanted? We want to apprehend that that, as far as we know the workings of God, the measure of God's manifested opportunity is simply the measure of man's realised extremity. God cannot work for man as He would till man is brought exceeding low; so low that he cannot lower go.

Now, look at Hebrews xii. 28, 29: "Wherefore, we, receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire." I do not think these are the thoughts we generally hold when we draw near, nominally, to God in our prayers. How familiarly men say, "Let us speak to God in prayer," and in a moment the tongue is glibly uttering sentence after sentence to God. Would to God we were in such an attitude that the Creator could indeed pour out the riches of his blessing upon us.

Let us take an instance of a man who failed to get the blessings God was prepared to bestow, because he was trusting the arm of flesh, and never seemed to get rid of the principle of human subtlety and human wisdom with which he started in his earlier life. I speak of Jacob, and I only want to make him an illustration because he is so peculiarly human. I need not say much about his early life and his mother's desire that he should share in his father's blessing. Oh, mothers, you that are spoiling your dear children, you will reap the harvest for which you are sowing. I have never yet known a mother, I think, who spoiled a particular child, that did not have only she got the whirlwind after sowing the wind. The spoiled boy has to be banished from home, and perhaps the mother never sees him again in this world. How many mothers are here, or fathers, possibly, who may not be here, who, having spoiled a child in its infancy, supposed that in its early life, in the days of its early manhood, they would have to be separated from the dear one who is an outcast from home? It was the mother, I fear, who started the sins of Jacob; in his younger days, he supplanted his brother in taking the birthright from him, and the blessing from the father. We speak of his "conversion" at Bethel ere he passes on to Padan-Aram. Well, I do not think much of that conversion on the whole. I think that is what we have to say with regard to many who call themselves Christians, who live in the light and liberty, as they say, and then, for twenty years it may be after their conversion, they have carried on the same old life of subtlety, self-provision, craft, and worldly wisdom by which they acted in their early days, before that solemn scene in which they first dealt with God. They may be prosperous and rich, and successful in many ways, but they have never yet entered into one single day of true peace, except when they journeyed from Bethel alone before they came into the Padan-Aram home.

And now God says to this man, "Return to thine own land." You know the good land was never meant to have been left. Step by step Jacob retraces his steps, but he suffers bitterly on the way, for Laban and his house follow. A pillar is set up between them as a witness that Laban shall never come after him to do him an injury. Jacob goes to bed that night feeling, "Now I have got rid of my last enemy." He is going comfortably into the good land at once, thinking he is free of his past life of treachery. And I fancy that many have said, "I have done with the past life of treachery: it is all right, and I start afresh." We ministers toward the close of the Convention have often to speak from our own experience of what souls are led to say to us. I speak with the deepest solemnity when I say that such an act and thought as that will never do for Almighty God. It is not enough to have got rid of the chasing enemy, and to say, "I am free from Laban, thank God. I can now lie down, take my rest, and enter straight into the good land." You have others to deal with.

Now comes the news that Esau is upon you. Then the soul begins to shake again. Your first difficulty was home failure, and now there stands again that terrible picture, the coming difficulty connected with the home. You fell before Esau before, and you had to retire. Now you are looking to see him again. Down goes this man on his face, and he says, "O God of my father Abraham; God of my father Isaac; the Lord that saidst to me, Return unto thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee. Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, and make thy seed as the sand of the sea for multitude. Lord, fulfil it." Nay, not yet. We appeal to the God of our father Abraham, but perhaps we hardly understand what we mean. You remember Abraham and Isaac both left the good land for a little while. Abraham left it for Egypt, bringing back a bitter curse upon his home because of the lie he told in the presence of the heathen, and he bequeathed the lying habit to his son. Isaac never left it but once, and when he comes back it is a land of blessing in which he lives unto the end. You and I are to deal with the God of our fathers Abraham and Isaac, and perhaps we have been like Jacob until now.

WHAT HAS GOD GOT TO TEACH US?

This—that we may never leave the land. Abraham was asked whether Isaac might go back to the old Padan-Aram land? Abraham answered, "Never"; but he forgot he had set an example. Jacob leaves it through his mother's folly and sin. Observe, Jacob is not now being kept out of the land for his sin; he is not kept out by Laban; he is not kept out by Esau: though these were great difficulties. The land of blessing is before him, but he is being kept out by Almighty God. This is a solemn thing to say, and may God forgive me if I am wrong in saying it.

There are many of us who are being kept out by the same God to-night, because, like Jacob, unconsciously perhaps, we think we may play tricks with God, even to the last. God has got to deal with us. Oh, if I dared to say the things one hears from individual souls, what a revelation it would be of the fact that perhaps a large portion of God's Church do not see yet the awful iniquity of a little sin, as they call it; a little sin leading on to deeper iniquity and folly than they have any possible consciousness of. It is the want of a realisation of the perfection of God's holiness, and the depravity of man's heart, that is keeping us back from the life of blessing and power.

Jacob bowed his head before God in the dust, and said, "O God of my father Abraham, overcome this difficulty with Esau for me. Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good." Nay! Why? No sooner has he risen from that solemn dealing with God than he reverts to his old habits of self-provision, subtlety, and human wisdom, when he has to meet the Esau whom he said he trusted God with. And that is what I find with many others. When they go back from the Convention they get back to the old ideas again almost directly. Jacob pleaded with God about his love, about his covenant promises, about his assurance to do him good. But he still thinks he must provide for himself to some degree; therefore God cannot bless. Do you know why? As far as I can judge (and I am speaking very respectfully to wiser heads than my own) I have never heard the question broached, and have, therefore, never seen an answer. Why were Jacob and his family family sent from Canaan to Egypt to sojourn there for 400 years? My humble belief is that it was that led to that tremendous chastisement, in the removal of God's own people from the holy land of promise. He continued it on to the end.

God brought Jacob still lower now. Jacob sends some of his servants to try to curry favour with Esau, and God then deals with Jacob alone. Everybody, as a rule, in expounding the life of Jacob, speaks of that solemn scene as if it was intended by God's forgiveness and the blessed provision of God for his servant to make him in every way a holier man for the future. I believe it was. I believe that when God gave him the name of Israel, "a prince with God and men," he was starting on a new life of blessing if he had only had the faith to keep it going. "I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me." Well done, Jacob! But he forgets it directly, and he proceeds to deal subtilly with Esau, forcing presents upon him, and saying, as it were, "Go on ahead, and I will follow," but he never followed him at all. Afterwards, look at Shechem and the life the man leads, always trying to curry favour with his youngest son, Joseph. He is always acting through the power of human wisdom; and I verily believe that it was this attempt to make the best of both worlds, notwithstanding all his gifts and favours, that led Jacob and his family away from Canaan, the land of promise and blessing, into the miseries of Egyptian bondage for four hundred years.

My dear friends, your children are before you. There are children now grown up since we began these meetings, who are here to-night as fathers and mothers, and it makes one's heart ache to think what a fearful example many who have been to endless conventions are setting before their families, before the people at home. It is that Jacob coming up again that leads to the darkness and distress in which so many seem to be after they have had the "beautiful Keswick Convention blessing."

WE OUGHT NEVER TO TALK LIKE THAT.

What we ought to say is this: "God humbled me to the very dust that night; God broke my thigh, the very centre of my strength; God brought me on my face before Him to say, 'I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me.' I cling to my Conqueror; I cling to Him in the very desperation of spiritual darkness and distress, who said 'I will surely do thee good.'"

Yes, now thou shalt be an Israel. But just as often in the time to come as the Jacob life comes up again, and you supplant the life and power of God with the idea of human provision, in that moment and to that extent back the man falls from the blessing received, and it becomes "dried fruit," or, at the best perhaps, with rotten stones in the middle of it. There is no blessing for the man, and no power with God or the world. It is to have power with God and with man that we are met in this assembly. We are to go back to live as God would have us live. I have been, with some of my dear brothers here, for nearly twenty years, the so-called possessor of this glorious secret. I know not what they would have to say, but I have to say with deep humility that the old Jacob-life has too often come up, and the misery of the soul is very bitter when it comes. "I beseech you, by the mercies of God," I beseech myself and everyone in this tent, by the blessings which God has provided in Christ Jesus, let us be real to-night to the very depths of our being, putting away this old vile self, the subtle principle of the flesh, and let us accept the life of the abundance of the Spirit, which God offers to supply. The instinct or thought comes to everyone of us, to try a little policy, perhaps to win our own child. The mother says, "I will just go to a few parties, and I think that will win my girl to come with me." Or the father says, "I am bound to get this boy on, and I will get him into that office." Or whatever it is; perhaps I have not struck the evil at all. I think I know my own heart, and God will help you to know yours. Let us say, O my God, if the old instinct of policy, or the principle of the flesh, rises up for one single moment again, make us remember that it takes us out of Canaan, out of the land of rest, and power, and provision, away from the blessings of God's peace. And though He has said, "I will surely do thee good," He can only do it as the soul is bowed at his feet from moment to moment. Every time the old Jacob would seem to appear, God help us to feel the touch of the Lord upon the thigh, till it bring us down to his feet again, and there, in the depths of humility and want, there, in the darkness of the moment, which shall soon turn to morning, may we be able to say from the very depths of a clinging soul each moment—it may be in the midst of the sermon, or the housekeeping, or the most blessed or darkest circumstances—in that moment let us look up and catch a hold upon Christ Himself, and say, "I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me."

GRACE FOR GRACE.

BY REV. CHARLES G. MOORE

Amongst the words that the Lord Jesus Christ spoke to his disciples in the upper room of so great privilege were these: "I have chosen you and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain. And whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in My name He will give it you." How that word "go" must have fallen on their hearts. Go from the prayers and the intimacies with the Lord; from all the special privileges of these hours of holy fellowship with Him? To what? He had made provision that whatever they should ask of the Father in his name when face to face with the world's sin and misery and their own need, they should obtain. We are already beginning to talk of going from the Convention. May we go with this ordination of Christ upon us in view of all the difficulties that await us outside.

Turn first in 1 Cor. to some words that occur in the impassioned passage in which Paul declares that there is no meddling with that great truth—"He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." This teaching he sums up in this verse, which is also the substance of the teaching of the Convention—"Of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." God's great gift to us is

PARTNERSHIP WITH JESUS CHRIST.

As though some man of business were pressed with difficulty, face to face with heavy responsibilty, and some one equal to the task were to give him a partnership with a man of inexhaustible resources. He goes forth and does business in the enjoyment of the wealth and partnership with one whose resources are sufficient for all his need. God saves us by giving to us a holy fellowship with his Son, in whom are all things necessary for life and godliness, for time and for eternity. We have not only to thank God for the Christ, but for the gift of the fellowship with Christ, in which we find Him to be unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

It has been abundantly evident here that there has been blessing. We have had a larger vision of what God has given us in giving us Christ. We little thought there was so much in Christ for us; but we have looked on Jesus with new joy, and we have said, "This God is my God. I do rejoice in the possession of this Christ. I have new light on the resources that God has placed in Him for my righteousness, my wisdom, my sanctification, and my redemption." And then we have also, perhaps, been taught of God better as to the nature of that fellowship with Christ in which all these things become ours for daily and constant need. How many souls have a fellowship with Christ which is not the fellowship. You are here to-day, knowing that Christ is yours, and understanding better how you may find every need met in Him.

If you come from Paris to England, where orchards abound, a fact will strike you. You look and you will see a number of trees in which the process of grafting is going on. You will see a small twig, and all around it a ball of clay or earth. The ball is holding the twig in contact with the tree. A fellowship is being established behind that earthy substance which will at last end in fruitfulness on the part of the branch thus engrafted into the tree. This is perhaps what has been going on in this Convention. Under an exterior not perhaps such as would commend itself to all, God has been doing this. But how sad to have all the appearance of establishing a fellowship, and yet when the earthy clay is taken away, to find that the union of fellowship has not been established. It may be that some, by the circumstance of being here, by the addresses they have heard, by the influences of the Spirit, have been brought into a position where they may come into that fellowship with Jesus Christ which will fill their life with abounding fruitfulness. If any have not yet established, by surrender and faith, that fellowship with Jesus which brings all his life into the soul,

LET THEM DO IT NOW.

A few words as to the working of this fellowship in service, amid the difficulties and trials to which we go. Turn to John i. 14, "Full of grace and truth." Here is the doctrine of the Convention—"Of his fulness have all we received." There is first the grafting of the soul into that fellowship; and then the cleaving to Him, the abiding in Him through all the varying experiences of life. I take these words especially, "Grace for grace," as indicating that whatever experiences may lie before me, being in perfect fellowship with a full Christ, it will be with me as with a branch in perfect fellowship with the vine—all circumstances turn to its good and for its benefit. If we maintain this fellowship, by God's grace, all that comes into our life, sunshine or storm, wind or rain—it will all be a blessing. We have that relationship to Jesus in which it is possible to realise the truth of the words: "All things work together for good to them that love God."

What does the apostle mean by adding to his confession of faith these words—"Grace for grace"?

I take it he is summing up the manner by which he has entered into the enjoyment of his Saviour's fulness. It is not "grace after grace." There is a closer connection than that—grace to take the place of grace, when that already bestowed had been used abundantly in the obedience of service and surrender. By faith alone we cannot enter into God's richest gifts. It is through faith and patience that we inherit the promises; let patience have its perfect work.

Very early in my Christian life I began to suspect what was God's way. I found that if I sought any advance in grace, the grace I already had must be proved and tested to the utmost. To pray for more grace meant trial and pain, and the testing of faith and patience. Later on, God's word was opened up on this subject, so that it seems to me to-day that in understanding the nature of the fellowship with Christ by faith which makes his life ours, nothing should be clearer than this great law of "grace for grace," when the grace already bestowed

HAS BEEN TESTED.

We may find an illustration in the Old Testament, 1 Samuel xiii. Saul, we read, dismissed his army and kept only three thousand men—two thousand in his own command and one thousand with Jonathan. Jonathan takes one of the cities of the Philistines, and inflicts a serious defeat. Angered by this, and touched in their pride, these Philistines prepare to avenge themselves, and make great preparations. The alarmed Israelites flee in every direction, and Saul is left alone with all the responsibilities of the situation upon him, with very few men round him that he could count on, with God only to look to for needed help and salvation.

Let us fix our attention upon Saul in this crisis of his history. There he stands in one of those hours that mould our life and our eternity. In verse 7 we read that "all the people followed him trembling. He tarried seven days, but Samuel came not, and all the people were scattered from him." It is difficult to understand what is meant by the words, "according to the set time that Samuel had appointed," but, at any rate, the most trusted man fails him, and does not appear. What will he do? Will he say, "All is gone, but God is left, and that is everything; and God cannot fail me; whatever I am to do I must keep right with my God." Is that it? "Saul said, Bring hither the burnt offering to me, and the peace offerings; and he offered the burnt offering." In other words, he could not wait for God. He thought God was going to be too late, and he takes his salvation into his own hands.

What comes of it? "As soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt offering Samuel came, and Saul went out to meet him," and so on. What do we do? Why do we not say, "Yes, the enemies are all there, but God is there too"? What a come down! "For now would the Lord thy God have established thy kingdom upon Israel for ever." Now. This is one of the crises in the world's history. It was not a convention. I suspect very few crises in our lives come in a meeting like this. They come in the hard hours of life, when it is a question whether I will go to my great conquering God, or come back to my wretched, foolish self.

SUCH HOURS MOULD OR MAR US.

Let us suppose that Saul thus prayed: "O God, be pleased to extend thy grace and bring me into possession of the kingdom." The first thing he hears is that the Philistines are come. That does not look like an answer. His people were running away. Samuel fails him. Is this the way that God answers prayer? "I asked Him to establish my kingdom, and He is taking it from me." Yes, that is how God answers prayer; I know no other way of getting large blessing from God but that. Your fellowship with Jesus is to make you strong to endure hours of that kind, and to come out of them with all the wealth that God means to give you in them. We have prayed for increase of grace; the first thing to do is to look out for the Philistines. Thank God, that is the beginning of the answer. When everybody runs away we begin to feel that the answer is sure. When Samuel, the one we had most relied on, fails us, then God's salvation is near. The conquering Christian life is of this sort. Christ brings us into fellowship with Him, and fills us with joy and peace; but if these are not tested we begin to lose the blessing. It is Christ's way into a still better possession. You will say, "It was well worth it all. I thought I was going to lose the blessing I had, but I found it was only grace for grace."

What a tendency we have to settle down in these pleasant places. Jesus says "Move on" when a broad place begins to narrow down; it gets so narrow sometimes, but He is with us, and if we go go through that, we go into a still larger place of grace. So it goes on, until, if we will walk with Christ on these terms, He will bring us into a place so large and so abounding in his favour and grace, that no words will ever tell the heavens to which He will bring the soul that will walk with Him through broad places and narrow as He shall lead it on.

You are going home, perhaps, to find the Philistines on the premises; they have been very busy whilst you have been at the Convention. The trains have scattered the friends who have been with you here; and the Samuel through whom God has spoken to you in this Convention is away too. What are you going to do? Your life for months to come will depend upon what you do when you get home. What this year will be to you will not depend on what happened here, but when you get home to find the Philistines round you and everybody gone but God. What are you going to say? That will set the key-note of the whole year. Let us go home to triumph in God. Though the Convention is gone, and the friends are gone, and the speakers are far away, right there is our conquering God. Begin to praise Him. Glory in the Lord. And all through the year God will take you into the grace of Christ, and into such depths of knowledge as this Convention could not do. You will come back next year, if God spare us, with hearts so filled, thanking God for the Convention, and feeling that, after all, the sweetest place on earth is the place of difficulty, of trial, and of common duty. That shall be a platform on which Christ shall show the greatness of his salvation. Let us so live that this Convention may put into the hearts of men and women in the world blessed thoughts about our Christ, as day by day in common life we go to and fro in the power of his grace, leaning hard upon Him, and rejoicing in his mighty sufficient grace.

Ministers' Meeting.

The following is the substance of an address given by Rev. Evan Hopkins at one of the Ministers' Meetings, and which contained a clear statement of what Keswick teaching is and what it is not. The object of the teaching is to learn how we may walk more fully in the light. Scripture describes a Christian life considerably in advance of that which is ordinarily attained—a life of rest, of victory, of unbroken communion, of power. Our aim is to know how to live that life. And for ministers this is supremely important, for the value of our work depends upon the character of our walk.

We teach, not sinless perfection—the eradication of the evil nature, the removal of the tendency to sin, but that this evil may be momentarily counteracted, so that though present it will not have dominion over us.

There will not be freedom from sins of ignorance; none can ever say, "We have no sin." But there may be an obedience to the light which keeps "the conscience void of offence toward God and man." We may walk so as to have the testimony which Enoch had, that we "please God."

There will not be freedom from conflict, but it is needful to distinguish between conflict with sin and rebellion against God. The former we shall have to the end; the latter ought not to be.

It is not a life of indolence, of quietism; but service becomes different in its character. It is no longer performed in the energy of the flesh, but is the result of Divine power working within. The most perfect rest in Him is the condition of the most intense and useful activity.

It is not a state in which there is no advance, but it recognises the difference between the conditions upon which growth depends and the growth itself. A dislocated member does not grow right. It is first adjusted, which may be the work of a moment, and then it may continue to grow in strength and usefulness.

This thought was emphasised by several speakers. Rev. Handley Moule enforced it by the illustration of his wife, whose ankle was dislocated for several years, during which she made no progress with it; but when an eminent surgeon, by one wrench, put it into position, the use of it was restored. This is no unimportant lesson to learn. Continual stumbling and rising again—frequent backsliding and being restored—must not be regarded as growing in grace.

Overflow Meeting.

The first address by Rev. G. Macgregor, at the over-flow meeting on Tuesday morning, was intensely practical. It dealt with two things—first, God's gracious warning (1 Cor. iii. 13). Every man as soon as he believes in Jesus becomes a builder, building up a Christian character. The value of his building will be tested by the fire, which will reveal every man's work of what sort it is. How awful is such a prospect to Christians who are living for wealth, for pleasure, for an earthly name! Many will be found at last with the soul saved but the life lost; for all their building is fit only for the fire! To the most earnest and devoted Christian worker the prospect is a solemn one. How much of our holiness is sinful, and of our service for God mixed with selfishness! Who can contemplate it without feeling, as the apostle did, "the fear of the Lord" (2 Cor. v. 11.)?

But the address dealt also with God's gracious promise (Isa. i. 25). God visits his people, finds all wrong, and, because their condition is hopeless, promises to come to their deliverance (24-26). If we are similarly hopeless, the promise is for us, too. "I will turn my hand upon thee, and thoroughly purge away thy dross, and take away all thy alloy" (R.V. margin).

"Dross" refers to gross inconsistencies of life. Paul had many such to reprove—"bitterness, wrath, anger, clamour, evil speaking" (Eph. iv. 31); "fornication, uncleanness, covetousness" (Eph. v. 3). Whatever the dross may be in our life God will put it away.

"Alloy" is something more closely connected with the metal than dross. It contains a promise that God will deal not only with actions, but with thoughts, motives, desires—that He will purify the very springs of action. Where sin abounded there shall grace much more abound.

How will He do this? By turning his hand upon us. Be content to "lie in his hand while he gazes into your inmost soul." The thought is a solemn one, for how much can He discover of dross and alloy? Yet "it is better to fall into the hand of God than into the hand of men." He discovers only that He may purge.

And He purges "thoroughly." In the past you have turned your hand upon your besetting sins, and they have laughed you off and asserted their victory again. They will not laugh Him off; his hand will do the work thoroughly. The temper, the evil thought and desire, the habit that have proved too much for you, will not be too much for Him. Are you willing? It is no child's play this purging away of sin. It cost the death of Christ, and it requires the death of self—are you ready?

See the result which follows:—"Afterward thou shalt be called the city of righteousness, the faithful city" (26). Not "thou shalt call thyself," but others shall see the change, and shall be compelled to own the work of God in you.

First Attenders' Meeting.

At the meeting on Thursday, Dr. White (Chairman) read Heb. xi. 29, 30. Have you noticed the interval between vv. 29 and 30 of forty years? The reason is because it was not of faith, and hence not in the purposes of GOD. He brings out of Egypt to bring into Canaan, which is not a type of heaven as some suppose. In heaven there will be no Jericho, and no seven nations to be subdued. There is a poor look out for Moses if it be, as he never got there. The Israelites were brought out of Egypt to Red Sea a type of death, and should have gone forthwith to Promised Land, but they said "we are not able." They died, and their children passed over Jordan. Notice also the Red Sea was divided for them; not so Jordan, the priests stepped on the boiling flood and found a prepared way.

Rev. J. B. Figgis followed. Two questions had been asked, one of too personal a nature to be answered from the platform. The other was "What is this cleansing that I hear of for filling. I realise I need cleansing momently, but this seems a definite act?" There are two distinct cleansings—one that justifies and the other that sanctifies. The cleansing that is the atoning work of Christ, needs to be accepted that a man may be justified and be accepted before God. "If any man sin we have an advocate with God"—the blood continues cleansing. The second is a parallel work, but of the Holy Ghost, through the passion of Jesus, for the giving of rest and peace.

Mr. Figgis then addressed the meeting on 1 Peter ii. 21. Let us not think of others, but ourselves, and Christ as our example. I know not when He began to suffer, but withal it was characterised by patience, gentleness, and meekness. There may be a Gethsemane and Calvary for each. Not only in suffering is He our example, but in humility also. He emptied Himself; to the poor and outcast by Him was the Gospel preached. He was an example of philanthropy in an unphilanthropic age. He is an example for what purpose? Is not a headline to be copied by the boy, the sampler by the girl? Have you ever heard of a pattern to be disregarded and thrown aside? We do not forget his relationship to God which we cannot have; we are to be children of our Father's. We cannot bow the heavens and come down, but we may impart to a needy brother, and a life for God will tell in this dying world.

You say, "I love Jesus and admire his character, but am I to be like Him? I have not realised that." Can you conceive of a follower of the Lamb taking an opposite part? This is the object of this Convention, to cultivate Christlikeness. When I hear of a butler, saying "Patience is a virtue, but my lady has none of it," I ask, Is this being like Christ? He left not only an example but his own life. He is in heaven as to his body, but may dwell in your heart by faith. But He cannot be in the heart inoperative (1 John iv. 4). If I understand the teaching of this Convention, it is that God may be in us. The Son in us. The Spirit in us and all our works done in the power of his holy presence. Do not seek an experience; seek Himself. Jesus is just as near in the mountains as in the mission hall.

Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor also spoke. I want to speak of that aspect which came with much power to my own heart—the keeping power (Ps. cxxi. 5). How may failure be remedied and prevented in future? Where do you stand now? How was it when you were forgiven? In your first love you vowed regular Bible reading, prayer, &c., all that you could you did to commend Christ. With what result? Vows have been broken. You have had a life of failure, and you are saying, "It is no use." Yet you see in Christ one who was calm amidst the most trying circumstances; maligned, and yet He threatened not. Your life and mine are meant to be like his. God is able to give us a life of constant victory. You believe that Christ saves, but you forget that He keeps. You accept justification as a free gift, but for victory you are trusting to self-effort. A young lady in America said, "I must have this blessing. I'll go to my room and pray until I get it." Not so; the faith that lays hold of Christ as Saviour is the same as that for keeping. Utter surrender must be backed by the expectation that Christ will keep you without self-effort. Many read, "My grace is sufficient" as a promise; but it is a fact. Give over putting dependence for holiness upon good friends, books, or meetings; it rests alone upon Christ. It seems foolishness, but is the highest wisdom.

The Ministers' Communion.

On Thursday morning, at 7 o'clock, a united ministers' communion service was held in St. John's Church. The address, which was of a very solemn and searching character, was given by Prebendary Webb-Peploe, who took as the basis of what he called "a meditation," 1 Samuel xx. 17: "And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him; for he loved him as he loved his own soul." The subject was Jonathan's love for David—an illustration of what we ought to be to Christ our King. The character of Jonathan's love was finely set forth in contrast with the conduct of Saul and Abner. Saul, who had received help and deliverance at the hand of David, could, nevertheless, ask "Who is this youth?" And Abner could pretend he did not know, and who should have known better than Abner? The end of this agnostic was that, as a fool dieth so he died.

Our love to Christ our King may be tested by the distinguishing characteristics of Jonathan's love. These are seen in the covenant made (xviii. 3), in the stripping of all he had (v. 4). There were only two spears in Israel at the time, and Jonathan had one, but he gave it to David. So our best should be lovingly given to our David, in the free communication of all things (xix. 3); and in the doing of all that was desired to be done (xx. 4), our David will watch over and keep our families whilst we are away doing the will of God. And when we come to die, what better thing than to have our David say of us, "Thy love to Me was wonderful." He is worthy of our best, truest love.

Prayer for Missions.

A happy half hour was that spent at the missionary prayer meeting in the Drill Hall on Thursday morning. Mr. Eugene Stock took the chair. Requests for prayer read out were numerous and varied, such as for parents who are giving up children for the Lord's work; for a mission in South Spain; for a native Christian in the Punjaub; for Mooltan and work among the Hindoos; for the suffering Armenian Christians: those released and those still in prison; for missionaries on furlough, that they may give much time to prayer and study of God's Word; for missionaries that everywhere they may expect and look out for greater results of their preaching. These and many other requests rose from earnest hearts in rapid succession.

God's ancient people, the Jews, were not forgotten. Our countrymen in heathen lands were very earnestly pleaded for, that their example instead of hindering God's work may help it forward. Prayers was offered for God's blessing on fresh efforts now being made for our soldiers in India; for converts at Beyrout; for Christian brethren in Turkey; for the speedy abolition of the opium traffic; that those kept at home may help on missionary work with all their might; that means may be provided for sending out the students in the camp; for all missionaries returning to the field, and especially for their children left behind and all missionary families thus separated. Then Africa and the mission in the Congo Valley pressed on the heart of one brother; and prayer rose for the medical schools in the land, and those applying themselves to medical studies. Two earnest prayers for humbling that we may be filled brought this most practical prayer-meeting to a close.

On the Lake.

On Thursday afternoon a flotilla of boats wended their way in the bright sunshine to one of the islands in the middle of the beautiful Keswick lake. The boats drew up on the beach, and the people spread out under the shade of the trees. We were soon joining in glad songs of praise, and then listening with breathless interest to the old story of Jesus preaching from the boat at the lake side, and then telling his disciples to push out into the deep, read very impressively by Rev. Evan Hopkins, with helpful remarks thereon.

Then followed, mingled with praise and prayer, a number of five minutes' addresses from brethren who had been out in the various mission fields, Bishop Hill, of the Niger, presiding. In a very short time we had listened to eight different speeches. Africa took the chief place, as was perhaps natural with two natives of Africa present to address us, while Dr. Guinness spoke about the Congo Balolo Mission, and Mr. Harris about work in Tripoli among Mohammedans, with a view to a mission in the Soudan. China and India were, however, not forgotten, Mr. Polhill-Turner and Mr. Elwin speaking on behalf of that great land; while Mrs. Morrison, of the Presbyterian Mission in India, pleaded earnestly that its claims might be kept in full view. After an hour thus interestingly spent together, the boats were rowed back; their occupants will not soon forget that bright afternoon, and the pleadings for help from so many mission-fields they listened to on the island in the midst of the beautiful Derwentwater.

From a very interesting communication to The Record, over the initials of Mr. Eugene Stock, we extract the following:—

"The Convention itself was exceptionally quiet. I will not say exceptionally solemn, for it always is that; but the absence of excitement has been more marked than ever. Last year a sensation, I believe, was created by Mr. George Grubb's addresses. In the preceding two years, as I hinted in your columns at the time, there was an undercurrent of controversy upon the subject of the Baptism of the Holy Ghost, which was, no doubt, unobserved by the mass of listeners, but which really affected the Convention in more ways than one. This year there has been nothing of the kind. But in its spiritual and practical influence probably no previous Convention has been attended with more blessing. At least so it is said by those who have the best opportunities of observing. As regards the teaching of the recognised leaders, especially Mr. Evan Hopkins, Mr. Hubert Brooke, and Dr. Elder Cumming, as well as (of course) Mr. Handley Moule and Mr. Webb-Peploe, some Evangelical clergymen of standing, who were present for the first time, expressed themselves as entirely satisfied with its clearness and Scriptural soundness. I ought to add, however, that some to whom I allude did not stop at critical approval. They recognised that there was a message from God to themselves, and they were led humbly to receive it. Approval of a theological statement is one thing; reception of a spiritual blessing is another.

"Among missionary gatherings not likely to be reported was one for candidates, including young missionaries not yet gone out. This was held on Sunday afternoon in a smaller hall, and was attended by eighty or a hundred persons, who were addressed by Mr. Meyer, Miss Nugent, Mrs. R. W. Stewart, and Canon Gibbon. Also a remarkable private réunion of all missionaries in the Drill Hall on Monday afternoon, to which no less than 150 came, although many had left Keswick that morning. They were first ranged according to societies, sitting in different parts of the room. The only two large contingents were the C.M.S. and the China Inland Mission. The rest belonged for the most part to the women's societies or to undenominational organisations, like the North Africa Mission. Only one or two representatives of the great English Nonconformist societies were present. Then a redistribution took place—a sort of game of "general post." All belonging to Africa went to one quarter of the room, all for India to another, and so on. About fifty were seen to belong to China, forty to India, twenty-five to Africa, etc. Mr. C. A. Fox then addressed the gathering, after which the whole party were photographed. The informal evening missionary meetings of the second week were held in the tent, and many speakers, from all parts of the world, had five or ten minutes each. Notwithstanding the great exodus of Monday and Tuesday, several hundreds of people assembled each night.

"One keenly feels that in jottings like these one only touches some of the more conspicuous external features of the Convention. But one shrinks from any attempt to gauge spiritual results, and indeed no such attempt could be successful, for no one can know all that is going on in individual hearts, and it is often the case that the deepest and most abiding effects are not seen at all at the time. But after a year's absence, and after many varied experiences in other parts of England and the world, one comes back to Keswick, and the deep conviction of the heart is that there is nothing elsewhere quite equal to it. Let every possible criticism have full force. Let every drawback and every imperfection be acknowledged. The one answer to all objections and hesitations is, Come and see. So long as the great fundamental truths of the Gospel are honoured; so long as man is humbled and the Lord alone exalted; so long as the practical obedience of the daily life to the law and will of God is enforced; so long as the Holy Ghost is declared to be the One Divine Agent for both the implanting and the growth of the Christian life in the soul; and so long as men and women go back to their own homes and spheres of work, or to new spheres beyond the sea, with fresh zeal and humility and love—so long will the Keswick Convention be regarded with gratitude and devotion by those who have had the privilege of attending."

PERTH CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.—The thirty-first annual meeting will be held in the City Hall, Perth, on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, September 12 to 14. The general subject is "The Christian Life," and the following, among others, have agreed to speak:—Revs. Hubert Brooke, Dr. Elder Cumming, Dr. Laidlaw, E. W. Moore, George H. C. Macgregor, J. Hudson Taylor, and Arthur Bonsey, of Hankow. Particulars may be had of Rev. D. D. Bannerman, D.D., Free St. Leonard's, Perth.

AMERICAN ARCOT MISSION.—The past year has not been one of large ingathering, and yet the missionaries report 375 souls having forsaken heathenism and placed themselves under Christian instruction. This would have been thought a Pentecostal blessing in the mission thirty years ago, but where they were satisfied with accessions by tens and even by ones then, they are scarcely content with ingatherings by hundreds now. The additions have been largely in the Arcot and the Madanapalle fields, the former having enrolled 204 and the latter 108 new adherents.

KESWICK, 1893.

A brilliant rainbow greeted us at the tent door, and a magnificent sunset dismissed us at the church porch a week after.

In haste we sought the tent,
But lo! 'mid threatening sky
God's burning rainbow sacrament
Stooped o'er us from on high.

Each glistering colour fair,
Flushed as with heaven's new wine,
Spelt out in sudden splendour there
The everlasting sign.

God spake, but no man heard,
Yet in our souls we knew
God had Himself once more averred
The ancient promise true.

Thus had our welcome come—
But after seven long days,
The Sabbath stillness spoke of home,
And bid us part in praise.

When, ere on terraced height,
We quit the sacred fane,
A wondrous vision burst in sight,
As from the Lamb once slain.

Westward, o'er mountains dim,
Through cloud-rents flashed far realms
And reaches thronged with Seraphim,
Whose nearness earth o'erwhelms.

Roll back, ye sunset gates,
And let the glory through!
The Church regains her lost estates,
New heavens break on her view.

Serene and brave and strong,
Henceforth, her Lord in sight,
Her every sorrow turns to song,
Her every task grows light.

She wields the powers of God
In wonder and in awe;
She treads the path the martyrs trod,
Sees visions martyrs saw.

Till, like these flaming heavens,
And mountain peaks warm dyed,
Transfiguring grace, descending, leavens
And glorifies the Bride!

Charles A. Fox.

Leaving the city
For Keswick's vale,
Looking for blessing
In the "King's Dale,"
With the Lord's people
Seeking his face,
With them we've tasted
Wonderful grace.
Down in the valley with Jesus we've been,
And low at his feet great things we have seen.

Low in the valley,
Mountains around,
Peaceful and quiet,
Scarcely a sound;
Glorious sunshine—
Emblem of grace—
Beaming upon us
From Jesu's face.
Down in the valley with Him we have been,
And, waiting before Him, great things we have seen.

Everything quiet,
Everyone still,
To the commandment
Bending the will.
Taking the message
Straight from the Lord,
Spoken so clearly
Through his own Word.
Down in the valley with Jesus we've been,
And, our "eyes unto" Him, great things we have seen.

Many hearts troubled,
Discov'ring sin
All unsuspected
Lurking within.
Till trust in the blood,
For sin once shed,
Brought pardon and peace,
Life from the dead.
Down in the valley with Jesus we've been,
And souls that were dead, born again we have seen

Many hearts shaken
By the great thought:
"Yielded have I To Christ as I ought?"
His—by redemption;
Mine own—in fact!
Henceforth, his only
In heart, word, act.
Down in the valley with Jesus we've been,
And, crowning Him "Lord," many souls we have seen.

"Satisfied," many
"Cleansed" and "fill'd,"
All questions answered,
Every fear still'd;
Trusting in Jesus,
End of all strife,
Following Jesus—
Motto for life.
Down in the valley with Jesus we've been,
And, owning Him "Master," souls we have seen.

Many hearts burning
With love Divine,
"All now for Jesus
Since He is mine;
His be my service,
Body and soul—
His my possessions,
Let Him take all."
Down in the valley with Jesus we've been,
And "all-consecrated" souls we have seen.

From the still valley
Back we must go
Into the hurry
Toss'd "to and fro";
But with this deep, sweet
Secret within,
Jesus our Saviour
Keeps us from sin.
Down in the valley our Jesus we've seen,
And to us He is all He to others has been.

E.

We thank Thee, O Redeemer, Lord,
For thy Divine oblation,
For grace, and peace, and welcome rest,
For all thy great salvation.

We thank Thee, Saviour, Brother, Friend,
For holy expectation,
For hopes fulfilled, for strength received,
In our great convocation.

From north and south, from east and west,
In thousands there assembled:
"All one in Christ," our motto sweet,
Our love was not dissembled.

Christ in the midst made known his power,
Our hearts with gladness thrilling;
Our past forgiven, our future bright,
Our souls with glory filling.

The feast was spread, the Lord Himself
With graciousness presided;
We talked with Him, and He with us,
And in his love confided.

Thrice blessed guests, who then partook
Of food most satisfying;
May we delight to hand the bread
To those by hunger dying.

O that our lips may speak for Thee;
Our walk be calm and steady;
Our fellowship still closer be;
For all thy will be ready.

. . . .

And, now returning to our work,
In prayer and faith abounding;
May gratitude inspire our life,
Thy praise, O Christ, resounding.

HOLLOWAY.—The report of the Holloway Ragged School shows earnest work and steady growth. The Sunday-schools as well as special missions have been much blessed, while the relief and other departments have been actively pushed forward. The secretary is Mr. John Thompson, 275, Holloway-road, N.

MARTYR MEMORIAL MISSION VANS.—Two new vans, the "Bishop Hooper" and "Oxford Martyrs," were dedicated last week at Gloucester, and sent on their mission service in the counties of Gloucester, Hereford, Shrops, and Oxford. The vans will work under the auspices of the Church Association and the National Protestant League, Messrs. Brookes and Bradfield being the colporteurs in charge.

AMONG MINERS IN SOUTH WALES.

We have from time to time given some account of the work which has been carried on for the past fifteen years in connection with the Undenominational Christian Mission and Ragged Schools at Pontymoile, near Pontypool, South Wales. The Mission had its origin in the mind and heart of the present Hon. Supt., Mr. T. M. Wintle, who, upon removing to the district from Swansea, in 1877, was struck by the open sin and spiritual destitution everywhere prevailing, and resolved to do what he could. A Sunday school was established, followed by the institution of Gospel services. The meeting-house—a disused room in a cottage, approached from the outside by a flight of stone steps—was almost from the first densely crowded by persons anxious to hear and profit by the Word of Life; converts and helpers increased, and it soon became evident that the work was destined to live.

Since that time the work has steadily grown in vitality and power, and—reverently would we say it—"in favour with God and man." Opposition, the outcome of ignorance and prejudice, has been lived down; the cheap sneers of objectors silenced; and erstwhile foes have been transformed into firm friends. Increased accommodation became necessary, and in 1879 a move was made to the Mission Hall, an iron structure erected in close proximity to the original site. Here for some years a most gracious work was carried on, and there are those scattered up and down the country, serving the Master in various way and spheres, who date their spiritual birth to the old Mission Hall at Pontymoile. In process of time, however, the old hall again became too small for the proper carrying on of the various agencies connected with the Mission, the result being that in 1891, as the outcome of combined prayer and effort, a handsome and commodious pile of buildings was erected, adjacent to the high road at Pontymoile, at a cost of £2000, the whole of which has been defrayed. The premises comprise a large hall, capable of accommodating 600 persons (the building being frequently taxed to the utmost to accommodate those desirous of attending the services), a lesser hall, ante-rooms, tea and coffee rooms, and temperance institute, so arranged as to open into the large hall, thus providing accommodation for 1200 people.

The operations of the Mission are represented by infant Scripture classes, open-air services, adult Bible classes, tract distribution, temperance effort, Sunday-school, free lending library, young believers' meetings, evangelistic meetings, sewing classes, Bible-carriage work, pictorial services for children.

It is true that "Charity should begin at home." It is equally true that it ought not to end there. As opportunity offered, branches of the work have been formed at Pontypool (the nearest town), Cwmffrwddoer (a mining village), and Pontnewydd (a colliery and manufacturing district). The latest addition to the sphere of the Mission's operations is at Dowlais, some twenty miles distant. As at the headquarters, so at the respective branches, the presence of the Master is frequently vouchsafed, and tokens of the Divine blessing abundantly manifest.

The present trade depression is being keenly felt throughout Monmouthshire and adjoining counties, so that friends and funds are urgently required. Many old helpers have been called from their work to their reward and it is true now as ever; "The harvest truly is great, but the labourers are few." Additional subscriptions would at this time especially cheer the heart of the hon. superintendent, whose arduous and incessant labours have told upon a constitution not naturally robust, and who has been of late in a very enfeebled, if not precarious, state of health. It may be mentioned that for many years Mr. Wintle has been at his ordinary calling, earning his daily bread, while carrying on the Mission and its branches. Now, however, he is unable to continue the double duty, and has lost his situation, being henceforth wholly devoted to the work and dependent on the Lord's people for support. His many friends will unite in praying that he may soon be completely restored, and that he may for years to come be spared to "serve his generation by the will of God." F.

LEPERS AT RANIGANJ.—A man and his daughter, inmates of the leper asylum, were recently baptized. These are the first-fruits of this work. There are now seventeen lepers in the asylum, and buildings are being constructed to accommodate more.

GLIMPSES OF VILLAGE WORK.

During the past three months Mr. Newton Jones has been working in the villages. In June his work lay in the villages of Berkshire and Kent, with most gratifying results. Next to the spiritual life of the workers and churches being revived, there have been many tokens of blessing received by personal faith in the Lord Jesus. Specially amongst the young the interest has been cheering. His charts, descriptive of many Gospel subjects, with the points of address and illustrations of same, all pictured on the canvas, have appealed not only to the eye, but through the eye to the heart; the singing has been hearty and the solo singing much appreciated, and not a few have been, through God's spirit, able to catch hold of the life-line thrown out to them. When in one village a cat was found to be in deep distress in a well, having sat on a ledge within 6 inches of the bottom all night, all means were adopted, but in vain; a bucket was lowered with meat, another with milk; but a third time was it sent down with a kitten inside. The cries of the child attracted the mother, and at once it was enticed to jump in, and so was rescued. So with the work of the past month: the parents have often been reached by the child; two meetings being held nightly, 6.30 for children and 8.0 p.m. adults and senior scholars.

During July the meetings were continued in Sussex, at Hayward's Heath, Crawley, Burgess Hill, Portslade, Fishergate, Southwick, Shoreham, Seaford, Ringmer, Bascombe, Alfriston, Polegate, the Sundays being spent in the nearest largest town, so forming a link of interest between town and village. The singing of the good old hymns to some of the oldest-fashioned tunes, with the old, old story unfolded, has been met with great appreciation by all, and eternity only will reveal the outcome of this short, but enjoyable, service for the Master.

During August the work is to be carried on daily on the sands of Broadstairs. Last season three or four of the best workers were those who the year previous had confessed Christ, and since the first year's visit numerous indeed have been the testimonies received from those having received blessing, both old and young.

The winter campaign is already arranged, and the prayers of God's children are earnestly desired. The engagements are: Godalming, September 23; Chesham, September 30; Ealing, October 7; Hednesford, October 14; Lambeth, October 21; Birmingham, October 28; Crouch End, November 4; Bath, November 11; Pembroke Dock, November 18; Pembroke, November 25; Bromley (Fargury), December 3; Dover, December 9.

Poor Jews in Palestine.

Week by week we receive letters from Palestine, telling of the misery of the Jewish refugees, who are now again arriving by the steamers and landing, mostly destitute, pillaged by the boatmen who bring them on shore of the little left them in clothes or money; sorrow-stricken people who hope for little but the boon of dying unmolested in the land of their fathers. An eye-witness just arrived in London reports that there is very much sickness at Jaffa, due to what appears to be a severe outbreak of influenza. From Jerusalem we have the same sad story—the sick and aged dying of want in over-crowded places unfit for dwellings; the younger people, unable to get work, languishing with their children for lack of bread, and unable to buy enough water to drink. There is sore distress.

We are doing what we can, and have this summer been enabled to employ above fifty at Abraham's Vineyard; also to give a little food and water to a few hundreds of the starving; and to distribute some clothing. A poor old Jewess on receiving a garment, blessed the giver, but cried, "Clothing is nice; but oh, I want bread for my children."

While the need steadily increases, we in common with other institutions have lately had to lament diminution of funds, owing to bank failures and other losses, which prevent friends from giving as usual.

While thankfully acknowledging the goodness of Him who has year after year been to us better than our fears and has helped hitherto, we plead with all who can do so, to lessen our cares and lighten the labour by sending us what they can spare before leaving home for their holidays.

E. A. Finn, Secretary.

WHEN AN ITALIAN MONK reproached a little girl for going to the Sunday school, she said, "Come and hear first the beautiful things we are taught, and then you will be better able to judge."

THE CENTRAL SOUDAN MISSION.

To many people the Soudan simply means the region round about Khartum, yet this is but a small portion of the area which it covers, for it reaches right across the continent, south of the Sahara, measuring 3600 miles from east to west, and 1000 miles from north to south, with a population almost equal to that of the whole of North America.

The routes which the Central Soudan Mission has been led to choose are (1) that by which the trade of the Central Soudan reaches the coast of the Mediterranean. From Tunis, Tripoli, and Benghazi, there are regular caravans which carry European manufactured goods into the interior, bringing back in return ivory, ostrich feathers, skins, and slaves. (2) The Benue, a branch of the river Niger, by which a position about 400 miles in advance of the furthest C.M.S. station, Lokoja, can be reached, and a centre formed from which to proceed to the large commercial cities around Lake Tchad. A house has been taken in Tripoli for a training home, and here three men are studying Arabic and Hausa (the commercial language of the Central Soudan). The Word of God is distributed, and they have also a magic lantern with Scriptural slides. The Lord has already blessed their labours, for one Hausa negro and two Arabs have already professed faith in the Lord Jesus. Regarding the Benue branch, two men who had also been at Tripoli attempted last March to ascend the River Niger, but were detained at the mouth by the Royal Niger Company, and after waiting seven weeks, one of them, Mr. Edward White, fell asleep in Jesus. His companion, Mr. T. Holt, has just returned to England, and is awaiting the formation of a party. A student of Harley College who is now studying medicine previous to his leaving England, has been accepted for this work, and also a nurse.

The director of the Mission, Mr. Hermann G. Harris, B.A., lately arrived in England to plead for volunteers, and is open to address meetings after September 1. Invitations may be sent to Mr. S. W. Gentle-Cackett, Harley College, Bow, London, E., from whom full particulars of the Mission can be obtained by enclosing stamp. Mr. Harris's address during August is Wentworth, The Shrubbery, Weston-super-Mare.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

The Sailors' Orphan Society of Scotland has now 327 children under its care.

There is a strong movement among farm servants in some parts of Scotland in favour of a weekly half-holiday.

Rev. W. Todd, of Glasgow, has been ordained as successor to the late Mr. Colvin in the pastorate of the Free Church, Auchterarder.

The late Dr. Brown, of Arbroath, has devised the residue of his estate for the establishment of a three years' bursary at St. Andrews or the University College, Dundee.

A correspondent of The Daily Mail, Glasgow, complains of the increase of Sunday excursion traffic in the Paisley-road district. There is more quietness during the week, he says, than on Sunday.

The "Amateur Vagrant," writing to the Mail on "Neglected Children," brings a heavy indictment against municipal authorities in our large towns for not protecting the innocent children from the ravages of the drink.

IRISH NOTES.

A project is on foot to establish a Sailors' Rest in Limerick, where it is much needed.

Showers of blessing have been experienced at the services in the Gospel tent at Ballinamallard during the past few weeks.

Out of seven members of the Wesleyan Missionary deputation appointed to visit Ireland this year in the interest of the Society, six are returned missionaries.

A Methodist New church has been opened at Union Hall, a beautiful watering-place on the south coast of county Cork, where the necessity for such a building was long felt, and where it is hoped it will prove a great blessing.

Rev. T. W. Clarendon, rector of Maralin, co. Down, who has abandoned the pew-letting system and introduced the plan of free seats into his church, finds that the new arrangement works well, and that the congregations are increased.

MORAL INFLUENCE is the greatest thing of all with children. A plain ignorant working man in a smock frock influenced me greatly, as a teacher, because of his moral character.—F. J. Gladman.

TEMPERANCE NOTES.

A great Local Veto meeting has been held a Trowbridge, presided over by Mr. G. P. Fuller, M.P

Mr. T. W. Russell thinks that if the Local Veto Bill is applied to England, it should apply to Ireland as well.

The prize of £100 for a temperance tale offered by the Sunday School Union has been awarded to Rev. R. Vennell, Ash, Kent.

The Archbishop and Bishops in the Southern Province have recommended Sunday, November 12, for the observance of "Temperance Sunday."

The Sturminster Newton magistrates granted an application from a publican for one hour's extension on the occasion of the annual Band of Hope fête.

Lady Paget told a Westminster Gazette interviewer that a reformed diet would make an end of drunkenness, as the craving for strong liquors usually ceased with abstinence from flesh.

In 1880, 66,703 acres were devoted to the cultivation of hops in England, the yield that year amounting to 473,000 cwt. Last year the acreage was 56,520 acres, the production being 413,259 cwt.

A Union Temperance Convention is to be held in Toronto on the 3rd and 4th of October, under the joint auspices of three great temperance orders, the W.C.T.U., the Alliance, the Advanced Prohibitionists, and the Church societies.

The House of Commons has appointed a commission to inquire into the cultivation of the hemp plant in India, and the moral effect of the preparation of drugs therefrom; also the manufacture, sale, and taxation of other native drinks.

An official return shows that there has been of late years a remarkable decrease in the consumption of alcohol in New Zealand. There has also been a decrease of 40 per cent. in convictions for drunkenness, almost coinciding with the decreased consumption of spirits.

The Voice publishes a valuable table showing that the total production of malt liquors in the United States in 1892 was 987,555,406 gallons, and of distilled liquors 118,436,506 gallons, making a grand total of 1,105,991,912 gallons for a gross population of 65,000,000, or seventeen gallons for every man, woman, and child. The waste of grain in the production of these liquors is estimated at 4,000,000,000 pounds, which would give one pound of bread per day for a whole year to eleven millions of people, about one-sixth of the total population of the United States.

A correspondent writes to the Temperance League: "In Midhurst, Sussex, with a population of 1674, we have eighteen persons licensed to sell intoxicants! There are seven fully-licensed houses, seven beer-houses, and four shops with off-licences. This number includes two brewers, one of whom does an extensive trade. Eleven men are found drinking on licensed premises in prohibited hours. The policeman finds them; he enters at the back door; they offer him beer, which he refuses; they are summoned, and are acquitted, because, it was argued, they were guests."

In the Free Church of Scotland are between 700 and 800 ministers who are personal abstainers, and 92 per cent. of the students in the divinity halls are also abstainers. The younger ministers are almost to a man unanimous in their support of the temperance cause, and in favour of the imperial and municipal authorities using their legislative and administrative powers to clear away the temptations of the people. Probationers working as missionaries in the large towns always become enthusiastic on this question, because they find that no progress can be made with the poorer classes until they get them to abstain from drink.

Prof. Goldwin Smith, though a strong anti-prohibitionist, seems to stand aghast at the evils of our present licensed liquor traffic. After writing in the past against prohibition, and even against total abstinence, he now gives the following deliberate opinion:—"When I see the havoc—the ever-increasing havoc—which drink is making with the industry, the vigour, the character of the British race, I have sometimes asked myself whether, if it is incumbent on Legislature to stop a cattle plague by closing the ports against contagion, the most deadly of all man's plagues ought to be allowed to spread without control."

Writing in Abkari, Mr. W. S. Caine, M.P., says: The Nawab of Junagad has issued the following prohibition proclamation: "Whereas it is opposed to the tenets of the Mahommedan religion to derive any revenue whatsoever by letting out contracts for liquor, it is hereby proclaimed by His Highness the Nawab Sahib of Junagad, that the practice of farming out contracts for spirits shall be no longer permitted in His Highness's territories from this day forward. It is further proclaimed that it is His Highness's wish that all existing Abkari contracts should forthwith be brought to a speedy termination by an amicable settlement of their claims."

Letters to the Editor.

A GOOD CUSTOM.

Dear Sir,—During the missionary meeting at Keswick, on Saturday, July 29, Mr. Eugene Stock mentioned that the Waganda elders have a custom of joining in prayer in the vestry with the officiating minister for ten minutes at the commencement of each service; and Bishop Tucker thought it would be a "good custom to introduce in England."

This custom is probably a survival from the lamented Mackay of Uganda, and has been in vogue in England and Scotland a very long while. In many Nonconformist and Presbyterian churches, no service is commenced without prayer in the vestry by one or more of the elders or deacons. Possibly not a few Church of England vestries are also familiarised with this wholesome practice.

Yours sincerely, "Praying Always."

INSPECTION? OR SUPPRESSION?

Dear Sir,—As to the article in last week's Christian, "Inspection? or Suppression?" I quite agree with what the writer says. "The system is pagan and Satanic, and we should be content with nothing less than the total suppressing of religious houses so called." If your readers will procure a little pamphlet from J. Kensit, 18, Paternoster-row, price 3d., entitled "English Convents, what are they?" and read the instances recorded in that book of the dreadful immorality and wickedness committed in those places of iniquity, they will at once see the necessity of suppressing them altogether.—Yours faithfully, L. Sampson.

THE PROPOSED INQUIRY.

Sir,—It is a grief of mind to some of us, who know something of Rome's tactics, to see Protestants so ignorant of them as to be playing into her hands by taking part in the committee respecting Miss Golding's charges against convents. The result is certain: it may be said to have been arranged already. There will be no proof of Miss Golding's statements, and Rome will make out a triumph. To use this triumph in the most effective way is, doubtless, the view with which this imposing committee has been called into existence.

There was one course, and only one, which should have been adopted in response to the demand for a committee of inquiry. Extracts from Dens, Liguori, etc., should have been given, setting forth that falsehood and deceit are the weapons expressly sanctioned by Rome's highest authorities for meeting attacks which may injure her; and in the face of these, it might have been asked what sane man would look for evidence to substantiate Miss Golding's allegations, or any similar ones, from women or men who are made to believe that their eternal happiness or perdition depends on their obeying or disobeying the mandates of a Romish priest. Vindex.

A TIMELY REMINDER.

Dear Sir,—Keswick and many other conventions are now past and gone! Some of us are asking, "What shall the harvest be?" More light and increased responsibility have been laid upon not a few. Praise God, some have entered upon a life of full devotion to Jesus Christ, and eternity alone will reveal the blessed results! There are others who have come back to the routine of their life work who need to be taught that the "more abundant life" which Jesus gives is not for their happiness but for use as He shall direct.

Obedience, not happiness, must be their watchword! Holiness includes not only faith but works. The commission of our Master stands out clear. "Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all the nations." Not only teach and preach, but "make disciples."

Many whom I have met from time to time have been so impressed that this great work belongs to the preachers only that they have never thought it possible that they could "make disciples." A very helpful method I have found for such is to get them to seek the salvation of their own friends one by one.

Some years ago I commenced to keep a list of persons and subjects for daily prayer, and to help others I have issued a little book called "One by One." The size is made most convenient for the pocket, 3in. by 1⅝in. It contains twelve blank pages where the holder can enter the names of unconverted friends. These he daily brings before God in prayer, and the Holy Spirit has guided many to do exactly what was needed to lead them to Christ. I shall be glad to send to any who will furnish address and a penny stamp, one of these little books which have been used by God to lead many to Christ.

SEASIDE SERVICES.

Mr. Gerald Coultas has been conducting services on the sands at Whitstable, Herne Bay, Margate, Broadstairs, Sandgate, etc. A large number who never attend any place of worship have heard the Word by this means, and definite blessing has attended the services. This is a large field for Christian workers; thousands flock to the seaside at this season of the year, and by these services many receive their first good impression for spiritual things.

WEST-END WORKING MEN.

The London City Missionaries in the neighbourhood of Golden-square, W., have during the summer been holding dinner-hour open-air services, especially with the object of reaching the working men. On most occasions we have a good crowd of attentive listeners, and we have had signs of goodly blessing on this special effort. We have regular places for holding these services each day, thus gaining the interest of the men working near. Any men living or working in the district and desirous of taking part in these meetings should communicate with the missionaries.

SOLDIERS' INSTITUTE, PORTSMOUTH.

There has been for some weeks past tokens of Divine approval on the work carried on here, the Sunday afternoon Bible-class going up to about 150 when the Militia were in camp, and last Sunday eighty attended from the garrison only. Every night the meeting for Bible study is also well attended, and there have been numerous instances of decision for Christ, and of backsliders being restored. We all had a deep sense of the Master's presence at the S.C.A. meeting last Saturday evening, when about a dozen soldiers gave personal testimony as to God's keeping power in the barrack-room.

THE PARIAHS OF INDIA.

Mr. T. B. Pandian gave, the other evening, an interesting lecture on the "Pariahs of India" to a large audience in the Akeman-street Strict Baptist Chapel, Tring. All Christians will wish him success in his work, and aid him in his efforts for the uplifting of our fellows. On Sunday week, Mr. Pandian took part in the morning service with Mr. J. H. Lynn, in the afternoon gave an address on mission-work to the Sunday-school, and preached the Gospel in the evening. It was a very refreshing time, as many who were there can testify. May his visit here and elsewhere be the means of stirring up a missionary spirit among us, and sending more labourers to that large field of India. J. B.

DR. NEWMAN HALL

has been spending three weeks in Switzerland. At Mürren there is a Roman Catholic Church, and a Church of England connected with the S.P.G., where, in addition to Sunday services, there is daily early prayer. As there are these churches, no religious services are allowed at the hotels, in order not to offend any of the guests, who belong to a variety of creeds. But amusements are varied, and as lectures come under this designation, Dr. Newman Hall availed himself of the opportunity, and, with the desire of many of the guests, American and English, addressed a large audience one rainy afternoon on "Mountains," and on Sunday evening gave an account of two visits to Jerusalem, full of Gospel truths held in common both by Roman Catholic and Protestant Christians.

He is announced to preach August 13 and 20 at Llandudno, and the three following Sundays at Barmouth.

THE CHRISTIAN ALLIANCE.

The second annual convention of the Christian Alliance took place at Asbury Park, N.J., during the eight days from July 8 to 16. The attendance was not large, but every meeting, from the first to last, was full of blessing. The subjects studied were Christ the Saviour, Sanctifier, and Healer; his Second Coming imminent, and the duty of the world's speedy evangelisation.

On the second Lord's day the annual missionary collection was taken, and out of an audience of about seventy-five, 3924dols. was pledged, while the support of seven missionaries was individually undertaken. Many undertook the support of little girls in India and Africa. It was mentioned that out of the 60,000dols. pledged for world's evangelisation in one day at Old Orchard Beach last August, 95 per cent. had been paid up. The International Missionary Alliance was honoured by God to send out more than one hundred missionaries to the heathen during the year. Some members are giving their all into the treasury to speed the Lord's coming. Additional pledges have come in, raising it to 5000dols.

A WORD FROM CEYLON.

Working as I am in a hotbed of heathendom, the account of God's victories in other parts of the world often cheer and give encouragement when one is inclined to be in an opposite frame of mind. Your paper goes the round of many native Christians after I have read it, and they much enjoy it. Let your paper be known as the propagator of a Full Gospel. A friend talking to an intelligent Buddhist yesterday was asked, "What benefit do you get from Christ?" "We shall go to heaven when we die." "Oh," said he, "if we believe Buddha we shall go to Nirwana (annihilation) when we die; but what can Christ do for you in this life?" That is what these poor heathens seem to long for; aye, and white heathens too—the power of an in-dwelling Christ, to free from the power of sin and Satan. Oh, tell it out. And seeing this power in the lives of true believers is the greatest "witness" for Christ. They are always asking for signs—poor things, what signs (?) their priests give them. A truly converted sinner is just the greatest sign a man can have, and even the change and keeping power in a previously good man. E. Carus Wilson.

THE Y.M.C.A.

The Bangor (Belfast) Y.M.C.A. is doing a vigorous open-air work, and has started a temperance café.

Rev. R. J. Ward has a flourishing Bible-class at Blacktown, Madras, in connection with the Y.M.C.A.

Mr. W. H. Coutts, late general secretary of the Y.M.C.A. at El Dorado, Kansas, is conducting a mission in that city.

Mr. Thos. H. McMillan, general secretary of the Y.M.C.A. at Harriman, Tennessee, a faithful labourer of the Gospel, has lately fallen asleep.

It is hoped to publish the Year Book of the Associations in the course of the present month. The volume will contain many interesting features.

At St. Austell, £800 has been promised towards £2,400 needed for the new premises, which are being erected on the site of a well-known public-house.

The Central International Committee (Geneva) have notified the setting apart of 12th to 19th November next as the week of universal prayer for young men.

The annual excursion of the Belfast Y.M.C.A. was to the Isle of Man. Sixteen hundred persons availed themselves of the trip, which, financially and in all other respects, was a great success.

By the recent death of Sir Michael Connal, the Glasgow Association lost one of its oldest honorary vice-presidents. For many years Sir Michael conducted a Bible class for young men in the East-end of the city.

A letter has just been received telling of the formation of a Y.M.C.A. in Damascus, the "oldest city in the world." Already forty members have been enrolled, and Dr. Mackinnon, the medical missionary there, is one of the moving spirits in the Association.

The Vancouver Y.M.C.A. has just opened a splendidly equipped new building. The ceremony was most influentially attended, and the mayor proclaimed a general half holiday in order that the young men engaged in stores might be well represented.

The annual report of the Camden and Kentish Town Association shows steady progress. A hundred fresh members and associates have been added during the past year. The Gospel and Bible class work has been much blessed, while the interest in Foreign Missions has been greatly deepened.

Definite blessing has been given to some soldiers attending the meetings held for them in the Garrison Theatre, Lydd. Others who have come to the Y.M.C.A. meetings have been greatly blessed also. Christian parents or friends interested in any of the officers or men encamped here should send their names to the Hon. Sec., Y.M.C.A., Lydd, and they shall be looked up.

The Cairo Y.M.C.A., formed last winter by Mr. Holmes, one of the foreign secretaries of the National Council, has entered into the occupation of suitable rooms. A series of excellent addresses have been given by various travellers passing through Cairo, and the meetings are well maintained. In the Church Missionary Gleaner for this month, Mr. Holmes gratefully acknowledges the willing co-operation, the advice, and the assistance rendered him by the missionaries in his efforts to form Associations in the places he visited in the Holy Land.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER:—For the work at the London Road Hall, Kettering.—That the way may be opened for a young man to work as a missionar among the navvies.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of the late Rev. R. D. Roberts, Baptist Pastor, Llanelly, South Wales.

We have to thank the many friends who have contributed again to our "Day in the Country" fund. The total amount received up to date, however, is nearly £60 less than last year; while the demands on the fund multiply rather than diminish. We trust that the claims of our poor City children, to whom a day's respite from the stifling heat of narrow courts and alleys means so much, will be still further considered by those more fortunately placed.

The construction of the Mid-African telegraph, which is "to connect the Cape with Cairo, and to carry the touch of civilisation across the wastes of the Soudan," has been actually begun. Its completion will be a great step towards the fuller enlightenment of the Dark Continent. By helping to place Central Africa in close and rapid communication with the outside world, this commercial undertaking must prove a powerful handmaid to the furtherance of the Gospel.

One feature of the recent Workmen's Exhibition in London cannot but commend itself to all who love thoroughness in work and honesty in trade. It was organised by the London Trades Council "as a protest against the scampy and shoddy side of commercial life, and against the prostitution of the skill of the workman, and the consequent deterioration of industry, which would be disastrous to the best interests of the community." The protests of writers are good, but the action of the men is better; and it would be better still if the public demanded good things rather than cheap.

We publish on p. 25, a sympathetic review of Dr. Strong's thoughtful book, "The New Era." It is a good sign that great social problems are squarely faced and dispassionately examined. In our hearts, however, they each and all suggest the prayer, "Come, Lord Jesus"; for we cannot conceive of a world-wide and thorough readjustment, a true social regeneration, apart from the Lord's return—the Christian's glorious hope and humanity's great need. Even in Apostolic days "the whole creation groaned and travailed in pain ... waiting to be delivered from the bondage of corruption," national and personal, moral and physical. The condition of things has since then undergone no essential change. The servants of Christ have not cast out all the demons, nor cured all the unclean spirits; the Lord Himself, when He returns from the high place of heavenly glory, will do that which his disciples have failed to do, and the world will be "astonished at the majesty of God" (Luke ix. 43).

On page 26 will be found a reply by Rev. W. F. Cobb, the assistant-secretary of the English Church Union, to the statements in the article we recently published on "Ritualism in East London." Mr. Cobb's letter bristles with statements that are open to serious question, but we do not at present notice them in detail. Speaking generally, however, we may assure him that those Christians who abide by evangelical views of New Testament teaching do not regard the points at issue to be the "mere minor matters," which he describes them. They are all plain and palpable indications of the sacerdotal and Romanising views of truth which are rapidly robbing the Church of England of its character as a Reformed communion, and which would place her members again under the heel of an unchristian, so-called "priesthood."

The striking letter to The Guardian of last week by Archdeacon Farrar, shows that this is no chimerical supposition. He maintains, and proves by specific quotation, that no substantial difference can be found between Ritualistic teaching as to the mass, transubstantiation, prayers for the dead, etc., and the superstitions taught on these points by the Church of Rome. No doubt the Ritualistic contention is unassailable, that the formularies of the Church of England in many parts give force and substance to the teachings they advance. Surely it is high time that Evangelical Churchmen should agitate strongly for such a revision of the Prayer Book as shall bring it into line with the plain and accepted teachings of Scripture.

Canon Knox Little denies, in his reply to Archdeacon Farrar, that Ritualists believe in Transubstantiation. He quotes Archbishop Bramwell, who says, "We place it among the opinion of the schools, not among the articles of our faith." He asserts that "the Church of England, in fact, teaches emphatically and distinctly 'the Real Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ under the form of bread and wine.'" He then proceeds to distinguish between the Anglican and the Romish Church in the following way:—

> What our part of the Catholic Church does is this: she refuses to say how that mysterious Presence is given, and she declines to accept the teaching of the Roman part of the Catholic Church, that the how of the Presence is to be defined by the term Transubstantiation. I will venture to say that no "Ritualist," if I must use the Archdeacon's insulting term, believes in Transubstantiation.

The Canon goes on to accuse the Roman part of the Catholic Church of venturing to make what Archbishop Bramwell calls "an opinion of the schools" into a doctrine of the faith; "she has ventured to say how the Lord has kept his promise of his presence, while the English part of the Catholic Church has said that his promise is kept faithfully, but she declines to say how." To us the opinions of dominant schools have a bad habit of becoming acknowledged, and then binding, articles of faith; hence the position in the Romish Church of doctrines which are not taught in Scripture. However annoyed Canon Little may be at the assertion that belief in the real presence involves transubstantiation, men of plain and unsophisticated habits of thought will remain of the mind that "the real presence of the body and blood of Christ under the form of bread and wine" could not be possible in any other way than by transubstantiation.

The subjection of the mind to Church authority is very strikingly manifested in the words of Cardinal Newman on the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception:—

> Many, many doctrines are far harder than the immaculate conception. The doctrine of original sin is infinitely harder. Mary has just not this difficulty. It is no difficulty to believe that a soul is united to the flesh without original sin; the great mystery is that any, that millions on millions, are born with it. Our teaching about Mary has just one difficulty less than our teaching about the state of mankind generally.

Newman has been well described as having a "sort of quantitave method of measuring mysteries." When he had accepted one, he would accept any number—on the authority of the Church. This "quantitave" cast of mind may also be traced in unbelief. We have heard a quondam leader of sceptics say that, in his sceptical days, he objected to revelation, because it required him to love God with "all his soul;" in which case, he said, "I could have none left for my wife." Love was a measurable quantity to him!

The Pope has again intervened in French politics, expostulating in very decided terms with certain men "putting themselves forward as Catholics," for thinking that they know what is good for the interests of the Church better than "him who is at once the protector and head of the Church." A very sore point is, that these too ardent sons of the Church "do not even spare the Supreme Pontiff in their criticism." Into the merits of the particular points at issue we have no wish to enter; but in the interests of human freedom, and of the religion of Jesus Christ, we cannot but be thankful that those peoples who have long owned the sway of the Vatican are breaking loose from the dogma of Papal infallibility. The discovery that a Pope may be wrong in his politics must awaken distrust in his impeccability as to morals and spiritual beliefs.

Dr. Dale has been speaking against the use of the te[illegible] hero and heroism as too common in preaching:—

> In many cases, these rhetorical exhortations to be heroes do incalculable mischief. There are some earnest and devout Christian men and women who realise that there is no possibility of anything grand or heroic in them, and this kind of teaching brings a disappointment which enfeebles the Christian lives of such.

We have long been of opinion that the terms are, under all circumstances and in all connections, best omitted by preachers. They have gained a certain standing, and have about them the atmosphere of a certain association which is anything but Christian. Carlyle's lectures gave them a strong place in our terminology, but they do not suggest the mind and spirit of Jesus; and Christian teachers will do well to re instal some of the deposed and despised terms of the New Testament, such as saints, brethren, etc. If we have "saints, who walk worthy of the Gospel," we can dispense with heroes.

The treatment of American missionaries in Armenia has not unnaturally roused indignation in the United States. Many friends of missions have been considering the position of affairs with some care; and Dr. Cyrus Hamlin in the Missionary Review for June last, called for a more vigorous interference on the part of the U.S.A. Government, on behalf of missionaries wronged or endangered. Certainly everyone would wish to see the most strenuous measures adopted in all such cases, provided these measures be of a peaceful and diplomatic character. There is, however, another and very important aspect of the question. Do the missionaries go forth as simple witnesses for God, and relying upon Him alone? This point is strongly urged by Dr. Evans Darby, of the Peace Society, who says, replying to Dr. Hamlin:—

It is increasingly felt in most of the Churches of Christ that those good men who go forth in his name to preach the Gospel to the heathen and to savage tribes must be prepared to do so at the risk of some sacrifice for their Great Master's sake, and also as feeling that it is specially incumbent upon them to cherish towards the objects of their religious solicitude such a loving and forbearing spirit that they shall be willing even to endure some measure of suffering themselves, if necessary, rather than hasten to avail themselves of the interposition of the sword, the bayonet, and the cannon-ball. Surely Dr. Hamlin and others of his way of thinking on this question may do well to ponder afresh the grand examples of loving heroism and patient endurance which, to the high honour of their class, Christian missionaries in general have furnished to the Church and to the world.

The triumphs of the Gospel sometimes come home to us with overwhelming power. It is so when we hear a missionary say that he comes from an island where the people were cannibals fifty years ago, but that now almost every one of them is a professed follower of the Saviour, and that no one ever thinks of guarding his house at night; a lock is not wanted. Mr. R. H. Dana says of the Hawaiian Islands that the missionaries have established schools in them, reared up native teachers, and so pressed their work, that now the proportion of inhabitants who can read and write is greater than in New England! More, however, is contained in that sentence than appears on the surface. Hawaii progresses; New England declines, because the children of the Pilgrims go west to the fertile lands, and their places are being taken by crowds of ignorant Irish Catholics. Foreign parts need attention, but home must never be forgotten.

Mr. Edward Sell gives in The Contemporary an account of an attempt to reform Islam in harmony with modern ideas. One of the principal reformers is anxious that the "Muslims of India should achieve intellectual and moral regeneration under the auspices of the great European power that now holds their destinies in its hands." This compliment to England is doubtful; it certainly is an implicit reflection on Islam. The same ardent spirit says:—

The conviction is gradually forcing itself on all sides, in all advanced Muslim communities, that polygamy is as much opposed to the teachings of Mohammed as it is to the general progress of civilised society and true culture.

The conduct of the "prophet" himself has to be explained away as best the apologists can. A similar deliverance is given with regard to slavery. "The Muslims especially, for the honour of their noble prophet, should try to efface that dark page [of slavery] from their history." The movement is full of interest, as showing restlessness and dissatisfaction of mind, but Mr. Sell believes it will have little real effect on Islam as a polity and as a religion.

Rev. H. J. Foster has an "expository thought" in The Thinker which is worth volumes of such material as we too often get for the elucidation of Scripture. It is on Jonah, and he neither shirks nor minimises the undoubted difficulties of the book, but faces them, and draws from them their meaning and their lesson. The foregleams of the New Testament which he discerns shining in the prophet and in his work, are beautiful and impressive. Thus he asks:—

What was Jonah, as he sat "very angry" under the dwindling shadow of his withering gourd, but an "elder brother," grudging and grumbling at God's mercy toward a prodigal city, repentant now and returning? So, too, the last words of the book: "Much cattle." Doth, then, God take care for, not only the citizens and the children, but even the cattle, of a heathen city? These words are coming, and are being antedated: "Your Heavenly Father feedeth the sparrows."

Mr. Foster's article is very valuable in its treatment of the difficulties as to a whole city repenting at the call of a strange man; as to the fish and Jonah's preservation in it for three days; and the parallel between Jonah and Jesus is drawn with fine discrimination. But how came the writer to speak of God in the following way?—

That is the heart of a good man (Jonah), but of a narrow one. It is not the heart of the God even of the Old Testament.

He does not think that the God of the Old Testament is different from the God of the New. Then, does he think that God was so dimly revealed as to be practically different from the God of the New? If so, his own study of this marvellous prophet should have corrected him. For ourselves, we see in the God of the early chapters of Genesis the forthshining of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

"LIBERATOR" RELIEF FUND.—This committee have so far been giving temporary relief by making an allowance to those solely dependent on the interest on savings invested, and nearly 1700 of these have been relieved for a time. Now, however, their need is as great as at first; a second grant has become necessary, and for this funds are urgently needed. Many of the cases of widows, helpless invalids, and so on, are simply deplorable. The secretary is Rev. J. Stockwell Watts, 16, Farringdon-street, E.C.

HOME REUNION AT LUCERNE.—The Reunion Conference, which is this year being held in Lucerne, has, from the point of numbers, been a greater success than was anticipated by the most sanguine of its supporters. Among the gentlemen who have already taken part in the discussions, or will do so before the meetings close in September, are the Archbishop, of Dublin, the Bishop of Worcester, Canon Barker, Canon Hammond, Canon Fremantle, Mr. W. T. Stead, Revs. Hugh Price Hughes, Mark Guy Pearse, Charles Berry, Charles Williams, of Accrington, W. J. Dawson, J. B. Heard, and Mr. J. B. Bunting.

THE "RESCUED NUN."—The provisional committee of inquiry into the allegations made by Miss Ellen Golding, the "Rescued Nun," met at Bournemouth on Monday, two additional parties being nominated—viz., Mr. Edward Lyttelton and Father Cooney, S.J., Oratory of the Sacred Heart, Bournemouth. Father Cooney reported that several eminent Roman Catholics were for various reasons unable to join the committee. Mr. Lyttelton reported that a representative meeting had assembled at Exeter Hall, and the result was that as they doubted the sincerity of the demand for full inquiry it was impossible to proceed further unless some representative Roman Catholics had taken part in the inquiry. Father Cooney declined an offer of further time for consideration, and the meeting, which was a protracted one, adjourned, it being understood that further proceedings were impossible.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey.

THE PROPOSED LONDON MISSION.

A CORDIAL invitation to conduct a mission in London next winter was sent to Messrs. Moody and Sankey in May last, with 702 names of clergy and ministers and of 553 laymen, attached to it. The committee have now received, through Mr. J. H. Tritton, its chairman, the following reply from Mr. Moody, and have decided, in consequence, to postpone the mission till the winter of 1894-95:—

The Bible Institute, Chicago,
July 15, 1893.

DEAR SIR,—You will pardon the delay in replying to the kind and pressing invitation extended to Mr. Sankey and myself by the committee of which you are chairman, to spend the coming winter in London. The matter has been upon my mind the whole time; and it is only after serious consideration, and in view of many indications, that I have come to a decision, namely: that I must decline.

Since the beginning of May I have been engaged with many fellow-workers in special evangelistic efforts in Chicago. Despite the difficulties under which we labour—the numerous attractions incident upon such an event as the World's Fair—our efforts have been greatly blessed; and our past success encourages us to push on the work with ever-increasing energy during the remaining months of the Fair.

Your invitation follows very soon upon my return from a two years' absence in Europe. I feel that there is work for me at home which has claims upon more of my presence and attention.

While it would give me great pleasure to have the privilege of labouring amongst my English friends once again, the way is not open as yet. But if the invitation hold over until next year, and if the Lord will, I should be glad to spend the winter of 1894-95 with you.—Yours in the work,

D. L. MOODY.

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

THE evangelistic efforts being put forth under the leadership of Mr. D. L. Moody during the period of the Fair are very notable. Associated with him of late have been, not only Mr. Torrey, of the Bible Institute, and Rev. John McNeill, late of London, but Rev. Dr. Pearson, of Georgia, Dr. Brookes, of St. Louis, Mr. Merton Smith, and Dr. and Mrs. A. J. Gordon, of Boston. Contrary to the custom of evangelists to omit a Saturday evening service, Mr. Moody has wisely introduced a series of Gospel temperance meetings in the Empire Theatre on that evening. Last Saturday evening I found the theatre packed with just the kind of men and women whom he is most anxious to reach; it was an impressive sight. At the Sunday morning service in the Haymarket Theatre, Mr. Moody called on the church members present to rise, and about two thirds of the congregation rose, but the other third would be a large number of such people as these meetings are chiefly intended for.

It having become established that street preaching may be engaged in with impunity, on my way to Mr Moody's meeting last Saturday evening, I found no less than three outdoor meetings near the theatre, and yet entirely independent of his work, so far as appeared. One of them was being conducted by the "cowboy preacher," Justice Rice, whom I found with his wife holding meetings on the streets of Hot Springs, Ark., in the spring, a place that needs preaching if any place does. Saturday night he had a great crowd of men about him, and when his wife speaks she certainly draws as well as he does. Christian people ought to rejoice that so much earnest evangelistic work is being done in the dark places of Chicago.—New York Evangelist.

MR. HENRY VARLEY has been invited by Mr. Moody to take part in the Gospel Work at the World's Fair, Chicago, and leaves Liverpool by the Campania on Saturday next.

Life Among English Poor.

In The Church Reformer for July and The Clarion of July 1 is some account of the conditions of life among English farm labourers. A copy of a printed agreement is given, which is in general use in some parts of the country, in which the servant undertakes to serve "in the capacity of cowman" or "in any work that may be required of him"; "to be always at his work, at all hours and times required by the master or his agent, and to milk not less than ten cows at a milking, and more if required"; to forfeit 2s. 6d. for "any cow found to be only partially milked," 2d. per quarter of an hour should he "absent himself at any time (by being late in the morning or otherwise) from his work"; to "make good any loss the master may sustain" through his negligence; and should he "be prevented by accident, sickness, or any other cause whatever, from attending to his duties, an amount equivalent to the time he is so incapacitated shall be deducted from his wages"; all this for a weekly wage of 7s. 6d., with a bonus of 35s. "at the expiration of his term if he shall have conducted himself to the entire satisfaction of his master during the said term, and only in such case." Of course this is an exceptional case (as far as the remuneration is concerned), but "the majority of labourers (in Wiltshire) receive only 10s. a week; and in some parishes married men get only 9s., out of which ninepence to one shilling is deducted for house rent." The name and address is given of a typical case, "a strong, well-built man, about forty-eight years of age, with a wife and five children," whose wages are 11s. weekly, and £2 at Michaelmas.

So much for the labourer. The position of the town artisan appears to be little better. In London alone C. Booth tells us there are over one and a quarter million persons whose earnings do not exceed a guinea a week per family (many of them get much less); and the lowest rent I could find in a decent part of Paddington, some miles from the City, was 6s. 6d. a week for two rooms in a tenement house. A quarter of the inhabitants of Glasgow live in "houses" of one room to a family, and one in seven of these one-roomed houses contain lodgers as well (Dr. Russell). The "unemployed in the country are estimated at 700,000 to a million." No wonder that while "the average age at death among the nobility, gentry, and professional classes in England and Wales was fifty-five years, among the artisan classes of Lambeth it only amounted to twenty-nine years: the infantile death-rate (under one year old), among the well-to-do classes was eight per cent. of the births; it was thirty per cent among the poor in some districts" (Dr. Drysdale).

Surely these appalling facts constitute an irresistible appeal to us all, particularly to the young, and those who have leisure: If we really loved our poor brothers and sisters as we love ourselves, should we not make as great efforts to ameliorate their lot as we do to maintain or improve our own social position, to extend our business, etc., etc?

Meanwhile it appears to be the clear duty of everyone who "nameth the name of Christ" first, to see that his own hands are clean—that no one is poor because he is rich; that no one is deprived of the necessaries of life, such as God intended for them, in order that he may enjoy luxuries; and, secondly, in a conscientious and unprejudiced manner to study the question, to get at the root of the matter, and find out for himself what is the real cause which, in this age of marvellous invention and unparalleled wealth, has brought and still keeps such a multitude of "these my brethren" in this fearful condition; and, having found it, to devote all his energies to removing it. Let us bear in mind the notable warning of John Ruskin: "The mistake of the best men through generation after generation has been that great one of thinking to help the poor by almsgiving, by preaching of patience or of hope, and by every other means, emollient or consolatory, except the one thing which God orders for them—Justice."

Some of our forefathers sacrificed very much, and even risked their lives in the cause of emancipation, but the conditions of thousands of people in this country is only a degree better than that of the slaves in America, and in some respects the latter were actually better off. Jesus said: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me because He hath anointed Me to preach good tidings to the poor: He hath sent Me to proclaim release to the captives; . . . to set at liberty them that are bruised"; and later on: "As my Father hath sent Me, even so send I you." God help us to be faithful to our charge. W. H. C.

Love's Labour Light—for Christ.

BY DR. T. L. CUYLER.

There is a beautiful picture presented in the following passage: "And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her." To woo the fair daughter of Laban, as well as to escape a resentful brother, he has left his father's home beyond the old Euphrates. He has made a bargain to watch Laban's flocks for seven long years, and his wages are to be—a wife. So while he tends his fleecy charge beneath the palm trees, his thoughts are of her who comes occasionally to the well's mouth and rewards him with a glimpse of her sweet countenance. At eventide, as the maidens grind the grain, it is her voice singing at the barley mill which heals the hardships of the sultry day, and sends him happy to his slumbers. Time flies on golden wings, and seven years seem to him but a few days, for love makes the labour light.

Is there not here a principle worth every Christian's study? The service of Jesus Christ is only pleasant, only thorough, and only effective, when it is a love labour. Our hearts must be in our religion as well as the religion in the heart, or else the service we undertake will be a formal drudgery. Here lies the reason why the duties of Christianity become so irksome to many a church-member. He has no heart in them. He toils at them as the bondman used to toil in the cotton-fields. His Bible is read out of form, when read at all; there is no hunger for the bread of life. If his closet is not entirely deserted, he goes to it as an anchorite goes to his cell. The church bell rings him to the Sabbath service or to the prayer-meeting, but no answering bell in his own grateful soul responds, "Oh, come and let us worship!" Money given for the cause of Christ is regarded as a pious taxation, and he tosses his unwilling dollars at the Lord's treasury, as if he would say, "There it is, since you must have it; but when will these everlasting calls of charity be done with?" The whole routine of his external performances in the church is gone through in a perfunctory and slavish style to satisfy conscience and to keep up appearances. A hundred such formal professors would only swell the roll and diminish the strength of any church to which they were lashed.

My brother, there is but one way to be a happy, thorough, and fruitful Christian. Whether you are a pastor—on large salary or small—or a missionary, or a Sunday-school teacher, or a parent training the home flock, or a philanthropist labouring to abate poverty, drunkenness, or vice, you must work heartily if your work is to come to anything. The man or woman who sincerely loves Jesus Christ will love to labour for Him. He or she will relish even the severities of duty. Such leal-hearted servants of Jesus rejoice to bear burthens, and even to take up crosses for Him; they can call themselves "bond-slaves of Christ," as Paul did, and yet, like him, are the Lord's "freedmen." Liberty to them is deliverance from Satan's slavery, and it is the possibility of duty to a beloved Master.

Would you be a happy Christian? Keep your affections set on Jesus. Would you be a thorough, soul-winning Christian? Keep your heart aglow with Jesus. Would you be an active worker even in seasons of dulness and declension and general backsliding? Then, instead of quenching Christ's Spirit, feed the flame! Put your love of the Saviour so deep down that it shall underlie all selfish temptations; so deep that the devil cannot reach it or the frictions of daily life wear upon it; so deep that even when the powers or the passions of our nature are dried up by old age, this "artesian" fountain shall give out its fresh and unceasing streams.

Let me impress upon you the great secret of spiritual joy and power. If the love of Jesus lives and reigns in the core of your heart, you will never know a spiritual winter; it will be a perpetual summer, and the "new song" will never wear out. Do you love Christ but a little? Then despise not the day of small things. You have made a good beginning. There may have been but a slight heart-beat in Jacob's heart when he first met Rachel at the well's mouth in Haran. But that young affection grew into a love that made the happy hours to tread on roses. And it was with a breaking heart that he bent over his dying wife as she lay moaning in woman's sorest sorrow, on the roadside to Bethlehem. So may your love to Jesus grow until it becomes the master-passion of your soul, until it conquers sinful lusts and subdues the accursed spirit of selfishness, until you so enjoy the blessed service of your Master that you can exclaim with the victorious Apostle: "I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord!"

THE UNIVERSITIES' MISSION IN NYASSALAND is rejoicing in a wave of blessing. Recent calamitous fires have not discouraged the workers nor arrested success. On Easter Sunday there were at Licoma, where the fires occurred, fifty-four baptisms. "It is a fine sight in church," Mr. Pullinger writes. "It is as full as it can hold at almost every service." Archdeacon Maples writes: "We have just finished printing and binding 300 copies of Mr. Johnson's translation of the Psalter into Chinyanja—a very important piece of work."

ABERDEEN TO LONDON.—A correspondent who recently travelled between these two ports by one of the boats of the Aberdeen Steamship Company tells of an interesting time on the Sabbath morning and evening, when hymns were sung, prayer offered, and some words spoken for the Master. The writer says there are eighty persons employed on the two steamers that are constantly running north or south, and as the Sabbath is always spent at sea, these have no privileges or opportunities as to public worship or hearing the Gospel. He suggests that some kind friend should purchase and place on board of each vessel, say, three dozen copies of Songs and Solos. Probably a steward or stewardess would take charge of them.
